Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Is it not instructive that, in this orchestrated set of interruptions, it is clear that, for the Conservative party, the fact that women are underpaid and often forced to take low-paid and unskilled jobs is not a matter of worry, but a matter of congratulation? They bitterly resent the fact that women are forced into such a position.

Mr. Dewar: There is, indeed, a general tendency by Conservative Members to underestimate the contribution that women now make. They have a major input and are a major part—soon to be the largest part—in the work force. I do not make a general accusation, because that would be unfair, but I point out that there are still a few people around who see a woman's job as a nice little interest and a little bit of pin money. We should not take that view these days.

Lady Olga Maitland: We are talking about the important subject of women and part-time work. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that part-time work is a blessing for women, because, among other things, it fits in with their family commitments, and because it often becomes full-time work when they are ready to take it up?

Mr. Dewar: I am extremely anxious that women should have the opportunity of getting both part-time work and full-time work if that is what they want. I do not undervalue the importance of part-time work, which gives flexibility, as it melds with household duties and other interests. However, even though it may be a blessing, as the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) put it, it should not be a charter to allow exploitation. That is unfortunate.

The hon. Lady has drawn herself to my attention. She is one of the Conservative Members who, on occasion, has an unrealistic view of these matters. She may remember a debate on 8 July 1994 in which she intervened to make a point about the number of people who were on benefit and who had televisions, freezers and so on in their homes. She then asked:

"Does he"—

she was referring to me—

"agree that it is a problem not so much of people living on a set income, but of how they manage their budgets? A person in one flat may manage perfectly adequately while someone else may not. Surely we need to teach people the art of household management."—[Official Report, 8 July 1994; Vol. 246, c. 607.]

There is a certain unreality about that view. [Interruption.] Conservative Members should not wave at me. The hon. Lady's view is totally unrealistic when it is compared with the experiences of my constituents and the constituents of many hon. Members who must cope with the problems we have been discussing.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Dewar: I can see that my optimism about getting some initial agreement about the nature of the problem has perished.

Dr. Spink rose—

Mr. Dewar: I recognise that the hon. Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) is a sincere Conservative. I am told—although I have not checked it personally—that the Conservatives lost every seat they held on the district council in his constituency in the elections. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman should go away and think about his position and his party's policy before he comes eagerly back to the fray. I have let him in more than once, and I hope that he will be content with that.

There is obviously not going to be agreement, but my view is that, if we follow present trends, there is a real danger that social cohesion will be challenged, undermined and put at risk by what I described—I stand by the description—as evils.

There are always healthy arguments about salary. I remember with pleasure the Secretary of State's evidence to the Select Committee on Social Security on 25 January. The right hon. Gentleman was perhaps led astray by questioning, although he led himself astray to some extent, about our salaries—always a matter of prurient interest to the House. He said:

"When I was a backbencher I thought that, on the whole, MPs should probably be paid less to encourage them to have outside interests, which I believe enriches Parliament".

I liked that, because I like plays on words, and we can agree that such a scheme would probably "enrich" Parliament in a very narrow sense. But I doubt whether it would enrich the life of Parliament.

I was entertained to see that the Secretary of State went on to say that Ministers should be paid more and back-bench Members less, and added:

"Now I am a Minister I hold both views even more strongly."

There is a man of courage, although whether he is in touch not just with Lord Nolan but, more importantly, with the world outside, I would beg to doubt.

I was interested to see the evidence given to the Nolan committee by the right hon. Member for Norfolk, South (Mr. MacGregor) just after he had left ministerial office and picked up—no doubt to his and the company's benefit—a directorship. He said that to bar Ministers from directorships in companies with which they may have had some dealings during their ministerial office would "expose them to the risk of comparative poverty on leaving their posts."

I thought that I would just read that out, as a touching human gesture.

I would argue that there is every importance in recognising both where we are heading and the growing inequalities in society. I recognise that we are not here today to have a reprise of old arguments which we have made at the Dispatch Box on more than one occasion. I know, for example, that the Secretary of State has severe doubts about the findings of the Rowntree report, and went to great lengths to discredit its authors and rubbish its conclusions. As so much of the report's material was taken from research conducted by the Department, he was in effect mounting a root-and-branch attack upon the Department's statistics and methodology. That is something for him and the Department to sort out.

An enormous amount of evidence is massing—not just the Rowntree report—from many sources that we have growing inequality at the same time as we, like every western country, are seeing many people increase their prosperity as average earnings move up. We know that 14 million people now have incomes below half the average earnings, compared with 5 million in 1979. More than 10 million people are now dependent upon income support, which is probably an increase of a multiple of two or three since 1979. Since 1979, wages for the lowest paid have hardly changed in real terms, while they have increased greatly for those at the top end of the scale. This divergence and moving apart ought to worry all of us. One of my concerns—

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, who has been liberal about giving way. Has he seen the report of the Institute for Fiscal Studies entitled "Why Peter Lilley was Right", which concluded that the poor have not been getting poorer?

Mr. Dewar: Yes, I was interested in that conclusion, and of course I have looked at the report. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the IFS has produced a number of reports—he has obviously read widely through them. He will remember that the one to which he refers studied outturn and expenditure patterns, rather than income patterns. As he will have noted carefully, it did not take into account income saved or invested, which gave a rather incomplete picture.

Building on the substantial evidence on my side of the argument in other IFS work, I remind the hon. Gentelman of the author's conclusion that "the gap between the richest and the poorest in terms of both income and expenditure widened over the period."

Even though that report, which the Minister optimistically said "blows a hole" in Labour's case, concluded that the figures were not as startling as those in the IFS report of between six and nine months earlier, it reinforced the same pattern and general picture.

If the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) is trying to say that there is not growing inequality in this country, he is on very weak ground indeed. I suspect that some of his braver colleagues would argue that it does not matter if the rich get richer and the gap grows greater.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton) indicated assent.

Mr. Dewar: The hon. Gentleman is always there on cue—a small, dynamic figure shouting his case in the second row from the back of the Back Benches, where he will probably remain for some considerable time.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dewar: I cannot resist it.

Mr. Jenkin: If the hon. Gentleman insists that poverty is increasing, is it not incumbent on him to tell the House which income group's spending has fallen since 1979?

Mr. Dewar: The hon. Gentleman should look at some of the Government's statistics. He will be familiar with those for households below average income, about which there is an interesting argument. The Government maintain that the statistics are unsound, because the bottom decile of households contains farmers, taxi drivers and accountants. All I can say is that I hope that their affairs will be investigated with the rigour that we are told is being properly applied to benefit fraud. If so, I think that there will be a considerable increase in prosecutions in the courts.

The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is that a large number of households are in the bottom two deciles, even when we have made every conceivable allowance for the small and rather errant group who are stranded at the bottom of the pile.

The Minister suggested that there was great movement in and out. We are given that impression as many pensioners have moved out because of the maturing of occupational pension schemes—

Mr. Jenkin: Good.

Mr. Dewar: Yes—good, indeed. A large number of families—including a large number who live in my constituency and those of my hon. Friends—have become trapped there, however, and have lost hope, are dependent on benefit and are offered nothing by the fiscal and economic policies of this Government. The level of alienation that is beginning to emerge ought to be a worry to every one of us.

The trouble with the Secretary of State, or with many of his hon. Friends, is that they tend to adopt the Government's statistics as absolute truth when it suits their case, but, as soon as we get a series of Government statistics that do not, they are rubbished with great energy, and we are told that they are "unsound and misleading."

The shape of the statistics leaves us in no doubt that the general proposition is that gaps have widened, with social consequences which every one of us can see—whether in the health, education, or social mobility statistics—and which are opening up real dangers for our society.

I have spent most of my political life denying that there is an underclass. I do not believe that we have reached that situation, but I seriously worry that, if present trends go unchecked, I will find it harder and harder to make that case. Once I have reached the point where I can no longer do so, we will be facing very real penalties in the form of economic efficiency, lost talents and a threat to social stability.

Some old texts are still horribly relevant. Some texts may not be familiar to those on the Conservative Benches who recognise the words of Sir Winston Churchill. I cannot resist giving the House a short quotation from R. H. Tawney, who wrote in the 1930s about what he described as the "tadpole theory". He said:

"It is possible that intelligent tadpoles reconcile themselves to the inconveniences of their position, by reflecting that, though most of them will live and die as tadpoles and nothing more, the more fortunate of the species will one day shed their tails, distend their mouths and stomachs, hop nimbly on to dry land, and croak addresses to their former friends on the virtues by means of which tadpoles of character and capacity can rise to be frogs."

The point that he was making was that it is dangerous if a society embraces the tadpole philosophy and we reach the position where the consolation that it offers to social evils consists in the statement that exceptional individuals can succeed in evading them.

We are very near the position where, if one is outstandingly able or unusually lucky, one can escape from the social evils that surround too many of our citizens. But if one is not exceptional in one of those two ways, one is lost, trapped, and in a real sense remaindered in society. That is the same argument as Sir Winston Churchill was making when he said that one would imagine that the market would put that right, and then went on to point out that the market does not put it right. That is why leaving present trends to develop is such a damaging and wrong-headed thing for any Government to do.

Unlike many of his agitating Back Benchers, I give the Secretary of State credit for knowing that that is a real difficulty which we should fear. I read his Birmingham diocesan speech, which was much commented on, and his speech to the Northern Ireland Conservative Political Centre. The speeches to which I have referred are rightly concerned not just with social deprivation but with the low-wage pressure that bears down constantly on the unskilled and manual workers in our midst.

Let me give the right hon. Gentleman a quotation:

"The dispersion of earning power has had unattractive social consequences . . . It lies behind or is intertwined with many of our social problems. It may play a major part in the break-up of families, the growth of lone parenthood and a growing welfare dependency. It may even play a part in explaining delinquency and crime!"

I would not disagree with those sentiments, which have been expressed on many other occasions by Labour Members and some Conservative Members. So despite all that has happened in the past quarter of an hour, there is an element of agreement, at least between the Secretary of State and myself, about what we should be considering in order to solve the problem.

May I give another quotation, because I like having friends on my side? Lord Lawson of Blaby, who was speaking to the Social Market Foundation in London on Monday 20 June, delivering, according to the headline, a "verdict on Government economic policy"—

a cheery event, I should have thought—said:

"a small reduction in real earnings, although unattractive to those involved, is in itself a price well worth paying to bring down unemployment."

That is a controversial view, but that was also his view as Chancellor. He went on:

"What I did not consider, however, ten years ago, was the possibility that this process might involve levels of pay for the least skilled that a fundamentally wealthy society would rightly consider too low to be acceptable."

That is one of the problems. Right-wing economists as well as right-wing politicians are now worried about the continuing pressure that is driving down wage scales for those people, and greatly exacerbating the problems to which I have referred. It is against that background that I want briefly to discuss this issue.

Dr. Spink: The hon. Gentleman implied earlier that I despise the low-paid. I hope that he will be characteristic and withdraw that implication, because he clearly does not think that that is so, and it is not. Which does the hon. Gentleman believe is best: low pay or no job?

Mr. Dewar: I was unfair to tadpoles and to the hon. Gentleman, because they are not like for like, and therefore the comparison should not be made. The choice he offers me would be an interesting subject for discussion if it were a choice.

If the hon. Gentleman could establish that there is an inescapable choice between having some level of minimum wage but no jobs and having lots and lots of jobs but no minimum wage, I would be in a difficult situation. However, as he well knows, he cannot establish that that is the choice. He should not try to simplify the argument to help himself and then present it as a truth to the rest of the House.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): If the hon. Gentleman were right, would it not be an appalling commentary on 16 years of Conservative government and alleged economic success that there was a choice between low pay and no job?

Mr. Dewar: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is one of the mysteries of British politics how Conservative Ministers, who have been in power for many years, can suddenly discover problems and announce that they are tackling them with great energy, even though those problems have been happily running along unchecked for the past 15 years. We had a small example of that this morning from the Secretary of State. That is not the subject of this debate, but we shall no doubt return to it on another occasion.

My simple message is that there is exploitation, which is an unpleasant phenomenon. I took the bother of checking on some jobcentre advertisements in my constituency. I know that Labour politicians are wont to do that, but it is a matter of illustrating a simple truth. I saw advertisments for a catering assistant at £1.23 an hour; for a hairdresser at £78 for a 43-hour week; and for counter or shop assistants at between £2.00 and £2.50 an hour. On a simple moral level, there seems to be strong cause for concern.

The Secretary of State will say—and I agree with him—that work must be worth more than benefit. Low wages strike at that principle. At the extremes of the figures that I have announced, low wages can be a disincentive for those who should be searching for work.

Mr. Duncan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dewar: No, I must push on, but I welcome the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald), to his new job. I had thought that he was a Whip, but he is a lordly creature compared with a Whip. I congratulate him on his promotion.

There are a number of arguments about the minimum wage with which I shall deal. It is alleged that only a small percentage of households would benefit from it. There is some truth in that. Unfortunately, 40 per cent. of households have no earner. However, of households with earners who would benefit—the only ones that are relevant to the minimum wage argument—a substantial percentage would do so.

If we consider the bottom three income deciles of earning households, we find that, in every case, whatever calculation is made and whichever survey we take, over 50 per cent. would benefit from the introduction of a minimum wage set at a variety of different levels. Perhaps the most obvious evidence of that is from the British household panel survey, with which some hon. Members will be familiar.

The key argument that is put up is that the minimum wage will cost jobs. I say this gently to hon. Members, but there is no clear and convincing evidence of that. If an unreasonable minimum wage is set—and one can make that judgment only in the circumstances of the time at which it will be set—it will no doubt cost jobs. That is like saying that, if the Government make a mistake with taxation or national insurance contribution policy, or any other major economic decision, the results could be disastrous. It does not mean that the policy is wrong and should not be followed. There is no evidence that a sensible and flexibly applied minimum wage will cost jobs.

Lady Olga Maitland: I urge the hon. Gentleman to clarify the minimum wage. What does what he calls a not unreasonable level mean? If it is too high, it will undoubtedly mean that employers will not be able to employ other people; if it is too low, he will be perpetrating a great con on the world outside by suggesting that he is trying to do something for the low-waged when he is not.

Mr. Dewar: I agree with the hon. Lady 100 per cent. If we set the rate too low or too high, it is likely to be ineffective, or it may have some unfortunate by-products. That is no doubt true of the Chancellor's tax policy. The hon. Lady may have a personal opinion about what the Chancellor should do in November 1996, but I imagine that, if she asked him such a question, he would tell her not to be silly, and not to bother him with futile questions. What I infer from her question—this is something I welcome—is that, if we cast the rate at the right level, it will do the job effectively.

Conservative Members should consider the international experience and the international comparisons. As many hon. Members will know, there is at the moment an argument in America, led by the research of David Card and Alan Krugger of Princeton university, which suggests that there are in fact positive labour and employment consequences from the introduction of a minimum wage.

The researchers compared states where the level of the minimum wage varies. There is, of course, a move by the American Government as a result to put up the minimum wage from $4.25 an hour to $5.15. It all depends on getting it through a Republican House where the Government are not in control, but that is the judgment of the Clinton Administration, and it is largely supported by American evidence and research.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Dewar: I shall give way to one or two hon. Gentlemen, but, as someone said, rather daringly, I was over-liberal in letting people intervene. I must live down that reputation for a few minutes.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): Will my hon. Friend give way to me?

Mr. Dewar: No, I have to be entirely consistent in these matters.

I mentioned the American experience, but what about the British experience? The Government undertook a careful inquiry into the Agricultural Wages Board, and a reprieve from death row was issued. Indeed, I believe that the Secretary of State for Education and Employment was involved in that, although it may have been just before her time. In any event, she will know all about it. The conclusion was that there were no adverse labour market consequences, and that the Agricultural Wages Board should survive. I think that it should, and for strong reasons.

I referred to the position of women in society. Probably three quarters of those affected by a minimum wage would be women. The following fact might attract some people to the notion of a minimum wage. For the purpose of modelling alone, let us assume a minimum wage of, say, around £3 or £3.50. I have not done the modelling, so I take the figures used by those who have. In fact,

I am using the figures of the IFS, in case some people think that they are those of some kind of kept research team of mine. I wish that I had such a beast.

The IFS discovered that a minimum wage of around £3.50 would mean that a large number of women would be brought into the national insurance contribution net, much to the benefit of the Chancellor. It would also have the effect of bringing them into benefit and pension contributions and into a level of social security that is not available to them at the moment. In the present complex and unstable situation in which many of our citizens have to live because of changing social habits and values, that is an important point to bear in mind. It is a substantial spin-off.

The Secretary of State's eyes light up with sincerity when he talks about Britain's job creation prospects—the Mais lecture was full of them about 18 months ago. However, our job creation levels are disappointing when set against those of the United States. It is very unfair to pick out one factor and assume that it is in some way responsible for that, but let us put it this way: it is not a damning indictment of a minimum wage that the better record has been achieved in the United States, a country which has had a minimum wage for a long time. If we look at the European scene, it is very much a case of everyone being out of step except our Peter. I suggest that he should think again.

The Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Peter Lilley): Will the hon. Gentleman tell us why unemployment, measured according to a common definition, is greater in France and Spain than it is in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Dewar: No doubt that would require complex analysis—[Interruption.]—but I can say to the Minister that in many countries, of which America is one, a national minimum wage has been combined with a very successful economic record.

It is interesting to note the first thing that Mr. Alain Juppé did when he became Prime Minister of France. His "dry" credentials are impeccable. He comes from a very much right-of-centre Government, from the presidency of Jacques Chirac. He is extremely worried about unemployment in France, and made that the main campaigning platform of his presidency. He hopes to improve the position, and one of the first things he did was to increase the minimum wage.

There was no suggestion of Mr. Juppé going around saying, "The British Government have got it right. My good right-wing colleagues across the channel in Downing street and in Richmond house are absolutely right. We must get rid of the wicked minimum wage, which is obviously responsible for our economic problems." No; the right-wing analysis—I emphasise, the right-wing analysis—in France is that the minimum wage should be increased. The Minister might want to consider that.

There is another important reason to introduce a minimum wage, and that is that there is in the Government's policies a strong emphasis on in-work subsidies. People who work will receive help. Almost 600,000 of those people are in receipt of family credit. As the House knows—conveniently, the figures were given in a reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) on 12 June at column 420—in 1988-89, family credit cost £394 million. In 1994-95, it will be very nearly £1.5 billion.

Apparently, that is one occasion when that type of escalation is not unwelcome in the Government, because they have announced their new earnings top-up measure, which will cost £75 million over three years. If that is a success—I assume that the Government believe or hope that it will be a success—I am told, in a reply on 20 July 1994 at column 255, that extending it to all childless couples will cost another £65 million and bring in 70,000 people, and that extending it to single people, who are also being piloted, as I understand it, will bring in another 1.5 million people and cost £1.5 billion in additional cash.

Therefore, we are quite big now—even in the Conservative party—on in-wage benefits. I do not criticise that; it is not a matter for discussion in the debate, anyway. However, there is a clear common-sense argument that, in those circumstances, we should put a floor under wages to ensure that the long-suffering taxpayer does not pick up the bill as the bad employer repeatedly cuts wages and forces them down. There is a significant danger of that.

That is one of the powerful arguments recognised, interestingly enough, by the Financial Times, which is generally hostile, which has said that, if we are going to go down that road, obviously we shall have to reconsider the minimum wage. The argument was also recognised by The Independent in its leader on 31 August 1994, headed:

"Fear not the minimum wage",

in which it says:

"Neither party should be frightened off by the Government's simplistic economic arguments. Combined with a tax and social security system that better promotes work incentives for people on low earnings, a flexible framework of minimum-wage legislation would help to make companies take a more appropriate share in maintaining the low paid, rather than thrusting the burden on an over-stretched state benefits system."

That is a powerful argument, which the House should consider.

Many other things must be done. I believe that everyone in the House recognises that we should not regard the welfare state as an argument about a payment of last resort, grudgingly granted by a reluctant system. We all pay lip-service, to varying degrees, to incentives and training opportunities that try to inject hope and movement into the benefit system.

Of course, as the Minister will say, there are signs of activity and signs of conscience on the Government's part. I submit that they are half-hearted, and bear the stamp of political calculation based on that principle of essential minimum. For example, the back-to-work bonus is jam tomorrow, or perhaps jam never, for those who are not fortunate enough to find full-time employment. The national insurance contribution holiday is worth only about £6 a week, and I suspect that it will have little impact.

Perhaps the attitude of the Government can be summed up by the rather casual abolition of the Department of Employment, without any real discussion or debate. I rather suspect that it was a popular and populist move because it evicted the right hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) from an economic portfolio. It leaves him sidelined and living in the giant shadow of the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind). I suspect that that will at least be popular with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who will feel a little safer as a result.

[Mr. Dewar]

What it will do for the sales of videos at the Conservative party conference next year, I do not know. I was interested to note that the right hon. Member for Southgate outsold everyone else by 2:1. I am glad to notice that, gallantly if still a long way back, the right hon. Member for St. Albans (Mr. Lilley) came in second place. That probably does not tell us anything about the excellence of the videos, but it tells us a great deal about the Conservative party conference.

Mr. Gyles Brandreth (City of Chester): Normally when I rise to speak, the hon. Gentleman likens me to some character from Dickens. Last time, it was Uriah Heep. I am Micawber-like today, waiting for something to turn up in terms of policy.

We have had from the hon. Gentleman 45 minutes of entertaining badinage, which was very stylistic but had no content. He mentioned one of his constituents going to the jobcentre and seeing a low-paid job. What would he say to that same constituent if he came to the hon. Gentleman's surgery and said, "You advocate a minimum wage. In today's society, this is what I am being offered. In your society, what would the minimum wage be?" The hon. Gentleman must answer his constituent.

Mr. Dewar: I am glad that I have been entertaining. The hon. Gentleman is in entertainment himself, so his accolade is one that I value. I would explain to my constituent the need for a national minimum wage and how it would operate. I would ask him to endorse the principle. If he came from my constituency, I expect that he would do so enthusiastically. I would then, as I intend to do now briefly to the House, suggest that there were a number of things that we should do and should not do.

Let us start with just one thing that we should not do. We should not follow the Government's example of continuing to cut the training budget. In England next year, the budget will fall by 8 per cent. in cash terms and 11 per cent. in real terms. I would tell my constituent that, if he wished to judge the sincerity of the Government's talk about unemployment and equipping people to compete in the employment market, he should look at what they are doing to the training budget.

I would then recommend to my constituent the package of measures that the Labour party suggested at the time of the last Budget. We would have taken those measures, but the Government did not take them. Our package followed the Government in suggesting a national insurance contribution holiday for employers who took off the unemployment register people who had been on it for more than one year. When I first saw the proposal for a tax allowance of £75 a week, it looked, to say the least, ambitious, but it would be a real incentive to take into employment people who had been on the unemployment register for more than two years.

When the policy was costed, it was found that, after some initial costs, the tax allowance would be self-financing in the second year.

Mr. Lilley indicated dissent.

Mr. Dewar: The Secretary of State shakes his head, but that is what reputable economic forecasters and modellers have suggested. When the Secretary of State introduces anything, he produces figures which he expects us all to accept to show that the policy is self-financing. For example, we were told that the disregard for child care costs against family credit would cost £240 million, but that £220 million of that would be recouped, and the scheme would be almost self-financing.

The secret of such measures—I am arguing that case—is that, if we can move people into work, they pay national insurance contributions, and perhaps pay tax. They are certainly not paid benefit. The Government can afford to be generous and not be half-hearted. They could try to make an impact on the unemployment problem.

I would explain such measures to my constituent. I would also point to quality child care for three and four-year-olds whose parents wished to take up that option. I would point to the disregard for working parents, which the Labour party has outlined, and the measures that we have proposed to produce some movement in the construction industry, create employment and at the same time tackle social problems.

My only problem might be that, if my constituent had a short-term attention span and wanted to get away to other things, he might find the meeting rather long. However, I think that he would be favourably impressed. He certainly would not be impressed by what has happened in this country in the past 10 years or so.

Let me conclude by saying that social problems have to be tackled. They cry out to be tackled, and we ignore them at our cost.

I am often accused of peddling the politics of envy, but I am not interested in the politics of envy—although I will give the Secretary of State an opening by saying that some of what has happened in the privatised utilities is blatantly offensive, raising ethical and moral problems that are perhaps even more pressing than any economic issue to which they attach.

In many instances, the Government's actions have handed people, on a plate, an opportunity for personal enrichment beyond what most would consider to be the bounds of reason. Few of those people could even be said to be at the cutting edge of entrepreneurial risk, and to have justified their gains on grounds of hazard. I would find it difficult to put such an argument in relation to the hierarchy of National Grid, to take just one example.

That is part of a wider picture. Perusal of the Financial Times shows how commonplace it is for people to take—in the form of share options, pension contributions and substantial salaries—sums that will inevitably provoke anger and bitterness among those who, for reasons that I understand, are being asked to show restraint and to accept pay limits that are very modest even in relation to the likely rate of inflation over the next year or two.

Let me give a passing example. The fact that Lord Young of Graffham, that splendid child of Thatcherism, takes the amount that he takes from Cable and Wireless while at the same time complaining about the greed of teachers has an important effect on national morale and the social cohesion that I mentioned earlier.

If we want people to pull together, we must pay attention to the symbols of our time that have been allowed to rise unchecked. If we are to deal with alienation, that will constitute a good investment in economic efficiency. We must tackle the loss of talent, the negative costs of bitterness, and the increasing instability to which the Secretary of State himself referred in the speech from which I quoted earlier.

The other day I read a book bearing the HMSO imprint but produced by the Scottish Consumer Council. It is called "Poor and Paying for it", and it examines the increasing inequality of opportunity, and other problems, of the low-paid in Scotland. It quotes a young mother from Wester Hailes, who said—with a simplicity that struck me as unanswerable—

"If you've no money you cannae buy things and do things."

Many of my constituents—not just those on benefit, but those on low wages; some of the most serious poverty is experienced by large families on poverty pay—are faced with that deadening truth, that you cannae buy things and do things. I believe that we shall all pay a price if we do not soon have a Government who are prepared to recognise the damage that is being done, and to do something about it.

The Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Peter Lilley): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"welcomes the increase of 38 per cent. in average incomes and the rise in spending of all income groups since 1979; welcomes the fact that the United Kingdom has fewer people claiming unemployment benefits and more jobs than any other major European country; welcomes the creation of a new Department for Education and Employment to improve further Britain's skill base and competitive position; applauds the £700 million package of measures to improve incentives to work for those on benefits and increase the rewards of work for lower-paid families; welcomes further initiatives, such as the Jobseeker's Allowance, the Back to Work Bonus, and the pilot of an Earnings Top-up for childless people on low earnings; believes that supplementing low pay to help people into work is preferable to destroying jobs through a statutory national minimum wage and the social chapter; and recognises that improving opportunity and the reward for effort is less socially divisive than encouraging dependency and the politics of envy.".

I am genuinely grateful to the Opposition for calling the debate, which gives us an opportunity to expose the multiple fallacies that they have been peddling about inequality, employment and the minimum wage.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) asked us to try to agree on the nature of the problem. He immediately went on to quote Winston Churchill, and to suggest that we faced a problem similar to that faced by Churchill in 1911. To be fair to the hon. Gentleman, he became a bit more up to date when he referred to my Ulster lecture on the dispersal of earning power.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman agrees that the low earning power of the least skilled is a problem throughout the western world. That problem is a consequence of the displacement by modern technology of many jobs that depended on brawn rather than brain, and of the fact that trade has brought into the international marketplace a great number of very low-paid but able workers to compete with ours. It is nonsense to suggest, however, that the cause of the dispersal of earning power has something to do with an increased meanness among employers—or, indeed, that those who are paid reasonably have the good fortune to be employed by generous employers, while the low-paid have the misfortune to be employed by mean employers. The fact is that, in a competitive market, employers are compelled to pay an amount that roughly reflects the value that people can contribute to the process of producing goods and services and they cannot pay more than that value or they go bankrupt. A national minimum wage simply means that anyone whose earning power is limited by an inability to contribute as much as the minimum wage will not have a job.

The basic problem, which I hope hon. Members on both sides of the House will agree exists, could be tackled only by improving people's earning power through better education, training and skills, which are often acquired at work—so we should not drive them out of work through a national minimum wage or the social chapter—through in-work benefits to help supplement their earnings, and through deregulation that will reduce the other costs that reduce employers' ability to earn.

That should be our starting point, but it obviously is not because the Opposition come up with policies that are incompatible with that analysis. With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall take the issues in the order in which they appear in the Opposition motion. They begin by referring to "widened social division" and "damaging inequality". Since even before the Rowntree report appeared, the Opposition have been using figures relating to the incomes of the bottom 10th of households to suggest that low income is a static condition from which people cannot escape, and that the poor are getting poorer. Unfortunately for the Opposition, the recent Institute for Fiscal Studies report does blow a hole in that thesis. That report showed that low income is not a static condition from which people never escape. On the contrary, up to half of those who were in the bottom 10th of incomes in 1991 had risen out of that band a year later. Overall, the incomes of those in the bottom 10th had risen by a quarter over that year.

Moreover, as measured by their expenditure, the standard of living of households in the bottom 10th of incomes, far from falling since 1979, has risen by 30 per cent. in real terms. That evidence is supplemented by that from the new earnings survey, which gives figures for the movement out of the bottom 10th of earnings over a longer period. They show an even more dramatic picture. One in 10 of those in the bottom 10th of earnings five years ago have succeeded in reaching the top 10th of earnings today. In short, far from the poor getting poorer, many of them have been getting richer and most of them have been getting less well-off.

Mr. Kaufman: Yes, that is true.

Mr. Lilley: Most of them have been getting less poorly off.

The Opposition, however, are not solely or even primarily concerned about the bottom 10 per cent. They are far more concerned to stir up resentment against the good fortune of the top 10 per cent. It is against them that the politics of envy have been deployed. It is true that the top 10 per cent. have seen a more rapid increase in their incomes than the national average—I willingly concede that—but who are these bloated plutocrats whose well-being has allegedly been obtained at the expense of the least well-off? Let us get one thing clear: they are not all Cedric Browns. The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) might try and suggest that they are, and the handful of highly publicised cases of privatised industry directors may be distasteful, but the total impact on the top 10th is negligible because more than 5 million people are in the top 10th of households.

The Rowntree report produced what it called a "UK Income Parade". It drew out 50 households from the survey that it was using for its research. They represented different income distribution points from bottom to top. It said that, if people's heights had reflected their income, we would see "a parade of dwarfs and a few giants".

It is worth seeing who the giants are, according to the Rowntree report. At the threshold of the top 10th of incomes we find a household comprising a single man who lives in a council house and who has a take-home pay of £311 per week. In the view of the Opposition, he is getting on towards being stinking rich. In the middle range of the top 10th of incomes we find a 57-year-old freelance journalist earning £30,300 per year gross, whose wife works part time as a manager of a day centre on a weekly wage of £115. Alas, like all the cases in the report, he is anonymous. It would be poetic justice if he wrote articles for The Guardian denouncing the widening social divide and damaging inequality without realising that he had been selected by the Rowntree report to typify the stinking rich. The biggest giant in the parade is a 60-year-old man earning £47,300 gross, whose 58-year-old wife is on invalidity benefit.

It is not possible to tell from the Rowntree report what the wage earners in other representative households in the top 10th do. However, judging from their salaries, they could include a police officer married to a senior nurse, a head teacher of a large comprehensive married to a primary school teacher, or a Member of Parliament married to his secretary. Labour believes that they are the sort of people whose salaries are too high and whose taxes are too low. According to Labour, they are the cause of damaging inequality and social division. When Labour Members talk about soaking the rich, they should make it clear that they mean taxing the middle classes. It is not just the Cedric Browns who are in the firing line: journalists, policemen, teachers and nurses will be the real victims of Labour's politics of envy.

Labour Members are divided in their views about redistribution. The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field)—who, alas, is not present in the Chamber—recently wrote:

"There is no general ground swell amongst middle-class groups for redistribution of wealth to the poor . . . Politicians who maintain otherwise are a public menace distracting from the real task."

Six days earlier, the hon. Member for Garscadden had written in The House Magazine:

"An element of redistribution is a vital investment in social stability which matters for us all".

I shall leave it to the two hon. Gentlemen to fight among themselves about what the Opposition policy should be and who is or is not a public menace—but if the cap fits, wear it.

Mr. Dewar: Dear me—a phrase maker. The right hon. Gentleman is constructing an imaginary Labour economic policy. No doubt he derives some satisfaction from that and it furthers his cause, because he can then knock it down. However, I do not know of anyone who has said that we shall "soak the rich", and certainly not the sort of people to whom he referred.

In my speech, I was very careful to say that the abuses and offences that have emerged—and to which the Prime Minister has admitted—in the private utilities and certain other sectors of the economy pose an ethical and a moral problem rather than an economic problem as such. We believe that it is very bad for the morale of this country to allow that practice to go on unchecked. We also believe that the emphasis should be on opportunity and giving people a chance—which the market does not at present afford—to better themselves and to improve their quality of life.

Mr. Lilley: I believe that I am correct in saying that the hon. Gentleman referred to the Rowntree report and the figures it cites—he certainly did so in a previous debate—which he appeared to endorse. They are based on an analysis that the top 10th of income earners are getting more and the bottom 10th are getting less. The hon. Gentleman referred today to the widening division, but if he is simply talking about the division between half a dozen privatised industry directors and the 5 million people at the bottom of the income scale, he is clearly misleading people, to say the least.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) referred to people being able to better themselves and improve their quality of life, and in his speech he talked about frogs and tadpoles—I have been meditating on that fable ever since. Does my right hon. Friend agree that, thanks to the Government's efforts, in the past 10 to 15 years many people have been able to better themselves through participation in higher and further education?

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. At the time when he and I entered Parliament, we set the target of increasing the number of people in higher and further education from one eighth to one third by the end of the century. We have already achieved that proportion of school leavers entering further and higher education.

The next issue raised in Labour's motion is the merger of the Department of Employment with the Department for Education, which the motion alleges signals

"the complete lack of Government concern about unemployment".

That is the precise opposite of the truth. I shall leave my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment to rebut that allegation in detail. Suffice it to say that the best key to a good job is the skills and educational attainment to contribute to the production of goods and services. Employment training and education are therefore intimately linked. It is right that Whitehall's structure reflects that, and it is absurd that the Opposition should want to dismantle it.

Mr. Dewar: I quoted figures, which I understand are accurate, about the reduction of the training budget this year as against next year. I believe that that will continue a trend that has existed for some time. How does the Secretary of State explain that reduction, in terms of the commitment that he is parading?

Mr. Lilley: We believe in increasing the total quantum of training and the total quality of training and education in the economy. The vast bulk of it applies in work. The key for many people is getting jobs in which they can build skills and expertise. We are more keen on that than on simply setting up ever more schemes, as the Opposition would like us to do.

The third issue raised by the motion is

"action which promotes employment opportunities",

which is precisely the action that the Government have been taking, with growing success. It is also just what Opposition policies would undermine.

Our success is best measured by comparing our performance with our partners in the European Union, who already implement the policies that Labour advocates. Unemployment in the United Kingdom is below the EU average and falling faster than elsewhere. Britain has a higher percentage of people of working age in work than any other major country in the European Union. Moreover, the number of people in work rose by more than 1.5 million in the UK between 1979 and 1990—the last two peaks in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development cycle—while it fell in the rest of the European Community.

Opposition claims that falling unemployment in Britain is not leading to more people in work are not true. Over the past 12 months, the number of people in work has risen by nearly 300,000. Claims that those extra jobs are all part-time, female, low-grade jobs are equally false. Only 5 per cent. of those extra jobs have been taken by women working part time. Two thirds of all the jobs created over the past year have been full-time jobs, and 70 per cent. have been taken up by men. The most rapid expansion has been in professional and managerial jobs.

Our success in generating more employment opportunities is based on a threefold strategy—first, improving education and training by ensuring that the right subjects are taught through the national curriculum, which Labour opposed; raising standards through testing, which Labour opposed; through parental choice, which Labour opposed; and through publishing school performance, which Labour opposed.

The second leg of our strategy is to improve competitiveness by avoiding the burdens of the social chapter, reducing payroll taxes where possible and deregulating enterprise. Labour would destroy competitiveness by opting into the social chapter. The third element of our strategy is to increase work incentives through in-work benefits.

Family credit already helps to make work worth while for 600,000 parents. Last week, I published the Green Paper on our plans to test a new earnings top-up benefit for people without dependent children who have limited earning power. There is a case for making work more attractive for such people—to encourage people to get on to the employment ladder, since most skills and experience are acquired in work.

If that pilot study is successful, it should benefit the least well-off. It should also benefit the taxpayer, because it costs more to keep people out of work than to top up earnings in work. The figures that the hon. Member for Garscadden quoted were from some while back and related to the possible extension of family credit to all people without families. On the basis that we are proposing, the cost—even assuming no offsetting reduction in unemployment—will be one third that which the hon. Gentleman claimed.

Mr. Dewar: I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman again, but this is an important point. I accept his correction in respect of the cost. Our case is that there ought to be a floor under wages, to stop employers setting lower and lower wages for people entering the employment market, leaving a greater and greater strain to be taken by the taxpayer. Does not the right hon. Gentleman acknowledge that danger? Will checks and balances be built into the system, to prevent such a thing happening? It would help the right hon. Gentleman's case—I put it no higher than that—if he could satisfy the House that there is no such danger.

Mr. Lilley: We are undertaking a pilot study, which is a major departure from social security policy and a sensible one, to ascertain whether such a benefit would assist not only the people who receive it but the whole economy. The test will be whether it helps people back to work, improves their take-home pay in work and encourages job creation. If the answer to those questions is no, with wage reductions offsetting the benefits to employees and no growth in jobs, we shall examine those factors. If the hon. Member for Garscadden is not 100 per cent. sure—and I submit that no one could be 100 per cent. sure—of his case for a national minimum wage, why does not Labour propose testing it on a pilot basis?

Ms Harriet Harman (Peckham): The case for minimum wages was proven by the wages councils.

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Lady can try to make that case later and see whether the House finds it credible.

Ms Harman: The Secretary of State asked whether there could be a pilot scheme for a floor under wages by law. We had such a scheme from 1909, under the wages councils, until the Government abolished them. We do not need a pilot scheme, because we know that a floor under wages is necessary.

Mr. Lilley: Given that since our reforms, including those affecting wages councils, the UK has been more successful in increasing the number of jobs than most other countries, the suggestion is that the test has gone not in the hon. Lady's favour but in ours, and it should strengthen the economy as more people will be working and fewer kept idle.

Our approach is the opposite to that of the Opposition, who have consistently criticised in-work benefits. A national minimum wage would cut off the bottom rungs of the employment ladder and reduce opportunities for people to get into work and to increase their earning power through the expertise and skills that they may then acquire.

The final element of the Opposition motion is the claim that a national minimum wage would protect low-paid people. Any hope that a national minimum wage would help the lowest-income households is fallacious. Only 3 per cent. of families in the bottom 10th by income contain a full-time worker on low pay. The bulk of low-income households are on benefit, self-employed, retired or have large families. By contrast, many of those earning low pay are providing a second income in households with quite high total incomes. As a result, the Institute for Fiscal Studies calculates that, even before allowing for job losses, a national minimum wage would actually help the best-off 30 per cent. of households more than the least well-off 30 per cent. I cannot really believe that that is Labour's objective, although I may be mistaken.

There are three questions on the national minimum wage that the Opposition must answer if they are to be honest with the electorate. First, at what level would they pitch it? We have been given no answer today. Secondly, to what extent would the Opposition expect or allow differentials to be restored for wages above that level? Thirdly, how many jobs do the Opposition believe would be destroyed as a result of their policy? What distinguishes new Labour from old Labour is its refusal to answer or even to deal with such questions.

This is not a new issue. Barbara Castle, as Secretary of State for Employment, set up an inquiry into a national minimum wage. Her conclusion was unequivocal:

"The introduction of a national minimum will add to labour costs. This could in turn increase the level of unemployment . . . The alternatives would either be a substantial increase in costs or, more likely, some reduction in employment both for men and still more seriously for women, with the worst impact falling on the least prosperous areas".

So the Government of that day ruled it out.

The last Labour Government likewise rejected the idea. The former Chancellor, Lord Healey, is on record as warning his party in his best silly-billy manner:

"Don't kid yourselves—the minimum wage is something on which the unions will build differentials."

Then, in the 1980s, the hon. Member for Birkenhead—

Mr. MacShane: Is that now the difference between old Tories and new Labour? We pray in aid Sir Winston Churchill; they pray in aid Barbara Castle.

Mr. Lilley: I suppose it is. The interesting thing is that new Labour seems to have disowned every previous Labour Government—and quite a few current Labour spokesmen.

In the 1980s, the hon. Member for Birkenhead, Chairman of the Select Committee on Social Security, published an excellent book called "The Minimum Wage—Its Potential and Dangers". In it he wrote:

"The employment consequences of implementing a National Minimum Wage are serious, but if the trade union movement decided on a policy of re-establishing differentials, the effects would be little short of disastrous."

More recently, in his characteristically robust way, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) has said of a minimum wage:

"I knew the consequences . . . were that there'd be a shakeout—any silly fool knew that."

In short, not just this Government but all previous Labour Governments—and, until now, the Opposition—have always accepted that a national minimum wage would destroy jobs. But just recently the Opposition have done a volte face. On the basis of a survey involving telephoning 400 fast-food outlets in New Jersey, they now claim that a minimum wage can increase jobs. That really does sound like a drowning man clutching at a straw. The OECD has examined all the evidence from the United States, and it is clear that the weight of the evidence from there and elsewhere suggests that minimum wages destroy jobs.

The hon. Member for Garscadden said that the American experience of the past few years, despite the existence of a minimum wage, was successful in creating jobs and proved that a minimum wage was no obstacle to that; but of course over that period the real value of the minimum wage has fallen by a third. So its impact in terms of job destruction has been declining. Small wonder, then, that America has been doing increasingly well.

Mr. Dewar: I really think that the right hon. Gentleman is overstating his case in a way that does him no good. Despite what he has said, there are many countries—we have discussed one or two of them: America, France, and there are many others—with minimum wages and with no intention of retreating from them. And some countries in eastern Europe—not necessarily a good parallel, I admit—are thinking of moving to a minimum wage system, on the basis of evidence from western Europe and north America.

I agree that there is a conflict of evidence, but there is a large body of evidence to the effect that there are no adverse labour market or employment consequences. Indeed, in a parliamentary reply on 4 November 1992, the Department of Employment was good enough to list a large number of those countries.

Mr. Lilley: When I asked the hon. Gentleman why France and Spain, which differ from us in having a minimum wage and the social chapter, suffer from higher unemployment, he was unable to give me a single reason—he said that the question would need complex analysis. But it is a prime question that any advocate of a minimum wage ought to have asked himself, and answered, before choosing to inflict it on his own country.

The hon. Member for Garscadden claims that there is no suggestion in France that the minimum wage is a problem. That is to ignore the fact that the previous Prime Minister, a member of the same party, proposed a reduction of the minimum wage for young people and withdrew that proposal only in the run-up to the election because it was proving politically unpopular. He withdrew it in the face of political agitation—

Mr. Dewar rose—

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Gentleman has already intervened three or four times. If he failed to make his points in his own speech, that speaks for itself.

The Labour party now bases its case on studies that tacitly assume that in some areas some firms are effectively the only employers of unskilled labour and can therefore depress wages below the market clearing level. A minimum wage can be harmless only in those limited circumstances, and to the extent that it is geared to offsetting such power. Labour's research certainly cannot be used to justify a statutory national minimum wage.

A more logical approach, for anyone who believes Labour's research, would be to encourage more competition from more new businesses and to bid up wages to the market clearing level in the areas where they are artificially depressed. But Labour does not even seem to recognise the implications of the research on which it leans so heavily.

One thing is clear: the level at which the minimum wage is set would be crucial. Once it is known, academics can work out the implications. More importantly, employers and employees can work out whether they would move from low pay to no pay. That is presumably why the shadow Employment Secretary has decided to refuse to tell us what the level would be. We are told that it will not be set until after the next election.

That rather cynical ploy has backfired, however. The hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson), secretary of the Campaign Group, said:

"it would be to our advantage to be a party that says what it means and means what it says, and that means something specific about the starting level of the minimum wage."

The ploy has also caused alarm among the brothers—and other relatives—in the trade union movement. They fear another retreat, so they want a firm commitment to a specific minimum wage. Indeed, Mr. Jack Dromey, a recent contender for the leadership of the Transport and General Workers Union, has urged the unions

"to campaign to persuade Labour to adopt a minimum wage figure of between £4 and £5 an hour before the election."

No one is better placed to persuade Labour than Mr. Dromey. He is, after all, the husband of Labour's shadow Employment Secretary. Perhaps I should call him Mr. Harman in politically correct circles. One can imagine the pillow talk in the Harman household. After a hard day's campaigning in the Labour movement, he returns to the household and says to his spouse, "Couldn't we be united for £4 or £5 an hour?", at which Mrs. Dromey turns away with a sigh: "These numbers give me a headache—you'll have to wait until after the election."

The fact is that the Labour party is refusing to answer the questions that any honest party should answer if it is to come clean with the electorate—

Ms Harman: The right hon. Gentleman is giving me a headache now.

Mr. Lilley: That is not so much of a problem in my case. I fear that none of the blandishments from people in the Labour party, least of all from Mr. Harman, will work. The Opposition are in retreat, on this issue as on so many others, at least until the next election. They have retreated on nationalisation, and changed clause IV. They have retreated on tax, and abandoned John Smith's plans. They have retreated on nuclear weapons and on trade union reform, and they are retreating here because we are winning the arguments.

It is a tactical retreat, however. The right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) has adopted the tactics of the man who walked backwards into a cinema in the hope that the attendant in the box office would think that he was leaving. But I believe that the electorate will see what the Opposition are up to and will realise that this is only a temporary retreat.

The Labour party offers new rhetoric for old policies. Scratch the soundbites and we find the politics of envy posing as egalitarianism, a job-destroying minimum wage masquerading as help for the low-paid, and a policy that will deepen dependency pretending to be an offer of help to those coming off the dole. By contrast, we offer a hand up as well as a handout, opportunity instead of envy and the chance for people to gain their first experience of the workplace. The debate offers a welcome chance for the electorate to compare the cynical politics of the Opposition with the practical policies that we, the Government, spell out day after day.

4.59 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): In his closing words, the Secretary of State spoke about the electorate's views on the debate. If my constituents had been able to listen to the right hon. Gentleman's speech—it contained the cheapness that we expect of the person who made a xenophobic speech at a recent Conservative party conference, and did not fall below his usual level but kept up to that which we expect—they would have been left bewildered and dismayed but with the knowledge that the Secretary of State is the man who is responsible for their having to survive day after day in grinding and hopeless poverty.

I represent tens of thousands of people who live in great poverty. I represent many thousands who are unemployed. That the Secretary of State should make a debating speech based on stale statistics when my constituents are looking to Parliament for some hope and some salvation tells us why the Government are running out of time and why they will be rejected by the electorate as soon as it has an opportunity to do so.

My constituents live in terrible poverty. Of the 634 constituencies in Great Britain, Gorton is No. 35 when it comes to unemployment. Male unemployment is 21.8 per cent., which is more than double the national average. Overall unemployment is 15.5 per cent., which is almost double the national average. In Gorton, 38 per cent. of the unemployed have been unemployed for more than a year and 35 per cent. of the unemployed are under 25 years of age. Youth unemployment in parts of my constituency reaches 47 per cent. The Government respond to that situation with the cheap and facile remarks that were made by the Secretary of State.

People are desperate for a job; when they get a one, they have to live as the victims of their employers. I wrote to a Secretary of State for Employment about one of my constituents who is a security guard. He works 64 hours one week and 72 the next. He is paid no overtime and is not permitted to join a trade union to get the protection that it could offer. His employer reduced his hourly pay from £3.02 to £2.35. I wrote to the then Secretary of State for Employment and asked what recourse my constituent had in that appalling predicament. He was working all the hours God sent, yet saw his pay reduced.

The then Secretary of State wrote to tell me that the man could resign his job. That would have been extremely useful, bearing in mind that he lives in a constituency in which about a quarter of the males are unemployed. He would not have had much hope of other employment. Furthermore, if he had taken that course, he would not have been eligible for the benefit that comes when a job is lost involuntarily. That was the studied advice of the Government to one of my constituents who was being exploited by his employer, as so many of my constituents are.

Many of my constituents live in poverty that it is fair and accurate to describe as abject. A third of the population of Manchester has to have recourse to income support; my constituency is poorer than the Manchester average. In Manchester, 43.7 per cent. of households rely on housing benefit, which is one of the indices of poverty. On that index, Manchester is the poorest city in the country. My constituents are poorer than the people of Manchester as a whole. The proportion of them who live on housing benefit is even higher than the 43.7 per cent. in Manchester.

In Manchester, 24.8 per cent. of children have to have free school meals. As I have said, my constituents are poorer as a whole. Thirty per cent. of households in Manchester have lone parents with children. Indeed, 29 per cent. of the children in the city live in that circumstance. How are those women—overwhelming they are women—to survive? How are they to get jobs in an area of extremely high unemployment? How are they to bring up their children in a way that will keep them off drugs, off the streets and out of crime? How are they to achieve all that when they are living in a literally hopeless situation?

I read in the newspapers this morning that the Secretary of State is to conduct a drive against bogus applications for social security benefits. My constituents are as firmly against bogus applications for social security benefits as anyone else. It would be a good idea if the Secretary of State also conducted a drive to ensure that honest people who are truly eligible for benefits knew how to get them and were assisted to get them.

Some of my elderly constituents are being deprived of benefits. Although we try to tell them that benefits are available, the Government do not make a determined effort to let them know what they can get. A couple in the Fallowfield area of my constituency—they are both aged 85—do not receive income support. The wife receives the higher rate of attendance allowance. Their joint pensions amount to £119.06. It was found that, because they were not aware of the benefits for which they could apply, they were worse off by £51.65 a week. It would be a good idea for the Secretary of State to do something positive and determined to ensure that such people receive the benefits to which they are entitled. In all conscience, the benefits are not very large, even when they are increased.

An 87-year-old woman in the Gorton area of my constituency has never claimed income support because she has "been frightened to". I quote her words. What sort of Government are we living under when an 87-year-old woman is frightened to apply for a benefit for which she qualifies? She has been living on £59.49 a week. It transpired that, if she had been properly advised by the Benefits Agency, she could have been receiving another £75.76 a week.

A couple in Levenshulme in my constituency have been living on £118 a week. When investigations took place, it was found that that couple could get their benefits increased by £57.60 a week.

Why do not the Government go out of their way to try to assist people in that position? Why do not they try to introduce a culture of benefit in which a woman in her 80s is not afraid to apply for the benefit to which she is entitled?

I understand that the Secretary of State is—I agree with him on this—opposed to the introduction of an identity card, but in Cabinet he is arguing for the introduction of an identity card for people on benefit. I beg him not to proceed. If he does, he will codify for ever the fact that we have two nations—those who are on benefit, and those who are not. We would have inferiors and superiors, based not on merit or virtue but circumstances and misfortune. It would be a very black day if we were to separate our constituents, whatever our party, into two groups.

Because of the poverty in my constituency and because of unemployment—and not because of a dependency culture but because of a need for benefit, which does not prevent people from living in poverty—we have health problems of which those who live in and who represent the more affluent parts of the country are simply unaware.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it would be entirely appropriate for people to be given as much information as possible so that they can claim the appropriate benefit, but would not the suggested card go a long way towards meeting that desire? If people have the card, it would be up to the appropriate authority to ensure that people received the benefits to which they were entitled. I thought that that was the argument.

Mr. Kaufman: Let us take the 87-year-old woman who was frightened to apply. I do not know what good a card would do for her, or is the hon. Gentleman saying that everyone on a retirement pension should have a smart card? If everybody on a retirement pension was, therefore, regarded as an inferior member of the community, millions of pensioners would rise up in anger against the suggestion.

I shall, for a moment, consider health in the city of Manchester. As everybody knows, poor health often derives from poverty. The poverty and ill-health indices of the wards in our city correlate. In our city, the incidence of an array of illnesses and diseases is far higher than it is in the country as a whole. If England and Wales is an index of 100, the incidence of ischaemic heart disease in Manchester is 161 for males and 173 for females. For lung cancer, it is 214 for males and 204 for females. For cerebrovascular disease, it is 186 for males and 144 for females.

The mortality ratios in the city for all causes, remembering that the national average is 100, is 163 for men and 148 for women. If babies and infants in Manchester had the same experience as the average for England and Wales, the total number of still births and deaths in the first year of life would be 75 instead of 104—nearly 30 more. If one takes the weight of children at birth, which is a strong index of poverty, one finds that 6.7 per cent. of children born in England and Wales weigh less than 2,500 g. In the city of Manchester, the figure is 9 per cent. In the Gorton, South ward in my constituency, it is 9.8 per cent. In the Levenshulme ward it is 10.71 per cent. In the Rusholme ward it is 10.29 per cent.

Those are all indices of poverty. They are indices of women who are fighting to get a decent diet, fighting to survive, and giving birth to babies who are smaller than the average and thus subject to a greater risk of ill health—if they survive at all.

Poverty has an effect on childhood mortality rates in the city of Manchester. The rate of perinatal mortality in England and Wales is 7.5 per cent. In Manchester, it is 9.9 per cent. The rate of still births in England and Wales is 4.2 per cent. In Manchester, it is 6.4 per cent. The rate of infant mortality in England and Wales is 6.5 per cent. In Manchester, it is 8.4 per cent. It is important that I repeat that, by and large, the figures for my constituency are worse than those for the city that I represent.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman, who speaks feelingly on behalf of his constituents, for giving way. Is he aware that international research material, assembled and reported on by Richard Wilkinson of Sussex university, demonstrates that societies in which there are greater inequalities of income experience worse indices of ill health and early mortality than societies in which the income differentials are less wide, and that the kind of poverty that he is describing is detrimental to the interests and, indeed, the health of us all?

Mr. Kaufman: I am deeply concerned, as anybody who represents and lives among the people about whom I am talking must be, as there is not just the problem, the sadness, the desolation of individual poverty and suffering, but the loss to the country because of what is happening.

I shall give an example of what my constituents have to put up with, to demonstrate to the House that what happens in Gorton and elsewhere in Manchester is not an accident but a consequence. It is a consequence of the unemployment, of the low income. It is a consequence of inadequate medical provision. We have in my constituency the Gorton medical centre. It operates from something that scouts would be ashamed to use as a hut. It has been condemned as unfit by the Health and Safety Executive. The doctors in the medical centre have put forward a plan for its rehabilitation, which would cost £150,000. So far, that money has not been made available. I have had discussions and correspondence with the right hon. Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley), who has just ceased to be Secretary of State for Health, and nothing whatever has been done to put it right.

There are 9,000 people on the patient lists of the Gorton medical centre. I have visited it on a number of occasions. The waiting room is so small that there is not room for everybody to sit or even to get in. Pensioners, pregnant women and women with babies have to stand, or even to stand outside in the street. We need £150,000 and the money is not coming, yet in March the High Court found that the very family health services authority that is refusing to provide the money had unlawfully spent £250,000 on employing what it calls eight facilitators. The authority has broken the law and it has wasted £250,000—way beyond the amount needed to put the medical centre into decent condition.

I have not only written but spoken to the previous Secretary of State for Health about this, yet almost four months after the High Court found that the money had been unlawfully spent, nothing has been done either to put the matter right or to penalise the people who broke the law just as much as muggers and other criminals break the law. Some £100,000 more than we need for my medical centre has been wasted, and nothing has been done about it. It is all very well for the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, the hon. Member for Monmouth (Mr. Evans), to smirk. I hope that if he had such a situation in his constituency, he would raise the matter on the Floor of the House. As a junior Minister, he sits smirking at a matter that is extremely important to 9,000 of my constituents and their families.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Roger Evans): The right hon. Gentleman's comment that ultra vires acts were akin to mugging was surely slightly fanciful, or will he now extend such condemnation to, for example, the Clay Cross councillors?

Mr. Kaufman: I did condemn the Clay Cross councillors when I was a Minister in a Labour Government. When we introduced a Bill indemnifying certain councillors who had refused to apply the Housing Finance Act 1972, I excluded Clay Cross councillors because I did not believe that they were worthy of indemnification. The sniggering and cheap little Minister is wrong in his sniggering, cheap little intervention in my speech, in which I am talking about decent people who want decent health care.

There are other aspects of poverty in my constituency. We now have no local authority public housing programme, and private sector housing has halved, so we have people living in appallingly poor accommodation. We have people who, as a result, find that their marriages are being broken up. We have people who, as a result, are having to move out of the area and to apply for accommodation under the homelessness provisions which, under this Government, are turning some people into millionaires. We do not have much growth industry in my constituency, but the one growth industry that we do have is homelessness. We have people who are taking money from public funds and using it to grow rich out of the misery of people who cannot find a decent home.

This debate is about differences in life styles and about differences in life chances. My constituents are deeply deprived of the chances in life that would enable them not only to live contented, fulfilled lives, but to make a contribution to the country. Let us be clear about this. My people in Gorton are as richly talented as anybody else in the country. They have an ability to contribute to this country just as much as the constituents of Ministers and, when they are given the opportunity, they make that contribution. I have people who have set up a company that has developed an invention in which they are interesting major companies. They are doing their best. I have a teenage Asian constituent who has won a film-making prize and who will, I hope, make his way in the film industry.

My constituents have a great history of contribution to the national economy. If one goes to the railway museum at York, one sees superb, gleaming locomotives which have on them plates saying "Made in Gorton". Locomotives cannot be made in Gorton now because there are no suitable factories—in fact, we have few factories of any kind. It would be tragic not only for my constituents, but for the country, if the people who sent me to Parliament were not able to make in future the contribution to the country's prosperity and liveliness that they have been able to make in the past.

I devote myself to these issues to a large degree because my heart breaks when I meet people at advice bureaux and when I meet people in the street and see what lives of desperation and desolation so many of them live. I regard it as my function, in so far as I have a function of any relevance, to come to the House to speak for the people whom I represent. I shall continue to do so until we have a Government who put them first.

Sir Michael Neubert (Romford): The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) has painted a bleak picture of the constituency and the city that he represents. As the House knows, I am a London Member; I have lived and worked in or around London all my life. I cannot judge whether the right hon. Gentleman's picture of Manchester is accurate because I do not know that city as well as I know my own. I can say that it must be a dispiriting experience for the right hon. Gentleman as he prepares to retire from the House and to enjoy a leisurely—

Mr. Kaufman: I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's kind words. However, I have been chosen as candidate for the next election. The boundaries of my constituency are completely unchanged and I had a majority of 16,279 at the previous election. I have, therefore, a reasonable hope of being returned at the next election.

Sir Michael Neubert: Talk of retirement may have been a result of hope rather than actuality. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on his good fortune; he will be here for a few years more. None the less, it must be dispiriting, after his many years of service to the House and to his constituents, that things should be so bad in his constituency. He must ask himself how the situation has come about. It cannot be accepted that it has come about as a result of 16 years of Conservative Government and that no part has been played by local government in creating the culture that the right hon. Gentleman has so vividly described.

I also find it extremely difficult to judge by individual cases, such as the lady whom the right hon. Gentleman mentioned, who was frightened of applying for income support. He gave no explanation of why the lady should be frightened. I have never come across such a person. We have a substantial welfare state to provide for people in need, as this lady obviously was. What I have found among the older generation is a residue of the spirit of self-reliance and independence which sometimes persuades elderly people that they should not claim from the state even though they are entitled to do so. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman has educated the lady about her entitlements and rights and that he has dissuaded her from believing that she should not claim money to which she is entitled. I believe that it is a misnomer to say that she is frightened and that it is a slur on our social security system.

I also speak as someone who finds it hard to believe in the right hon. Gentleman's remedy. The only remedy he offered was to embrace and to continue to support the Labour party which, if anything, promises to aggravate the situation he has described rather than to reverse it. As I shall explain, there are two important aspects of employment policy with which the Labour party would threaten the existing level of employment in Manchester. We agree on one thing—that the relative degree of poverty is closely associated with unemployment—so anything that increases unemployment in Manchester would be a disaster. I believe that that is the direction in which the Labour party is heading.

I comment on one or two aspects of employment policy as chairman—perhaps I should say former chairman—of the Conservative Back-Bench employment committee. When I saw the outrage with which the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) greeted the announcement of the Government's decision to change the structure of the Department of Employment and to merge it with the Department for Education—on Thursday, he called it a "blazing scandal"—I was wryly amused.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): I shall say so tonight as well.

Sir Michael Neubert: I am sure that, as the hon. and learned Gentleman says, he will make a similar case tonight.

The motion refers to the Government as having

"brought insecurity to millions of people."

That motion should be resisted. It must be conceded that the career prospects of one or two people—such as the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West and the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman)—have received a setback, and that would not be the first career setback in the Harman household in recent weeks.

The merging of the Department of Employment with the Department for Education is a rational and logical development, as employment and education are natural allies. Some years ago, the historian Corelli Barnett made the point that this country had not placed as great an emphasis on vocational education as other countries in Europe, and that is certainly true. In bringing the functions of employment services and education together, we can provide the greatly needed bridge between vocational and academic qualifications.

Unfortunately, in the 1970s, some teachers—although not all—were the worst possible advisers for their pupils. They said, "Look at the world. There are millions of people out of work. What is the point in working for exams?" However, the opposite is the case. When there is a high level of unemployment, skills are very much in demand, and the higher the level of skill, the better the chance one has of employment. Those few teachers who advised their pupils in that way did them a grave disservice and betrayed them. Qualifications will be increasingly important in getting a job. The merger has underlined and reinforced that point.

I hope that the merger will result in greater public understanding of the connection between qualifications and getting a job, as that would be of great benefit to Britain. Changing technology requires continuous education, and I very much welcome the change of the structure of government. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment is the ideal person to bridge the two worlds. With her experience in both Departments, she will make a great success of her new post in the Government. I wish her the very best of luck.

The Opposition motion states that the Government's policies have "widened social division". There are divisions in this country, an important one being the division between those in work and those out of work. Like my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who opened the debate, I am astonished that the Labour party has chosen this wide theme for an Opposition Supply day. The debate enables us to point to the Government's success in reducing unemployment by 660,000 since 1992, while at the same time giving us a chance to point to the Opposition's policies, which would have the opposite effect. The Opposition's policies of adopting the social chapter and a national minimum wage would increase unemployment.

The Opposition amazingly have given the Government an opportunity to speak on the theme where they score well, as well as allowing us to concentrate on the area where the Opposition are weakest and most vulnerable—the threat to employment embodied in the social chapter and the national minimum wage. Like anyone in life, I believe in taking the opportunities that are offered, and I should like to speak on some aspects of the matter.

The Government—almost uniquely in Europe—have achieved success in reducing unemployment. I have mentioned the figures since 1992, and unemployment has fallen in nearly every month for almost three years now. That is a greatly encouraging trend. There are fewer people claiming unemployment benefit in this country than in any other major European country. Similarly, 69 per cent. of adults in this country have jobs, and that is more than in any other major European country.

There is a wide range of schemes to assist the long-term unemployed, and we can all agree that they are probably the most serious problem. When Social Affairs

Commissioner Papandreou came to the House two or three years ago, one of the things that she said which impressed itself upon me was that, out of the then 17 million unemployed in Europe—an enormous number, which has now increased to 20 million—35 per cent. were thought never to have had a job. That is a serious social scourge that faces this country, but not this country alone.

The suggestion has not been made so far in the debate that the rising rate of unemployment in Europe is due to the recession that has affected Europe and the rest of the world. The Opposition have suggested that, in some way, the Conservative Government were uniquely responsible for the high levels of unemployment in Europe. We know that the reverse is true, and that this country is making greater headway in employment than other comparable countries. Our unemployment is now two percentage points below the average for Europe.

Anyone without a job can have greater confidence about his prospects under this Government than he could possibly have if a Labour Government were to be elected at the next general election. All of this success would be at risk following the election of a Labour Government. Progress has been made possible by our flexible labour market, which would no longer be in place if we were to opt back into the social chapter. The opt-out negotiated at Maastricht made the United Kingdom, in the words of Jacques Delors—someone whose advice the Labour party has been quick to take on previous occasions—a "paradise for inward investment". So it has proved.

During Welsh questions this afternoon, we heard a list of investments in Wales which have come about as a result of the prospects in this country. The recovery that we are making from this particular recession is an economic recovery, based not on an artificial boom in house prices but on investment and manufacturing exports. That provides a sound basis for continuing and solid prosperity.

There are now changing patterns of employment. We are able to reflect those work practices because we are not saddled with the obligations of the social chapter, which are proving to be such a burden in other countries with whom we compete for world markets. As we are not saddled with the social chapter, we can adapt our employment needs to the work available and to the markets in which we have a share.

Deregulation is one of the major themes of the Government, and easing the burdens on business is vital, but both the Labour and Liberal Democrat parties would opt back into the social chapter if they had the chance, as they both favour—with differing degrees of enthusiasm—a national minimum wage.

Before I develop the subject of the minimum wage, I shall deal with that of the long-term unemployed. Somebody in the debate should put on record those schemes that are available to them. That long list includes the training for work scheme, the jobfinders grant, the 1-2-1 scheme—which has been extended nationally from April 1995—and workwise, or worklink in Scotland, which offers 38,000 places. There is the long-established system of jobclubs and jobplan workshops, and the job interview guarantee programme, which was piloted in inner city areas, has been expanded to every area in the country.

The restart programme helps people who have been unemployed for more than two years to build motivation and self-confidence. Community action helps the longer-term unemployed—those out of work for 12 months or more—back into work through part-time work experience. The workstart pilot scheme provides subsidies to employers who recruit a person who has been unemployed for two years. Finally, employment on trial is available for people who wish to try out new lines of work. It means that a person who has been out of work for at least six months who takes a job but chooses to leave it between the first six and 12 weeks will not, when making a benefit claim, be disqualified for unemployment benefit, and will not have his income support affected.

That is a wide-ranging programme of special measures to help the long-term unemployed, and the Government should be congratulated on targeting that need and on their ability to see it through.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East): One listens with interest to the list that the hon. Gentleman is reading, and it is worth having it on the record. Is it not also worth having on the record the fact that in many constituencies—including my own—the ratio of jobseekers to vacancies during the period in office of this Government has been of the order of 20 or 30 to one? In my constituency, there are still 15 males wanting work for every vacancy that is available to them. Is not a precondition of those schemes that there must be a job at the end of the training period? Is it not important that such frustrations are not felt and that people do not find that, having gone through the course, there are no vacancies for them to go to?

Sir Michael Neubert: Yes, those people who had trained and qualified to take on such a job would be acutely frustrated if there were no jobs to go to. Figures show that a high percentage achieve work as a result of the schemes, which are very practical. As the Secretary of State said, we are concerned not so much with numbers as with the outcome—people gaining employment—and we must remember that employment is rising and is at a high level.

There will be some pockets of unemployment. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) is beginning to sound like the right hon. Member for Gorton when describing another major British city. One must examine the reason for such pockets and how they can best be helped. The Government certainly do not lack the will or the resources to deal with problems that are European in character and worldwide in origin in many cases. At the end of the 20th century, finding work for everyone who wants it is a major problem, but the hon. Gentleman could do one thing to assist the employment position in his constituency—he could abandon his party's commitment to a national minimum wage. If things are bad now, without question such a wage would make them worse.

To me, it is common sense that, if a person is to be priced into work, there will be a level at which employing them is affordable. Above that level, the employer could not afford to provide the service or make the goods to create employment for that person. The national minimum wage would, therefore, set a limit on the number of people who could be employed.

Mr. MacShane: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Michael Neubert: I had started to mine a profitable seam, but I will give way.

Mr. MacShane: I am grateful, and perhaps I will open up a new seam for the hon. Gentleman. In that case, why does every European country that has a national minimum wage—we are not talking about the United States—show a fall in unemployment equal to, or greater than, the fall in this country?

Sir Michael Neubert: I am not sure that that is the case. My argument is based first on common sense, but I will give the House some figures that might interest the hon. Gentleman, with his European perspective.

One thing that concerns me about the national minimum wage is the effect that it would have on the young. This is not a matter of argument between the parties. It would bear disproportionately on those starting out on their working lives. At present, youth unemployment is 16.5 per cent. in the United Kingdom, but it is 23 per cent. in France and 38 per cent. in Spain, wnich both have a national minimum wage.

I am not sure whether Opposition Members are arguing against the impact of such a wage on employment. If they are, I must quote their leader, who said in The Independent on 27 June 1991:

"Econometric models indicate a potential jobs impact."

That is a roundabout way of saying that jobs would be lost as a result of the introduction of a national minimum wage.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): That depends on the level at which it is set.

Sir Michael Neubert: The bone of contention between the parties is that the Labour party refuses to state at what level it would be. It amazes me that Labour is so reticent on that point; it was not in its manifesto in 1992. Then, the Labour party was prepared to put a figure to the minimum wage, which was to be set at £3.40 an hour. "Opportunity Britain", which was Labour's final policy review document before the last general election, said that the wage would start at 50 per cent. of median male earnings, increasing to two thirds the median male hourly rate.

What has changed since? That was only three years ago. The Labour party lost the election and has correctly concluded that, by stating a level for the minimum wage and allowing others to calculate the job losses as a consequence, it lost the election and it will not do the same again. If Labour Members think that they will get away with going into another general election and facing the British people with an unknown quantity of job losses, they are mistaken.

Let me spell out what it would mean if we adopted the wage at the levels suggested in 1992. A minimum wage set at half median male earnings, with only a half restoration of differentials, would cost 800,000 jobs, which more than offsets the progress that we have made in reducing unemployment since 1992—the 660,000 reduction that we have achieved in that time. With full restoration of differentials, 1.6 million people would lose their jobs. Incidentally, my sources are Employment Department economists. A minimum wage set at two thirds of the median male hourly rate, with half restoration of differentials, could cost 1.3 million jobs and, with full restoration, that figure could rise to more than 2 million. Those are huge numbers. People's lives and livelihoods are in question but the Labour party refuses to come clean about the level of job losses, which is unacceptable.

In case Labour Members argue that there would not be an attempt to impose differentials, I can cite both Eric Hammond on 17 June 1991 and Bill Jordan on 10 April of that year saying that their unions would oppose any squeeze of differentials. We know that that would be the case. If hon. Members think that 1991 is too far back and that things have changed since then, one has only to refer to Denis Healey again, who made it plain that a minimum wage would become a floor on which a new tower of differentials would be built.

Labour party politicians are not prepared to say what they would like the national minimum wage to be, but others are not so reticent. We have already heard the view of the husband of the hon. Member for Peckham that it should be between £4 and £5 per hour. I believe that I am right in saying that Bill Morris of the Transport and General Workers Union today advocated that the Labour party set it at £4.15 per hour. We are told that a minimum wage set at £4 an hour—not £4.15 or up to £5 as Mr. Dromey would wish—would cost 900,000 jobs with only half restoration of differentials and 1.7 million jobs with full restoration.

Those matters are very serious, both for those in, and those out of, work. It will go against their interests if the Labour party is prepared to adopt such a policy and risk so many hundreds of thousands of people being out of work. The Opposition double the offence by not being prepared to say openly what they intend to do.

Unfortunately, a previous engagement will prevent me from being here for the summing up. I apologise in advance, but I promise that I will make that absence good by reading Hansard tomorrow. When I do, I hope that I come across a statement by a Labour Member of what the national minimum wage will be. Until we have that figure and know precisely the Opposition's policy, that policy will be regarded as humbug and hypocrisy, because they will be claiming to reverse the trends of recent years, yet pursuing headlong a policy that will aggravate the problem rather than improve it.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Will my hon. Friend have a bet with me that, when he looks at Hansard tomorrow, he will find that no Labour Member has given a figure? I bet that no one will do it.

Sir Michael Neubert: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I will not engage in that gamble. Like him, I suspect that I shall be disappointed, but the British people should know what the national minimum wage would be if it were introduced by a Labour Government because British jobs will be at risk from such Labour policy.

5.48 pm

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): The heart of this debate is the need for the Government to concentrate their energy on promoting employability, trying to tackle long-term unemployment and trying to stem the tide of poverty.

The evidence of poverty in Britain is stark. We can bandy arguments about all night long if we want to, quoting one report or statistic against another, but by the most widely accepted definition of poverty—those with less than half the per capita income—the numbers who fall within the poverty threshold have almost tripled since 1979. That is a fact.

We can argue about figures that confirm or do not confirm widening social division. We can argue about whether the poorest tenth of households have suffered a 17 per cent. reduction in real disposable income, excluding housing costs, since 1979; and we can argue about whether the richest tenth's real disposable income has risen by 62 per cent.; but the real point is that a large number of families are trapped in that lowest decile, and are increasingly dependent on benefits.

Most hon. Members would agree that the overall conclusion of the Government's statistics is that the poverty gap is widening. It is important to recognise that poverty and unemployment are inextricably linked. The proportion of unemployed individuals with less than half the average income has increased in the past 16 years from about half those who are unemployed in 1979 to nearly three quarters in 1991—the latest figures that I have.

The implications—for example, the cost of family credit, which has more than doubled in the past four years from some £425 million to £1 billion—are a cause for great concern to politicians. The fact that the social security budget is now nearly £90 billion—one third of all Government expenditure—must be a cause for concern when we think about how to tackle unemployment and reduce poverty.

The Secretary of State, who is unfortunately no longer here, was right to point out recently that those who depend on benefit—some 40 per cent. of British households—do not live comfortably, courtesy of the state. Policies aimed at withdrawing entitlement without first putting in place measures that will free those who are trapped in poverty by developing skills and directing investment where it will promote employability can only deepen poverty and social divisions.

The Secretary of State was right to be concerned about the spiralling cost of benefits. Increasing benefits alone cannot reduce poverty, but will increase benefit dependency, a scourge in our society, where people now find that living on benefit is an easier way to make their lives work than getting into employment and earning a wage on which they can live. Furthermore, for those on poverty wages, increasing benefits offers unscrupulous employers an opportunity to drive wages down even further.

I think that I am right to say that the Government recently claimed that the abolition of wages councils led to pay increases. I challenge that claim, because the Government's evidence was based on a small and selective sample.

A more detailed analysis shows that the wage rises that the Government quoted relate to the retail sector only, and that in the year following abolition, pay rates fell in real terms by over 7 per cent. in the clothing manufacturing industry, nearly 6 per cent. in restaurants, and over 5 per cent. in hotels. We should look more deeply into the matter. Evidence in the new earnings survey, which is based on a far larger sample, shows that wages fell in nearly all ex-wages council sectors.

There is clear evidence from advertisements in jobcentres that the abolition of the wages councils has caused a downward pressure on pay rates. A third of all vacancies in wages council sectors not covered in the surveys quoted in the statistics were on offer at rates below the previous relevant wages council rates. We must challenge the concept that abolishing the wages councils has led to a growth in jobs. Lower wages have not translated into a growth in jobs. The yearly net increase in full-time equivalent jobs has fallen from some 18,000 in the year before the abolition of the wages councils to only 8,000 in the following year.

The Government have ignored the warnings given at the time by both workers and employers' representatives alike that the abolition of wages councils would lead to instability in the labour market. There is clear evidence that the result has been to force down already low wages, driving more people into the poverty trap and allowing unscrupulous employers to gain advantage over employers who treat their workers reasonably.

We seem to be having an on-going national debate, both within and outside the House, on the benefits or otherwise of a statutory minimum wage. This is a good opportunity to try to clarify policy objectives and see how one can rein in the worst excesses of the labour market.

I hope that both sides of the House will enter into the spirit of a debate that attempts to find some truth rather than merely trot out dogma. There are as many expert opinions as studies on the benefits or otherwise of legislating for a floor under low wages. Ministers will be familiar with every dotted "i" and crossed "t" of at least 26 studies undertaken since 1981, which provide politicians with every opportunity to cherry-pick the conclusions that happen to suit their particular dogma.

A good example was the Treasury economic models, which were commissioned by the Government and which led them to claim that a national minimum wage would cause job losses of 2 million—provided that the national minimum wage chosen was two thirds of the median wage. As was said earlier in this debate, one can choose a national minimum wage rate and measure the amount of unemployment that it would cause. It is a question of how it is treated and of treating it sensibly.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (Surrey, East): The hon. Gentleman appears to be in danger of falling into the old Liberal trap of straddling the fence. Why can he not give unequivocal support to the words of the leader of his party, who, in a speech last July, said:

"A national minimum wage would increase rigidities in an economy that we should be making more flexible; generate wage-push inflation; and force many onto the dole"?

Mr. Chidgey: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. I trust that he does not see me as an old Liberal, although I may be a little more middle-aged than some of my colleagues. I shall deal with his point a little later in my speech. I expected it to be asked, and I look forward to giving him an answer that will, I hope, satisfy him.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise to the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) for interrupting his speech, but it has just come to my attention that, during Welsh questions this afternoon, the Secretary of State for Wales, referring to me when I was not present in the Chamber, made a remark that is completely untrue. I have checked it with Hansard, and he said:

"She contacted my office this morning to say which question she wanted to ask before she was ordered to withdraw it."

What protection does an hon. Member have against such a false statement? This matter will concern my constituents and my Welsh colleagues who were boycotting Welsh questions this afternoon. I think that the Secretary of State should come to the Chamber and retract that misleading and untrue statement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): That is not really a point of order for the Chair. The hon. Lady will be aware that Ministers and hon. Members are responsible for their own speeches and remarks. Had the Secretary of State been informed of the point of order that the hon. Lady intended to raise, he would probably have been in a position to confirm, deny or withdraw his remarks. It is a matter for him to decide.

Mr. Chidgey: May I gather my thoughts after that point of order, and return to the issue of a national minimum wage?

I seem to recall that, in rejecting a call for a national minimum wage, the last—or should I say late?—Employment Secretary recently called for Britain to "enhance its competitive edge by creating products which owe more to human knowledge than to human muscle, as the basis of our prosperity in an increasingly competitive world."

I could not agree more, but, at the lower end of the scale, how are we to explain to junior hairdressers, assistant hospital porters, waitresses and all those on poverty wages how they can bring added value to their tasks as part of the export drive? In the interests of social justice, it is time for a pragmatic approach that targets those on poverty wages, who are supported, all too often, by state benefits.

We need a policy of flexible minimum hourly rates which will lift the poorest out of poverty without causing inflation and unemployment. However, we also need to recognise the wider issue of improving, or at least maintaining, living standards, which depends primarily on increasing the skill levels of the work force and providing the added value vital to improve our competitiveness.

A low pay commission such as the Liberal Democrats have proposed could be created to recommend a regionally varied minimum hourly rate across the whole economy, in consultation with representatives of employers, employees and the local authorities. The level of a minimum hourly rate is, of course, the key factor, and one that has, as we have seen, left Labour purists floundering. Our low pay commission would use as a yardstick the average level of the former wages council rates, uprated as appropriate. That should be the starting point from which, we know from experience, the pressure on employment and inflation can be suppressed.

I shall deal with the events of the past week or so at the Department of Employment. The Opposition are greatly concerned that the decision to scrap the Department provides little or no comfort to the unemployed, especially the long-term unemployed. At the current rate of decline, the number of long-term unemployed will, sadly, still not have fallen below a million by the year 2000. Rather than dealing with those failures of policies that are supposed to tackle long-term unemployment, the Department of Employment has been subsumed in a variety of other Departments. It is a cause for concern to hon. Members as well as to those who are suffering from long-term unemployment.

Nearly half the long-term unemployed on the training for work scheme remain unemployed some six months after leaving it. Nearly 60 per cent. of all adults leave with no qualification, and two thirds leave with no job. That is a measure of the problem. I know that Ministers have discussed the matter with me across the Floor before.

The Government have set a target of reducing that figure of two thirds to 50 per cent. by 1998. That compounds the failure to invest in high-quality training, to address under-skilling in industry, and, most importantly, to improve the employability of the unemployed.

I am afraid that the Government are setting meagre targets for getting the low-skilled unemployed back into work. They seem to be more interested in short-term cost-cutting than reducing long-term unemployment. While they plan to cut the training budget by some £280 million over the next three years, and slash training for workplaces by 55,000—some 20 per cent. of all places—unemployment among the unqualified shows no signs of falling.

While the Government plan to cut the training budget by £280 million, unemployment costs more than £20 billion a year. It is not surprising that, in the midst of all that, our training and enterprise councils are becoming increasingly hamstrung in their efforts to achieve their objectives. Let me remind the House what those objectives are.

The central mission of the TECs is to act as employer-led bodies for economic regeneration, and that cannot be fulfilled without adequate funding to support local initiatives. To demand that TECs fund initiatives by making surpluses from the training for work programmes is fundamentally flawed. It forces down already inadequate and poor-quality training, and is forcing out business representatives, who are becoming increasingly disillusioned by stagnant policies that stifle their imagination. Instead of slashing training budgets, the moneys should be redirected into improving training quality and targeting long-term unemployment.

I have said before that the workstart pilots promoted and introduced by the Government have shown potential for providing employers with incentives to take on the long-term unemployed. Instead of linking the schemes to investment and training to provide skills for the unqualified, we have another round of pilot schemes, with the main aim, it would appear, of seeing how much the subsidy for those schemes can be reduced.

There is clear evidence that a benefit transfer scheme that provides both employers and the long-term unemployed with the incentive to invest in skills training would have a major impact on the long-term unemployed. We have long argued the case for benefit transfer schemes to transfer the benefits of the unemployed to employers on a sliding scale for a prescribed period while they are trained to be full-time productive employees who fully justify their wages.

The workstart pilots have underlined the potential for success for a national benefit transfer programme. Sadly, we have been offered only yet another round of pilots, providing some 6,000 places. All the while, unemployment costs the country more than £20 billion a year.

There is an overwhelming case for social justice, which can be achieved by putting a floor under those on poverty wages. We must improve the quality of training if we are going to increase employability, especially for the long-term unemployed. We must start to reduce the skills gap between the United Kingdom and our counterparts. We must be prepared to invest in initiatives to create economic regeneration by investing in our public infrastructure, our schools, our hospitals and our public transport systems.

We will support the motion tonight, not because we endorse or share Labour's ideological basis for a minimum wage, which seems to be the redistribution of income, but because we condemn the Government's complete lack of concern about unemployment.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): I was glad to listen to that thoughtful speech by the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey). It is a pleasure to follow him.

It poses no difficulty for me to agree to the proposition that social division leads to economic underperformance. One has only to recall the last winter of the last Labour Government in 1978-79, which is known in the folklore—and always will be—as the winter of discontent. It saw the final flowering of the policies of the now Lord Healey as Chancellor of the Exchequer—economic policies that were avowedly pursued in a class interest. As he mounted his assault on success, he even brought taxes on savings to a top rate of 93 per cent. Those efforts to govern in a class interest were hardly welcomed by the trade unions at the time. They were at war with the Government and with each other. Our society was in a war of all against all.

Life is very different and very much better in Britain in 1995. Not that we are without our social divisions—I shall come to those—but the divisions in our society are no longer remotely like they once were. There were divisions between the trade unions and the rest. The hierarchs of the CBI and TUC, to coin a phrase, are now at ease with each other and Conservative Members are looking forward to attending the TUC summer party tomorrow evening. It is a happier atmosphere.

The private and public sectors are not divided in the same way. Many public services are now delivered by privatised utilities, by work forces that may be directly employed in the public sector, by private enterprise firms or by people working in the voluntary sector under contract. We have seen a blurring of the old divisions.

However, perhaps the most conspicuous difference is that inflation is now under 3 per cent. and has been for the past 20 months—the best inflation performance for 30 years. It is in great contrast, if I remember correctly, with the average rate of inflation of 15 per cent. under the previous Labour Government. Inflation is the most deeply divisive economic phenomenon.

Mr. MacShane: Will the hon. Gentleman remind us what level the inflation rate reached under Mrs. Thatcher?

Mr. Howarth: We saw inflation rise again. The hon. Gentleman is quite right if the implication of his intervention is that it is at all times necessary for the Government to work to keep inflation low because inflation is such a divisive force. The inflation that we experienced in the 1970s set labour against capital, worker against worker, saver against earner and young against old. It was divisive and deeply damaging economically.

Sir Michael Neubert: This talk of years gone by brings back a memory. Although inflation went up under a Conservative Government, it at no time went above the average in the Labour years, when, if I remember rightly, it rose to 26.9 per cent. at its worst.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend is absolutely right.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has held out a vision to the country of a classless society and a politics of tolerance. We may not yet have entered that promised land but I believe that we have moved a long way. Our society is far less hierarchical and we suffer far less from intolerance and cruel taboos. So long as my party wishes to continue to pursue that destination, I shall travel happily with it.

The Labour party, far from wishing to squeeze the rich until the pips squeak, is apparently concerned to stroke those who are contented so that the pips positively squeak with pleasure. What it has to say to those who are less contented is less clear. That is an important point because there are many who, for good reasons, are less contented.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security has spoken thoughtfully about the dispersion of earnings, and Mr. Will Hutton recently provided a broad description of our society as a 30:30:40 society.

The bottom 30 per cent. of people are marginalised, limping along in and out of work and heavily dependent on benefits. Among them are far too heavily concentrated members of the ethnic minorities, women—especially single mothers—and disabled people who still suffer excessively from discrimination. I welcome my right hon. Friends' introducing legislation in an attempt to reduce that utterly unjustified discrimination.

Another 30 per cent. of people are the insecure. They may be affluent but they are at the same time apprehensive about their future. The other 40 per cent.—the upper reaches—are secure and confident operators in what is increasingly a global labour market. It is they who inherit the earth. Incidentally, I am not entirely sure that it would be appropriate for them to do so without paying some inheritance tax, but that is perhaps a debate for another occasion.

Too many of our fellow citizens live on estates that are effectively ghettos. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) spoke about the experience of some of his constituents, and all of us take very seriously what he had to say about the people who are trapped in joblessness and the housing benefit poverty trap, people who are living in ugly surroundings without amenities and people who are living a life of hopelessness, as the right hon. Gentleman described them.

Seventy-five per cent. of people in local authority or housing association accommodation are among the poorest 20 per cent. of our society. We have had planning policies whereby we have designed and built estates instead of distributing the less advantaged, the less confident and the less capable more extensively. We thus have offensive juxtapositions of wealth and poverty, which may have something to do with the events on the Marsh Farm estate in Luton last week. Certainly there is a brittleness and volatility on those estates, and it behoves us to think carefully to find effective practical policies to improve conditions there.

People living in poverty on such estates experience a far higher incidence of crime, including mugging. Let us be very clear that mugging is a phenomenon associated with poverty and joblessness. If it has also to do with race it is because far too high a proportion of members of our ethnic minorities are poor and without work. I am sure that the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis is well aware of that.

Such estates are especially prone to difficulties with drugs. We need at some point, and perhaps before long, to nerve ourselves to think seriously and constructively about whether it is right to criminalise the use of certain drugs at least and thereby institutionalise alienation from the mainstream of our society.

Too many of our young people are not only without jobs but are disaffected from the political process altogether. One of the most alarming statistics from the most recent general election—it is not a proven statistic but is suggested on a reasonable authority—was that only some 40 per cent. of 18 to 24-year-olds voted. If that was so, it expressed a disaffection from the mainstream of our national life which bodes ill for us in many respects, not least in terms of our parliamentary democracy.

The family is fractured and, while family patterns have changed throughout our social history, we should be especially concerned about the number of children living in poverty and the increasing numbers of children taken into care and excluded from school.

We are not as yet one nation. Whether hon. Members are one nation Conservatives or one nation socialists—we need not detain ourselves too long today with the definition of those respective political species, or whatever may be the distinction between them—as we observe the social pathology that I have sketched, we can all agree that what is needed is a politics of healing; a politics to allay the insecurities and aggression in our society; a politics to reduce and bring to an end social exclusion; and a politics that gives priority to those who are least fortunate, the chronically unemployed, the homeless and the beggars on our streets who are a shame and a reproach to us.

Mr. David Nicholson: Does my hon. Friend agree that the way in which most of the national press treated the political issues raised by the recent leadership contest in the Conservative party shows how distant most of the scribblers are from the concerns that he is raising? Is not that a problem in itself?

Mr. Howarth: I agree. The debate was trivialised, and it is regrettable that it should have been so.

The British public are not out and out egalitarians but they have a strongly felt sense of fairness. They believe that it is the task of Government to hold our society together. They reject the politics of class conflict and the politics of casualisation. I believe that they are deeply uneasy about poverty. Average incomes have indeed risen substantially, and that is a great credit to my right hon. Friends during our long period in Government, but the people at the lower end of the income scale—we can argue whether the figure is 10 per cent. 20 per cent or even 30 per cent.—have not shared in the overall increase in prosperity.

We should consider carefully the condition of 16 and 17-year-olds not eligible for benefit and think carefully about whether it is right to pay a lower rate of income support and jobseeker's allowance to people under 25. I do not believe that my right hon. Friends have been justified in reducing benefit in the transition from invalidity benefit to incapacity benefit, and I am concerned about the reductions in benefit for the unemployed which will be introduced with the jobseeker's allowance.

We also need to consider carefully the condition of people aged over 55. There appears to be a watershed at that age. Beyond the age of 55, all too many of our fellow countrymen find themselves excluded, without opportunities in a range of fields.

My right hon. Friends should take very seriously the outrage that is felt at the avaricious insensitivity of company directors who enjoy the benefit of share options, whose remuneration committees award one another immense pay increases, even as large numbers of their staff are being sacked or placed on zero-hours contracts. The great majority of our fellow countrymen find that deeply offensive.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has indeed condemned it, but I hope that all my right hon. Friends will condemn that style of management and that management ethic. I strongly hope that the Greenbury committee will produce a tough report on all of that, because it should realise that the reputation of private enterprise is at stake.

The British people may grumble about their council tax, but they raise a quiet cheer for the North Yorkshire dinner ladies.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) suggested, perhaps in a sedentary intervention earlier, that widening inequality did not matter. With great respect to him—I hope that he has an opportunity to contribute to the debate later, when he will no doubt make his case—I believe that it does matter.

Excessive inequality affronts everyone's sense of justice, and it is damaging precisely because it does demoralise. People who feel themselves to be the victims of unfairness are less willing, and feel less able, to make their contribution to society. The evil of that is that it transmits itself from generation to generation. It directly affects our economic efficiency and performance.

Mr. Duncan: Will my hon. Friend be any less able and any less willing to serve as a Member of Parliament because the First Secretary of State is so wealthy?

Mr. Howarth: As a Member of Parliament, I am paid £33,000 a year. I am an extremely fortunate person and a very well remunerated member of our society. There is no comparison between my position and the position of those who live in poverty, and we should worry about that.

My hon. Friend is under an illusion if he supposes that widening economic inequality is a price that must be paid for economic progress. We can find plenty of academic evidence that will support me in what I have said. If one considers the performance of the eight south-east Asian economies that grew most rapidly from the 1960s, one finds that rapid growth was accompanied by a narrowing of income differentials.

During the summer, my right hon. and hon. Friends will give much thought to the question whether there should be tax cuts this autumn. If the thought is—I believe that it is only part of what may be in their minds—that cutting taxes, whether on income or capital, would improve incentives, we would deceive ourselves.

It would not be rational, would it, for people to work harder because they found that they were able to take home more income for the same amount of work? I suspect that, where incentives are concerned, the reverse applies—that modest tax increases may provide an incentive, as people would work a little harder and a little longer to make up the shortfall in their income. At all events, I do not believe that we can associate tax cuts with improved economic performance, or that there would be any objective case in terms of the condition of the economy more generally.

Mr. Charles Hendry (High Peak): Can my hon. Friend find a single example—anywhere, ever—of people working harder as a result of an increase in tax rates?

Mr. Howarth: If one tries to assess the way in which people might respond rationally, they are at least as likely to work harder to make up their income if they experience a small tax increase as they are if they experience a modest tax reduction. I would stick to that contention, but I will say—and I do not think that my hon. Friend would reasonably disagree with this at least—that, if we reduce our tax revenues, we shall thereby have less resources available to act to ease the poverty trap and so enable more of our people to do what they wish to do, which is to lift themselves out of poverty, become less dependent on benefits and contribute more to the economy. We shall have less resources for education and we shall have less resources for the health of the nation. All of those are necessary investments in the interests of improving our economic efficiency.

Mr. Nirj Joseph Deva (Brentford and Isleworth): Is my hon. Friend aware of something called the Laffer curve—the S curve—whereby it has been demonstrated repeatedly that, by cutting taxes, the total tax revenue collected by the state Government or national Government has increased, thereby making available more resources for those people who are in need?

Mr. Howarth: I do not know how closely my hon. Friend has studied the history of the Reagan Administration, but he may find that that turned out to be a cruel disappointment. The Laffer curve did not quite curve in the direction that the Administration believed that it would.

Relative poverty has absolute effects. Our task is at least to check the movement towards widening inequality, and preferably to reverse it. We need to underpin incomes. Above all, we need policies—macro-economic as well as micro-economic policies—that are well designed to generate jobs because, if there is a way to solve the crisis of the welfare state, it is above all to get more people into properly paid, sustainable work. I do not underestimate the difficulty of achieving that, but that must be our cardinal object, and it is very much the strategy that my right hon. Friends seek to implement.

My right hon. Friends pin a good deal of faith on in-work benefits. Family credit is now being paid to about 600,000 low-paid workers. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has just announced that he is introducing an earnings top-up benefit. He is wise to begin by introducing that on a pilot basis. If he proves to be right that that new in-work benefit for people without children will enable them to, as he puts it, climb the first rungs of the ladder of employment, we shall all be delighted. I appreciate the arguments for what he sets out to do in terms of flexibility and responsiveness of the labour market and in terms of containing the growth of social security expenditure.

However, if we are to have regionally differentiated benefit—the Secretary of State suggested that in his pilot scheme there should be experiments with that—we must consider what the effects may be on the cohesion of our society. It may be that, especially if such benefits were to be administered by local authorities, it would be a means by which we would enable local communities to feel more responsible for their own members, and we could thereby enhance local cohesion. Whether regionally differentiated benefits would enhance the cohesion of our society as a whole is a different question. We must also consider whether unequal benefits are compatible with equal citizenship.

My broader anxieties about in-work benefits are that they tend to operate as a subsidy to bad employers to cut wages and that, if they encourage low pay, they tend to degrade, not only the lives of those who are low-paid, but their skills, such that our economic performance deteriorates compared with what it might be.

I am agnostic about in-work benefits. It is sensible to have a pilot scheme for a new benefit. We should review all the evidence as we accumulate it, not only for the new top-up earnings benefit but for family credit. However, when we review that, I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will be willing also to review such evidence as may be available on the operation of a minimum wage.

Although hon. Members on both sides of the House have spoken about a minimum wage with strong feelings and honest conviction, there is a shortage of evidence. It is far too important an issue to be appropriate for sloganising, and I hope that, in the forthcoming months and years, we shall be willing to consider carefully both in-work benefits and a minimum wage. I sometimes tease my right hon. Friends by suggesting that the minimum wage is, in a sense, a privatisation of welfare, so they ought not absolutely to set their face against it.

I suspect that in time we will find ourselves with a system of in-work benefits capped by the Treasury, because it will not tolerate the enormous growth in spending on such benefits that will otherwise occur, but complemented by a minimum wage negotiated differentially, region by region and sector by sector. If that has overtones of the 1970s, if it sounds remarkably similar to the corporate state and incomes policy, it may be that originality in policy-making is rarer than modernisers in the Labour party or radicals in the Conservative party may suppose.

I commend the range of initiatives that my right hon. Friends in the Government have developed, including the national insurance holiday for employers who take on long-term unemployed people, the extension of housing benefit, the faster processing of family credit and the back-to-work bonus. Those are all commendable initiatives which I believe will carry advantage with them. Against that background, I remain puzzled and deeply worried about the decision that the Government have taken to reduce the period of eligibility for contributory benefit of unemployed people from 12 months to six. Not only the impoverishing consequences but the disincentive effects of that are plain to see. I find that a strangely perverse policy. However, we have had those debates and the Jobseekers Bill has completed its parliamentary passage.

[Mr. Howarth]

The passage of the Disability Discrimination Bill remains to be completed so let me enter another plea to my right hon. Friends to accept after all that there should be a national disability council with real powers to provide advice right across the country and powers, on those rare occasions when it may be necessary to use them, to enforce the rights of disabled people under the legislation. That would be an extremely worthwhile way, not only to mitigate the social division caused by discrimination, but to improve economic efficiency. We want disabled people to make the fullest contribution that they can to our economy.

I should like to conclude by saying a word or two about education because it is so fundamental to personal opportunity, to the upgrading of our economic competitiveness, to the improvement of the civility of our society and to enabling us to break free of the costs of social failure. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has just introduced an initiative in education for under-fives. She is right to give priority to early learning and to welcome the prospect of innovative public-private partnerships.

We have a choice in the provision of public services and social goods. We can either insist on present patterns of funding, in which case it is inevitable that services will continue to be underfunded, or we can seek to enlist new resources of private finance. We have gone a long way towards doing that in higher education and it is time that we overcame the taboo surrounding the admission of private finance much more extensively into our education system. So I welcome my right hon. Friend's initiative. I have my anxieties about her choice of vouchers as the means to implement the policy. I hope that she will be able to explain in due course how vouchers will not prove an unnecessarily expensive and regressive means of acting on the matter. I hope that she will not close her mind on the possibility of means-testing the voucher or taxing its value in an attempt to offset those effects.

If we are to enlist more private finance within our education system, we must equally move towards restoring the concept of an overarching education service. It is regrettable that the term "opting out" ever became current in our education parlance. The last thing that we needed was to dig new chasms between different parts of our education system. We need bridges and integration. If I was able to do one useful thing when I had the privilege to be an education Minister, it was that I not only continued the expansion of student numbers in higher education but made it possible for the polytechnics to have university status. We need to find better ways to integrate and make more cohesive our education system.

So if, in developing a policy for grant-maintained schools, the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) seeks to ensure that grant-maintained schools are within the fold of the overall education service, that they keep their independence within a publicly-funded education system, that they retain the right to decide for themselves how best to use their funds—a fair share of overall funds—and that nothing is done to deprive them of the vitality that comes from that extra degree of self-government, I wish him well.

It would be extremely interesting to know what the Labour party proposes to do about private schools—what are known most inappropriately as the public schools. It is a great historical misfortune that in the first half of the last century the state failed to provide a public education system. In consequence of that, the newly prosperous middle classes organised themselves. They opted out of whatever the state system might have been. That has been a traumatically divisive experience for us. It continues to undermine the quality of educational experience for 93 per cent. of our nation's children.

In the 1960s, the Labour Government led by Mr. Wilson took a look at the matter. They set up a commission on public schools, but they then shied away from any action. I wonder whether, where Harold Wilson decided not to act, the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) will have the nerve to do anything.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: Does my hon. Friend understand that what he has just said about the quality of education in the state sector is a profound insult to the many thousands of teachers who work in that sector and to the many thousands of people who have been through that sector and succeeded in their lives very well?

Mr. Howarth: I do not agree with my hon. Friend on that. I am the last person who would wish to insult teachers in the state sector. I said that the existence of the independent sector tended to undermine the quality of the education in the maintained sector. I believe that it does so because it effectively means that the parents of 7 per cent. of our children—parents who are particularly successful themselves and ambitious for their children—do not press for higher standards within that system. I willingly pay tribute to the remarkable quality of the work done by the overwhelming majority of teachers, but their task is harder than it would otherwise have been. Of course, if the Labour party were to act on the issue, it would be imperative that it should do nothing to undermine the excellence of the schools in the independent sector. The point is to try to make the public schools genuine public assets.

So I believe that our schools should as far as possible be part of a common system. That is important in the politics of healing to which I referred. It would help us to improve our economy. It would help us to improve the quality of our lives.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): I hope that it will not ruin the future of the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) if I say what an excellent, important and interesting speech he made and that I agreed with the vast majority of it. The last time I said that of a Conservative Member's speech he was making his maiden speech. By tradition, one congratulates a person who makes a maiden speech. It is not a tradition, as the House may know, to congratulate hon. Members on the other side of the House on their speeches.

Because he stationed himself so well for television on the back row where the absence of a doughnut would not be visible, the hon. Gentleman missed seeing the faces of his colleagues while he was speaking. Ministers screwed up their faces in disgust.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I should think so.

Mr. Janner: The hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) concurs. The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan), who departed when he knew that I was getting to my feet, and the whole array of Tory backwoodsmen scrunched up their faces and said, "How can this renegade possibly be sitting on our side of the House?" I, for one, will welcome the hon. Gentleman when he crosses the Floor of the House: the sooner he does so the better.

The hon. Gentleman also put an end to a series of Conservative speeches that reminded me of what the late Ernest Bevin said when I asked him what he thought of a debate that he had just heard. He said, "It was awful: clitch after clitch after clitch." I have never heard such a series of "clitches" as we endured earlier from other Conservative Members. When the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon began to speak, however, the House suddenly woke up. Here was a man who talked of outrage at executive pay, especially in industries and jobs where others were paid less and where services were declining. That is just what the Select Committee on Employment has said.

At this point, let me pay tribute to a Conservative Member whom I call my hon. Friend, because that is what he is, the hon. Member for Norfolk, North (Sir R. Howell), whose concern about unemployment—expressed from the right of his party—equals that expressed from the left by the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon. If the two of them were running the Conservative party, it might conceivably have a chance of winning the next general election, but they are both members of desperate minorities.

The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon talked of the problem of young people without jobs, alienated from the political process. He is entirely right. If he visited any of our constituencies and mixed with young people, that is exactly what he would find: people who have given up.

May I have the attention of the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon for a moment? He is not hearing the praise that I am lavishing on him, and I want him to hear it, because I suspect that it will be rare in his political life—certainly in his current seat. He is also right about people opting out of the political process and not voting.

My area contains what we call "blue belts"—areas containing nice housing, where people used to vote Tory but do not any longer, often because of the negative equity on their homes. In those areas there will be a general election turnout of between 75 per cent. and 80 per cent. In areas where people are really in trouble—the great estates in my constituency to which the hon. Gentleman referred, where unemployment is running at over 40 per cent.—if the turnout in a general election is between 50 per cent. and 55 per cent. we are doing well. That part of society is alienated.

The hon. Gentleman spoke of young people, and of people over 55. Tomorrow is my 67th birthday: that is 12 years above the limit set by the hon. Gentleman. Under the present Government, anyone of that age is written off. No one over 50 can get a job. Incidentally, I am losing my job; that is why the Government are getting rid of the Department of Employment. I have heard of using a sledgehammer to crack a nut, but it is unusual to use a nut to crack a sledgehammer. We can joke about what we do, but for ordinary people—young or old—there are no jobs.

The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon spoke of the minimum wage. Yes, there are problems connected with it, but it is essentially right. It must be examined carefully. The current problem afflicts not only the less well-off or bad employers: good employers are being undercut by cowboys and those who operate slave labour.

The hon. Gentleman also spoke of those who do not share in the country's prosperity. Again, he is right, but he did not mention the aged and the ill. For those who are both aged and ill, and who have no money, life is very bad. Those of us who look after our constituents know how awful it is.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the offensive juxtaposition of poverty and wealth. Yet again he is right, but again Conservative Members scrunched up their faces, and the lady in orange—the hon. Member for Billericay—pushed up her spectacles in dismay at such an awful suggestion.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) talked of hardship and homelessness—and his views were echoed by the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon. The hon. Gentleman was right. What is the biggest category of complaint that hon. Members on both sides of the House hear in their surgeries? [HON. MEMBERS: "Too long speeches."] Complaints about long speeches come only from Opposition Members, who had to endure the sort of speeches that Conservative Members make until we heard from the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon. No, most complaints are made about homes.

The gap is very great and, as the hon. Gentleman said earlier—we have been wallowing in history today—it used to be greater. Earlier today, I had the pleasure of welcoming to the House a man called Alan Hull. It will shock the tabloids to know that I spent a year living with a warder from Broadmoor. That may explain to a great extent why I am prepared to do what I am doing. We were evacuated to the country; there was an outside loo—no inside sanitation and no electricity. We carried the accumulator along to the hardware shop to get the radio to work. Things are better for most people today, but the gap is still very great.

Suddenly, as part of the great change of vision, the new Prime Minister—who just happens to be the old Prime Minister—tries to introduce a new look. In that process, the Government have abolished the Department of Employment. I remember Lord Denning saying, "We judges always ask ourselves questions, because it is the only way in which we can obtain intelligent answers." So I asked myself the question: why have the Government done that?

I told myself, "Well, it gives power to the Education Secretary." I understand that: she is extremely charming, and needed new power. She did not stand for anything, and she will now take over a good deal of work from the Department of Employment, but I do not suppose that that is why the Government acted as they did. They certainly did not act to please the Department of Trade and Industry: the gentleman who headed that has now moved to a new field, with no Question Time and no Select Committee of his own, although he is to be called deputy Prime Minister. Presumably he has got what he wanted.

Nor did the Government take such action so that the Secretary of State for Social Security could be saved from further appearances before the Select Committee on Employment—although, no doubt, that was a side benefit—or so that the Secretary of State for the Environment could increase his popularity, which is well known in the country, by a acquiring the Health and Safety Executive.

Why, then, did the Government act as they did? If the House and the nation do not know the answer, I shall tell them. It was because the Department of Employment—sometimes called the department of unemployment—was the only Government Department whose sole job was to look after people at work and people without work; the sole Department of State whose only job was to deal with employment. The Department had its own Employment questions and its own Employment Secretary, and—yes—its own Employment Select Committee.

Removing the Department of Employment means that Ministers go. The Secretary of State for Employment went off to the Ministry of Defence, which was a good place for him to go; but he was not replaced. It also means losing Employment questions, and the accompanying focus on employment. It means losing the Select Committee on Employment—and oh, yes, the Government wanted to get rid of that. It means losing the focus on employment at a time when unemployment is still—even by the Government's own figures—almost 2.5 million. Nearly 2.5 million people are on the unemployment register because they qualify for unemployment benefit.

But that is not the number of people who want jobs and cannot get them. We know from our constituencies how many people are desperate for work and are not on unemployment benefit, but they are not included in the figures. We know that the Government have moved no fewer than nine categories from the employment figures. People receiving sickness or invalidity benefit are out; so are students in full-time education, partners of those registered unemployed, single parents and those disqualified from benefit on grounds of unavailability or the fact that they are not actively seeking work.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman agree that one of the possible advantages of bringing together the Department of Employment and the Department for Education, which I applaud, is that we can now reverse the policies that we have had to put up with, whereby unemployed people who sought to improve their skills through study were liable to be disqualified from benefit? That was surely a perverse incentive.

Mr. Janner: Perversity sometimes produces some good and if the bringing together of those two Departments produces that result, at least one benefit will have arisen out of what is otherwise a disgraceful change. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is right.

Expenditure on training has gone down. When we ask why, the Government say, "The number of unemployed has gone down, so of course we have lowered the budget." The reality, however, is that we have the worst trained work force in Europe.

People seeking part-time work no longer appear on the register and people who are in part-time work, even for an hour a week, are not registered as unemployed. Those aged 16 and 17 are off the register. Those aged over 55 who receive an occupational pension and ex-miners retiring under the redundant mineworkers pensions scheme are not on the register, so it is obvious why the numbers have declined.

Let me give the House one interesting example. In 1979, when the Government took office, 1.33 million people were on the unemployment register. That is still almost half the current figure, but that figure was worked out under the system that applied then.

Mr. Purchase: Fiddled is the word that my hon. and learned Friend is looking for.

Mr. Janner: The figures were worked out much more correctly than they are now because they did not have all the exclusions that we have now. If we apply all the exclusions and compare like with like, we find that the figure for 1979 would have been 1.07 million. That is not good. It still represents unemployment of 4 per cent., which is too high, but the correct comparison is that 1.07 million were on the unemployment register when this Government took office and that nearly 2.5 million are on it now, about which they boast, shake their heads from side to side, smile and are proud.

As the hon. Member for Norfolk, North knows, unemployment is an absolutely wicked waste of humanity, and of people's power and ability to serve. It is also a great waste of public money. It is awful having to pay people to be unemployed when one would be better off paying them to be employed and they would be much happier.

So we have an illusion. The Government have created an illusion that, with the Department of Employment gone, unemployment has also vanished and diminished.

I am looking forward to life one day as a professional conjuror, because magic is an art that I love deeply, recognise and respect. I do not, however, much like it in politics.

The art of misdirection means, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you ask people to look in one direction and then do something in the other—you make things "disappear". As my grandchildren will show you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you take an ordinary ball and vanish it. It is gone, but of course it is always there. You can make unemployment vanish by removing the Department of Employment, the Select Committee on Employment and Employment questions, but unemployment is still there, just as the ball is still there.

The Government cannot make unemployment vanish by removing the Department of Employment, by removing the Select Committee on Employment and its chairman and by making us all unemployed, while, at the same time, making many people unemployed in the Department of Employment, whom they sacked without warning, without care and without interest to what would happen to them. They just simply told them, "You are out" and that is what happened.

So the whole system is an illusion. It is the same illusion that I started with: the illusion of getting a new Government with the same Prime Minister. Any magician would be proud of that, but we know what has happened.

I have a friend called Paul Daniels, who is wonderful. I remember watching him a little while ago vanishing a huge motor cycle on stage: it was gone—brilliant!—but it was there. Everyone knew that the same motor cycle was there and that, in the next show, it would be on stage again.

That is what this lot are doing. They are a bunch of political conjurors. They are trying to create illusions. They may convince themselves, but the public will recognise them for what they are. The illusion is that, by destroying the Department of unemployment, they will remove people's concern about the number of people who are unemployed, and that by fiddling the unemployment figures not many people will be unemployed, when everyone in my constituency who happens to be lucky enough to be employed either has unemployed people in his or her family or knows people who are unemployed. The illusion is that, by removing the Select Committee on Employment and its direct questioning of the Government, people will forget about the issues that it has considered over so many years.

I pay tribute to the way in which all my colleagues on the Committee, of both parties, have worked together. We could not always reach agreement, although we usually did. I do not pay tribute to the Government, though, who, every time we produced a report, including the report on women, vanished it. Up it went into a pigeonhole. Occasionally we received a reply, but they did not even care to read the thing properly.

For the people in trouble in my constituency, and for the people who do not have jobs and cannot get them, this is a rough world. Just a few weeks ago, I advertised for a research assistant. I had more than 100 applications and had to turn down some marvellous young people who have been unemployed ever since they left university. Wonderful people cannot get jobs. It is not true that people are workshy and do not want to work; they want to work but they cannot get it. There are not enough jobs, which is a disgrace to our country.

Those people want to contribute to society and they cannot do so. They are the people to whom the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon referred—the alienated, the homeless, the aged and the young. We have a disgraceful and awful society. That is why this motion is a fair and good one and why this Government will lose the next election, whomever they may keep as their Prime Minister.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (Surrey, East): It is a great honour, if a slightly daunting one, to follow that brilliant performance by the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner). May I take this opportunity of wishing him a happy birthday tomorrow, and swift and many years' retirement as a conjuror? I should also like to say how sorry many of us Conservative Members—and I know Labour Members—are that the Select Committee that he has chaired for so long and with such élan will cease to exist, but I shall come on to the good reasons why that has to be so.

Like my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security, I closely considered the motion before the House and it is interesting in what it tells us about the Opposition. It is a fairly characteristic piece of work. Having established a number of false premises, it goes on, through various permutations, to conclude with a recommendation that would undermine the very cause that the Opposition appear eager to promote.

The first false premise is this. The motion states:

"Government policies . . . have widened social division, led to damaging inequality and brought insecurity to millions".

That is easy to say and, if it is repeated often enough, I dare say that it becomes easy for some people to believe. The fact that it is untrue is a minor detail and an irrelevance to be shuffled away and buried, probably under a mountain of soundbites, as the truth is less congenial to the Labour party, which has a vested interest in bad news.

Many statistics have been bandied around in the debate. We all know that statistics are not the sum of human happiness, but we also know that, across the board, real incomes have increased substantially since 1979, that real take-home pay is up, that both were stagnant under Labour, that pensions are substantially higher and that certainly those pensions are going to the least well-off who are entitled to receive them.

In addition, if quality of life can be measured in material possessions—and I am not sure that it can—there has been a dramatic improvement in the quality of life of the poorest people in this country under this Government. Telephone, car and video ownership and the ownership of washing machines and home computers have increased substantially—particularly among those in the bottom decile of society—under the Government. It is obviously important to look not only at statistics but at the real-life experiences of individuals. The reports of the Institute for Fiscal Studies are very important in that regard, as they have examined the bald statistics as well as 3,500 individual cases. Therefore, the institute's findings must command respect.

We are often led to believe that those at the bottom end of the income scale represent a fixed group of downtrodden individuals who are condemned to live semi-permanently in relative poverty. That is simply not so. The IFS report makes it clear that there is considerable movement into and out of the bottom decile. It suggests that about half of those who were in the bottom decile in 1991 had moved up and out of it by 1992. That is not a reason for complacency. I share the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) that it is no fun to be in the bottom decile—although it is a darn sight better than the situation in 1911, as referred to by the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). It is important to remember that there will always be a bottom decile; that is a mathematical fact and there is no escaping it. What is important is the absolute—and, to a lesser extent, the relative—standard of living of the people in that group.

The IFS report goes on to suggest that the net income of those in the bottom decile in 1991 was 25 per cent. higher in the following year. As net incomes have not risen quickly in recent times, that figure suggests very strongly that the gap between the poor and those on average incomes is closing. The IFS findings are also supported by an analysis of expenditure. A report published at the same time shows that the spending of the lowest 10 per cent. of income earners rose by 14 per cent. in real terms between 1979 and 1992.

Another curious fact is that many people who report either zero or negative incomes have higher than average spending patterns. There are all sorts of strange statistical quirks involved and, particularly in the latter context, I welcome enthusiastically the statement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about fraud and the benefit system.

The truth is never as simple as the Opposition would have us believe. That is precisely why they have arrived at a bogus premise for the debate. The Opposition motion goes on to claim that Government policies have brought uncertainty to millions of people. That is not so; it is not the Government who have invented policies that have created uncertainty for many people. I do not deny for a moment that there is a pervading air of uncertainty, which I readily accept permeates not only this country, but most developed countries, and certainly the whole of Europe.

[Mr. Peter Ainsworth]

However, I think that it has a great deal to do with a profound change in the pattern of work and work experience.

Some 30 years ago, it was possible for people leaving school or university to expect to stay with the same employers for the rest of their working lives. That is simply not the case any more. Job mobility has increased dramatically. It has brought with it variety and choice but, inevitably, it has also brought a great deal of uncertainty. That is not the result of Government policy; it is the result of policies developed by employers to meet the challenges posed by massive technological changes and increasing competitiveness at home and in global markets.

The Opposition motion implies that the Government could have somehow resisted the changes and the powerful commercial pressures. I do not believe that there is any reasonable way in which that could have been achieved. Albania attempted to resist external economic pressures, and I do not think that anyone would suggest that that country has experienced an explosion of economic growth and prosperity, which has benefited the least well-off in Albanian society. There are powerful economic forces at work and we must understand them if we are to deal with them.

I accept that uncertainty is present in society. That uncertainty feeds through into the housing market and makes it difficult to take long-term decisions, such as whether to take out a mortgage. It raises all sorts of important issues, not just for this country, but for other European countries. However, I believe that the answers to those questions lie outside the scope of the debate.

The Opposition motion then turns its fire on the Government's decision to merge the Department of Employment and the Department for Education. The motion claims that "the abolition of the Department of Employment signals the complete lack of Government concern about unemployment".

That is a load of codswallop. The merging of the two Departments formalises and focuses the relationship between education and employment that has always existed. The explicit binding together of the Departments recognises the fact that, although it will always be important to educate people for the sake of knowledge in its own right, we also have an overriding duty to educate young people for work. Closer links between employers and training centres, schools and colleges can only be mutually beneficial.

Much has been said in the debate about cuts in the training budget. It is very important to look at the Government's training policy in the round and not in isolation. A great deal more in-work training is now going on and the responsibility of employers in that regard is recognised more widely. I believe that the merger of the two Departments will help to drive forward the process of integrating training and education in the workplace. We are presented with a real opportunity to build on industry's existing involvement with the education system, to hone vocational skills in order to satisfy employers and employees alike, and to develop a competitive work force that is better able to generate the wealth that the nation will need in the future.

When faced with the opportunity to say, "Yes, it is not a bad idea," all that we hear from the hon. Member for Garscadden are sneers and trivialisation. That says a great deal about the Opposition's approach. They have missed the most important point about unemployment. Listening to Opposition Members speak in the debate, one would assume that unemployment had risen dramatically in this country and was somehow out of control. The truth is that unemployment has fallen by 660,000 since the end of 1992.

Fewer people in Britain are claiming unemployment benefit than in any other major European Union country. It has more people in work than any other EU country, and in the past 12 months, that number has increased by 300,000—faster than any other major country in the European Union. The reasons are the long-term benefits of major supply-side reforms introduced in the 1980s and continued under this Government in the 1990s; the end of the unions' stranglehold; the end of restrictive practices; greatly improved competitiveness by British companies; and a soundly based, growing yet low-inflation economy that provides the right background for economic development and job creation.

Britain's improved employment situation is also the direct result of specific Government policies to tackle unemployment, get people back to work and encourage them off the dole, and promote training in the workplace. Those carefully targeted and generous schemes include jobfinder grants, job plan workshops and restart courses. All have played their part in ensuring that Britain enjoys a relatively modest level of unemployment. Those are not just airy words, but hard policies. They represent, in the words of the Opposition motion,

"action which promotes employment opportunities, particularly for the long-term unemployed, increases the skills and adaptability of the workforce".

A great deal is being done, but Labour chooses to ignore it.

The Opposition, having established a grossly misleading picture of poverty and unemployment in Britain in the 1990s, delivered their hoary old panacea—the minimum wage. We do not know where it would be set. We tried to find out this afternoon, but had no success. No doubt Mr. Dromey tried to find out, but had no success either. I can understand the Opposition failing to answer questions from members of the Government Front Bench or my hon. Friends on the Back Benches, but I fail to understand why the Opposition are incapable of answering straight questions from their friends in the trade unions. What do they have to hide?

It is a great pity that Opposition Members funked answering questions about a national minimum wage. I give the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) another opportunity, because it is not too late to redeem her honour and come clean about that important plank of Labour policy. If the hon. Lady wishes to tell the House where she would set a minimum wage, we would all be delighted to know. All I get is the hon. Lady's seraphic smile. If my hon. Friends try again later, they also will be met with a smile—if not quite so seraphic—from the hon. Member for Garscadden. We do not know what the minimum wage would be worth, if we were ever to find ourselves confronted by one.

We know for sure, however, that a minimum wage would be bad for jobs. We know that not just from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State or because Barbara Castle, the Leader of the Opposition, the deputy Leader of the Opposition, the leader of the Liberal Democrats, the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), the Confederation of British Industry and the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development have said so. We do not need them to tell us that a minimum wage would be bad for jobs. A small family shopkeeper in my constituency who employs three people told me that if a minimum wage were introduced—and the shopkeeper of course did not know at what level, because Labour is not prepared to tell us—it would probably make that business unviable.

Underpinning the Opposition's motion is Labour's topsy-turvy approach to economics—a belief that the best way to help the worst-off is to spend money before it is earned, increase statutory burdens on industry and not reduce them, increase regulation and not cut it, hand power back to Labour's paymasters in the trade unions and increase the price of labour. Such a policy, according to the most basic economic manual, is guaranteed to reduce demand and to create more dependency, higher unemployment, less wealth creation and a country united only in its own decline.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): I intended to start by apologising for missing the Secretary of State's speech but as he will miss my contribution, that makes us even. I am glad that the Minister of State, Department for Education and Employment is in his place because we have at least one thing in common, having both been praised or criticised for our peculiar taste in ties. However, I do not have the same taste in shirts as the Minister.

Mr. Stephen Byers (Wallsend): Thank goodness for that.

Mr. Miller: As my hon. Friend says.

I am particularly pleased that the Minister is present to hear my contribution because I want to bring to his Department's attention documents published by other Departments in the recent past that I hope that the Minister's colleagues have read avidly and understand. One document to which I shall refer gives the new Department specific responsibilities. At the beginning of the Secretary of State's speech, I noticed that the First Secretary was briefly in his place. I suppose that he was checking to make sure that the Secretary of State was following the right line, whatever that might be, and where he stands in respect of the productivity bonus that will presumably be paid at the end of this Session.

The Government's amendment to my party's motion states that the House

"welcomes the creation of a new Department for Education and Employment to improve further Britain's skill base and competitive position".

A key policy document launched by the First Secretary in his former post only one month ago makes no reference to that incredibly important Government initiative. The two Departments were merged because the Prime Minister has run out of loyalists and people whom he can trust in key Departments. Contributions made today ranged from that of the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth), who severely criticised the Government, to those made by extremely barmy Conservative Members to whom even the Government would feel nervous about giving any ministerial office. The two Departments were merged because the Prime Minister had run out of players whom he could trust.

The competitiveness White Paper "Forging Ahead"—I am not sure of the relevance of that title—contains Government statistics, and it is important to quote them because then we shall know exactly how to put together the jigsaw. It is interesting that claims made in today's debate do not square with earlier statements.

Page 102 describes changes in the structure of employment in this way:

"As a proportion of total employment, employment in manufacturing has fallen and employment in services has grown, as it has in other countries . . . Employment in manufacturing peaked in 1966. In 1971, 36 per cent. of employees worked in manufacturing. Now 20 per cent. do so. As much as 30 per cent. of this decline may have been due to contracting out".

That may be so, but there is no evidence to support it. Certainly, the remaining 70 per cent. of the decline has taken place in the areas where our wealth-creating industries were located.

The document goes on to say:

"Banking, finance and business services employed 1.3 million people in 1971. Now these services employ 2.8 million. Over the same period, the number of employees in health-related services has risen by two-thirds, more than 600,000".

I wonder whether the Government would like to rephrase that in the context of full-time equivalents? That would produce some real statistics, but the comparison has been conveniently left out.

The chapter on employment also contains a lengthy reference to deregulation and health and safety matters. In this area at least, employment issues should be dealt with on a bipartisan basis. We should all share the clear goal of improving the nation's health and safety, but the Government have developed a theory; they think that if they get rid of some important health and safety regulations, all will be well. It is easy for Ministers to produce the occasional peculiar example, but in general the argument used in the document cannot be sustained.

The Government say:

"Ninety-seven per cent. of the recommendations of Lord Sainsbury's task force have been accepted . . . implementation of six key EU directives on health and safety—the 'six pack'—is to be evaluated".

That sounds like something to do with large quantities of lager, but the Government may understand the phrase better. They go on to say:

"A discussion document on health and safety for small firms and the self-employed will be published".

If the logic of Lord Sainsbury's task force is pursued into the small firms sector, the Government are saying, in effect, that they intend deliberately to deregulate so as to improve the competitiveness of small firms. It follows that that will be done at the price of the safety of the workers in those firms.

Page 104 sets out the reasons why the Government have been so successful at reducing the number of strikes. The hon. Member for Surrey, East (Mr. Ainsworth) referred, I think, to the bad old days. The briefing from Conservative Central Office omitted a key piece of information, however. Only with that information can we make sense of the figures. Why do not the Government publish the parallel figures—the number of days lost through unemployment? I refer to the manufacturing potential of a huge number of people. Anyone with any sense can see the relationship between the number of days lost to strikes and the amount of unemployment in the economy. Conservative Members have admitted that in other debates, so I do not see why the Government's official papers conveniently ignore it.

The Minister of State, Department for Education and Employment (Mr. Eric Forth): I trust that the hon. Gentleman is not trying to make a connection between manufacturing output and the number of people employed in manufacturing. That would seem strange in this world of productivity. Surely he must acknowledge that most of the successful economies in the world have undergone a reduction in the number of people employed in manufacturing while increasing their manufacturing output and exports—as we are doing.

Mr. Miller: That is not my point. I shall come to that in a moment in the context of my own constituency, which is a manufacturing base with severe employment problems resulting from Government policies.

The document that I have been quoting is an interesting read. One important paragraph has been referred to in a number of debates, here and during the Committee stage of the Pensions Bill, which finished its stages last week. It is the paragraph referring to the funding of an elderly population:

"In the West, governments play a key role in the provision of pensions. Ageing populations create pressure for higher expenditure on pensions, leading to higher taxes falling on fewer workers. And yet, in a world of global markets and capital flows, governments cannot increase taxes significantly without damaging national competitiveness. In these circumstances, individuals will not be able to look to the state to fund improvements in their living standards in old age."

That is an important statement. In other debates, Conservative Members have made several attempts to explain away the meaning of that paragraph—but they fail to look at the whole picture.

The same page includes an interesting graph, based on World bank projections that show the ratio of people aged 65 and over to the working population. The graph shows that Britain will have an increasingly old population, but the analysis in the document fails to draw the right conclusions from the rest of the graph. It shows that many of our key competitors, especially those in the Pacific rim, face, in the next century, a massive problem with funding their aging populations. That is because the sections of their populations aged 65 and over are set hugely to increase as a proportion of their general populations—much more so than in this country. It is thus disappointing to find no analysis of the effects of this change on our competitiveness. It is a shame that the Government have missed an opportunity to describe what may result.

Page 34 lists the top 20 manufacturing industries, ranked by sales/UK demand in 1992. One pair of figures stands out from all the rest, showing a remarkable success, compared with the other industries listed, of our pharmaceutical and aerospace industries. There are some lessons from history to be learnt at this point. These are two industries with a well-established relationship with the state over the years, covering the expensive research and development of their products. That is why it made sense for them to invest in the longer term. The aircraft industry received launch aid; the pharmaceutical industry established a market because of its connections with the national health service. Consequently, the two industries thrived far more than the others referred to in the chart.

To show how obvious that point is, the footnote at the bottom of the chart tells us that at the bottom of the list are motor cycles, with 1992 sales equivalent to only one seventh of United Kingdom demand. The Minister will know, with his background of responsibility for education, exactly where the primary research was undertaken for modern motor cycle engines. It was carried out in a British university.

It was a great sadness—with hindsight I think that we would all agree—that none of the major British companies picked up the benefits that came with research and the evolution of the light alloy engine. The new industry could have been ours had the combination of the private and public sectors worked together more effectively to realise the potential that exists in the United Kingdom.

As for comparisons with other countries, how can we make progress while dogma drives policy? We fail straightforwardly to take into account Britain's interests when policy decisions are taken that bear on the structure of our economy. The results of incompetence over the past few years will have an effect on poverty and divergence, as described by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). How do the Government think that we shall see improvement when their policy is to promote poverty pay and conditions?

Many families will never escape from the trap that the Government have created. Low-wage pressure is creating social consequences that have been recognised by the Secretary of State. In my constituency—I respond to the question asked by the Minister in an intervention—there is the major manufacturing town of Ellesmere Port, where productivity improvements have been dramatic. Vauxhall, which was near to closure, is now enjoying daily productivity gains. The company's product range is incredibly successful. The transformation is welcome, of course, but, irrespective of the company's share of the market, the reality is that it is unlikely that the work force will increase significantly in the near future. Other manufacturers have significant shares of the market. They are competing for the same market and for world markets. The fact that Vauxhall has succeeded in turning round the company at Ellesmere Port and making it a world quality plant is a credit to the company, Vauxhall, the parent company, General Motors, the work force and the trade unions within the company.

Mr. Hendry: And Government policy.

Mr. Miller: It was partnership that made it happen.

The hon. Member for High Peak (Mr. Hendry) said from a sedentary position, "And Government policy." Would he like to tell me how Government policy helped Vauxhall when the world-beating V6 engine plant came into place? I can tell him—this is the truth—that the Government did nothing to assist that project. If it had not been for the work force and the parent company, the project would not have been developed in the United Kingdom. Cynical remarks from a sedentary position are not worth a light.

Mr. Hendry: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Miller: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman. I shall listen to his speech.

Mr. Hendry: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): I hope that it is a point of order and not a point of argument.

Mr. Hendry: Is it in order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) to ask me a question and then refuse me permission to answer it?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is entirely in order.

Mr. Hendry: It is bad manners.

Mr. Forth: It is a debate.

Mr. Miller: The Minister says that this is supposed to be a debate. I gave way to the hon. Gentleman and answered his question. I shall continue to respond to his intervention. The Minister did me the courtesy of making an intervention and not a sedentary interjection.

In the same area, the Shell petroleum refinery has shed thousands of employees during a period of increased productivity. The problem with the examples of Vauxhall and Shell, and other near-by manufacturing companies, is that the housing surrounding them was developed because of the evolution of the manufacturing sector in the town. The highest unemployment is now to be found in that housing. As a result, it represents the areas of greatest social strain.

The position is not unusual in manufacturing towns throughout the country. There is a belt of wealth creators in the manufacturing sector and increasing productivity, which is usually accompanied, but not always, by falling employment demands. The housing in manufacturing areas contains the greatest levels of unemployment. That creates potential for social tensions, which the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon talked about thoughtfully. My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) also talked about it. The Government must bear in mind the important social tensions that arise.

I was depressed when I opened an Employment Agency office in Neston in my constituency. The Department of Employment invited me to open the office but I think that it assumed that the leafy suburbs of the pretty town of Neston would be Conservative strongholds. It forgot to examine the parliamentary boundaries when it issued the invitation.

Neston is extremely attractive and has historically had lower levels of unemployment than elsewhere in my constituency. Unfortunately, unemployment had been rising in the town. I was deeply touched by a conversation with a graduate in the jobcentre. He was reading the cards and trying to find a job that suited his skills. He told me, however, that he was no longer looking only for a job that suited his training and education. He was looking for any job that would enable him to sustain his family's existence. As he had given three years of his life to benefit from a university education, and the state had contributed significant sums to help him obtain his degree, that was deeply sad.

I listened with interest to comments about changing technologies and set them against a speech made by a former Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, the hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) at a recent conference on government and computing. He described with great eloquence what the Department of Social Security is doing in terms of investment in information technology to handle a growing problem. It was a very articulate presentation from somebody who clearly has a detailed interest in information technology. What he did not say, however, was what the Government are doing about data collection; why it is needed; why we have a set of rules and regulations that mean that the Government collect data several times over rather than utilising the skills of all the civil servants involved to help people who are in the various traps that have been created by poverty.

There was an exchange earlier on between my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton and my neighbour the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) about the cards to be used in the Department of Social Security. None of that will be of any relevance unless the Government address the real issue of why data are being collected. It should be to help the applicant, not to hinder. The whole process of data collection in that area is, in my view, totally upside down. If the Government introduced a mechanism whereby data were collected through positive interviews instead of through the rather cumbersome forms that are used at the moment, we would not need to get into the kind of debate that is going on.

The Department is studying whether it is feasible to introduce optical character recognition into form processing. That is an important piece of technology and is valuable in terms of speeding up and making things more efficient. Instead of looking at that technology, why do not the Government look as well at the basic reason why those questions are being asked?

It is my contention—one can see this throughout the Benefits Agency and the Employment Service—that information is being collected in an attempt to trap people into admitting that they are defrauding the system in one way or another. It would be a far more efficient and better use of civil servants' time if the assessment at the various agencies was done by positive interview instead of through the cumbersome forms that currently exist. Reference has been made in the House time and again to the 34-page disability living allowance form. I think that there are 32 pages for the new incapacity benefit.

All that nonsensical data collection is designed to entrap people. If all that were reversed and the resources that that would release were put into collecting data face to face, first, one would remove fraud from the system much more effectively than by the current auditing methods, and secondly, it would ensure that the elderly lady to whom my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton referred would have got her benefits through positive interview at the outset instead of being frozen out by the crazy way in which the system currently operates.

On training, the Government have, on a number of occasions, referred to what they intend to do, and it compares poorly with what happens in other countries. It is not simply what the Government are doing directly, where they always seek to claim credit. What they fail to look at is the way in which they "incentivise" the private sector to make a more positive contribution. One visit that I have made as a member of the Science and Technology Select Committee will stand out in the my mind, that to the Stuttgart area the year before last, when we went to a machine tool company.

We asked the company what was happening in terms of investment in research and development and in training, during what was obviously a difficult period for that part of Germany. As hon. Members on both sides of the House will acknowledge, the enormous costs of integration of the eastern Länder, with the general western recession that was going on, had put some of its high quality, high-cost products, such as Mercedes and so on, in difficulty for the first time in a long while. It was interesting that when asked what it was doing in terms of R and D and of training expenditure, the machine tool company responded by saying, "Increasing them, of course." It could not understand why on earth we felt it necessary to ask that question.

It is feasible for that company to do that within the structure of that particular regional economy because the combination of the role of the state and the private sector, working together in a much closer partnership than exists here, creating an environment in which it is possible for companies to convince their bankers that they have a serious future in the middle of a recession and that they can invest during that recession on the key facets of R and D and training.

I wish to comment on the remarks that were made about the minimum wage. The hon. Member for Surrey, East claimed that the Labour party policy would put his small shopkeeper out of existence. How can he really say that when he does not know what the level will be? It does not make a great deal of sense, because, equally, if he went to his small shopkeeper and scared him in the way in which he is trying with that story, and said, "Corporation tax is going to affect you next year and it will be three times the level it is now," the small shopkeeper would say, "But that is going to put me out of a job."

Mr. Peter Ainsworth rose—

Mr. Miller: It is easy for Conservative Members to use something that will scare. The hon. Gentleman must admit, and I invite him to do so when I give way to him, that it would be unreasonable for us to say to the Chancellor, "Please tell us what the absolute rates of income tax will be for all bands in the 1996 Budget." It is equally easy for people to say that it is different, but it is not. It is an economic fact that the judgment can be made, based only on the information that is available at the time.

Mr. Ainsworth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. It was not me who was claiming that that gentleman's business viability would be threatened, but the shopkeeper himself. I was not able to confirm that to him, because I did not know. The point that I was trying to make was that he, with millions of others who would be affected by a national minimum wage, has a right to know the level at which Labour would introduce a minimum wage. It is reprehensible of the Labour party to threaten a minimum wage without having the guts to say where it would clock in.

Mr. Miller: I am sorry if I misrepresented the hon. Gentleman. I would not want him to get into difficulties with his small shopkeeper. I invite him to go back to the small shopkeeper and say to him honestly, "I cannot, as the hon. Member for Surrey, East, give you any guarantees about the level of any form of Government taxation or minimum or maximum wages." It is impossible for such guarantees to be given. Those figures can be developed only at the time, in consultation with the social partners involved. Therefore, it is quite impossible to talk about a figure at this time.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South-East): Does my hon. Friend agree that, in a recent interview on NBC television, President Clinton of the United States said that he would look to Congress for an increase in the minimum wage? Does my hon. Friend also agree that, when we had the minimum wage before, small shopkeepers did not go out of business, regardless of the level?

Mr. Miller: I did not hear the interview with President Clinton. However, on my most recent visit to the United States, I was impressed by the way in which the local minimum wage, at state level, was seen as a benefit to, and a stabilising factor in, the economy. It was considered that it had resulted in the state being less responsible for the eradication of poverty than was the case in this country. It is ludicrous that, in this country, the state has to sustain those who are paid poverty wages by their employers.

Mrs. Gorman: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is a fundamental law of supply and demand that if prices go up, consumption goes down? That applies to labour just as it does to tomatoes, beef or mortgages. If one increases wages artificially to a level that, by definition, is above a level of which some people disapprove, some will lose their jobs. The jobs will not melt away, they will be lost.

Mr. Miller: I presume, then, that the hon. Lady would have voted against the Equal Pay Act 1970. The truth is that that legislation, which on her theory would have had the same effect, did not reduce the amount of work available to women. I have heard the hon. Lady say, time and again, that the Government's success has been to increase the number of women in employment. The Government simply cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: Is not the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) really arguing for something that her party has repudiated for the past 16 years—a prices and incomes policy?

Mr. Miller: My hon. Friend finds it difficult to follow the logic of the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman). As usual, she is somewhat confused. I shall not repeat the words used to her by Viscount Cranborne earlier this month. She is clearly confused, which must be a point on which Ministers and I would agree.

I refer the House to the last two lines in the Government's amendment, which asks the House to recognise that

"improving opportunity and the reward for effort is less socially divisive than encouraging dependency and the politics of envy."

The opportunity will come only when the country has the opportunity to vote for a new Government. The reward will come when my right hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) is in No. 10 Downing street. Conservative Members will be those experiencing the dependency culture because of their politics of envy—[HON. MEMBERS: "Yours."] It is their politics of envy that we shall soon see. They will envy us being in government while they are not. A good number of Conservative Members who have contributed to this debate will be the unemployment statistics of the future and we shall then see where the envy really is.

Mr. Alan Duncan (Rutland and Melton): We have heard a lot of curious economics from Labour Members in this debate; perhaps none more puzzling than the speech, which lasted for 40 minutes, of the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller). He stated some curious concepts, which will astonish any Conservative Member who has a greater foundation of understanding of what really rules in the true world of economic decisions.

I can well understand why the hon. Gentleman was inclined to throw something of a tantrum when my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Mr. Hendry) called on him to explain the significant success of Vauxhall—a major supplier and a major employer in his constituency. The hon. Gentleman was too churlish to pay tribute to the Government and their policy of allowing enterprise to thrive, which must be given much of the credit for the success of that company.

The motor car industry has been a stunning triumph in the past 15 years. It has gone from an industry of subsidised, bankrupt concerns to one of massive employers and tremendous export successes the world over. That triumph has generated jobs, security and profitability in the constituency of the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston. The time has come when the hon. Gentleman should admit where so much of the credit properly lies.

The hon. Member also made a curious comment in which he equated days lost through strikes—a thing of the past—with days lost now through unemployment. No one can deny that a day spent on the dole is a waste—primarily for the individual, but also for the productive capacity that the individual would be able to display if he were employed.

What I did not hear at all from the hon. Gentleman was a proper solution to the predicament in which these people find themselves. Is he saying that the money spent on the dole should be transferred to a jobs subsidy? Is he saying that there should be subsidies for investment to get everybody back to work? What is he really saying about the market for labour? Does he have a solution to the plight of the unemployed over and above what the Government are doing, which is successfully reducing the number who are unemployed?

Mr. Miller rose—

Mr. Duncan: I happily give way, although the hon. Gentleman would not give way to my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak.

Mr. Miller: What I was saying—

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): You had 45 minutes.

Mr. Miller: I am replying to the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan).

I referred to the German economy, and I said that there was a far more successful partnership there between the private sector and the public sector, which created an environment in which the banks could be far more confident in the way in which they worked. I invite the hon. Gentleman to look at such examples before ridiculing my comments.

Mr. Duncan: When my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak and I were in Germany 18 months ago, the major employer, Mercedes, was laying off 15,000 of the 40,000 employees. Daimler now faces a loss, for the first time in living memory. There are many problems with the German economy. It is a great sadness that the likes of the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston will not give credit where credit is due, which would help the sense of security which is not as robust as it should be among the likes of his constituents, and, indeed, mine.

The hon. Member also said that there would be a problem with old age, and that that would have economic consequences in the United Kingdom. Indeed it will. He did not, however, then say that Britain has £500 billion-worth of pension funds under management, which is more than the figure for the rest of the European Union countries put together. We have made greater provision for old age than any other country in a comparable western setting.

Mr. Miller: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Duncan: I will not give way just now; I shall give way in a moment, if the hon. Gentleman persists.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) drew on the wisdom of R. H. Tawney in saying that tadpoles needed to turn into frogs. I was tempted to intervene, by and large to agree with him. He said that he wanted agreement in the House to rid the country of low pay, poverty and inequality. Well, I am in very generous mood, and I am content to agree with two out of his list of three. As he well understands, I consider that his obsession with inequality is an utter diversion, which detracts from the energies that are needed to rid the country of low pay and poverty.

The hon. Member for Garscadden wants tadpoles to turn into frogs. Whenever I see a frog, I am inclined to kiss it in the hope that it will before my eyes turn into the noble Baroness Thatcher. I have so far been unsuccessful. But she at least understands the difference between socialism and conservativism. I never saw more ferocity in Baroness Thatcher's eyes than when she explained to me that the difference between the two sides of this House was that she—and that means the Conservative party—liked to lift people up to their full potential, while the socialists wished to level them down.

No debate on aspects of social security is complete without a proper exchange between the hon. Member for Garscadden and me, but I regret that he was not prepared to give way to me at any stage today. [HON. MEMBERS: "He did."] He did not give way to me. The hon. Gentleman usually makes supremely confident speeches, but for the first time—[HON. MEMBERS: "He did give way."] No, the hon. Gentleman referred to me, but he did not give way.

The hon. Gentleman's attempt today to defend his party's policy of the minimum wage was the first time that I have ever seen him look uneasy at the Dispatch Box. I have never seen the hon. Gentleman equivocate so unhappily as he did in attempting to describe the proper consequences of this misguided policy.

I listened with particular interest to the speech of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), because I have heard him speak on the topic before. As we saw tonight, he speaks on the predicament and plight of his constituents with evident passion, and rightly so. But where we part is not in failing to recognise the plight of his constituents and in wanting to do something about it, but in the solutions that we would deploy to try to address the problem.

[Mr. Duncan]

The Manchester of today is a far cry from that of a century ago, when the aptly named Manchester liberalism released all the strengths and energies which built the marvellous buildings, established the municipal pride and introduced new-found wealth into a proud city. Those energies now seem sadly to have been lost. I do not think that the constituents of the right hon. Member for Gorton are victims of 15 or 16 years of Conservative government. Rather they are victims of municipal socialism, which has gradually risen in the past 50 years.

I have yet to receive from the hon. Member for Garscadden a detailed critique of my book, which I am sure he has read with great relish from cover to cover. The book's main thesis—as the hon. Gentleman will know—is that many of the problems we face today were not caused by the past 20 years, and that one needs to go back a century to trace the gradual and pernicious advance of collectivism into all the nooks and crannies of an individual's life, so that all the intermediary institutions which gave us the power and strength to make people richer, freer and more self-reliant have been displaced.

One element of that is the gradual advance of taxation and the scale of it. While I shall not dwell deeply on the book, which was published a matter of weeks ago, I shall quote from a bit of it. My fellow author Dominic Hobson and I wrote:

"In a modern economy without large concentrations of personal wealth which can be taxed for redistribution to the poor, the heavy burden of direct and progressive taxation is arguably far more unfair than any number of regressive indirect taxes. This was well-put by a young Labour MP in the House of Commons nearly fifty years ago.

'As we get . . . more and more to the stage where men will start life equal as far as possible and will rise by merit in the sphere in which they can offer the maximum contribution to the country's welfare, I do not think we ought necessarily to persist in a system of taxation which will tax higher remuneration at a higher rate. Indeed, in a fully developed Socialist economy, I would expect to see indirect taxation replacing direct taxation as the main source of revenue, because in a Socialist society, where men start equal and rise by merit, there is no point at all in giving them a substantial wage to reward the contribution they are making to the national economy, and then taking it away by taxation.'—[Official Report, 1 November 1946; Vol. 428, c. 1004.]

His name was James Callaghan, and it was his privilege as Prime Minister to preside over the highest rates of income tax in the history of his country. When he joined the Inland Revenue as a Civil Service clerk in 1929, the poor did not pay income tax at all. Their main interest in the annual Budget, as Callaghan later recalled in his memoirs, was whether or not it increased the excise duties on beer, cigarettes and tea. It is a measure of what has happened since that they are now having to pay for those pleasures out of taxed income."

We will spend £94 billion on social security in the next fiscal year, but that great roundabout of money—a money-go-round—does not appear to have worked, as we still have people in poverty. Yet there seems to be insufficient readiness on the part of Opposition Members to look to this enormous budget and to try to work out how it could best be directed. There is too much call for more of the same, when what we have got is not solving the problem.

Like the hon. Member for Garscadden, I want to solve the problem of poverty. But why is it that we will spend £94 billion and we will still have the problem? The first thing to say when looking at poverty is that some of the slogans have bedevilled and, I fear, trivialised the debate. Opposition Members have pumped for all its worth the slogan "the rich are getting richer and the poor are getting poorer", but it is an illogical slogan. It is cleverly designed to imply that it is because the rich are getting richer that the poor are getting poorer. It is designed to say that Opposition Members have a claim on the money of the so-called rich in order to solve the problems of the so-called poor.

Indeed, so perverse has the morality which is attached to the slogan become that those who believe in socialism have raised to the status of a moral act the belief that it is somehow right, decent, proper and morally superior to expropriate other people's money for the alleviation of poverty, and that that is somehow better when it is done collectively than when individuals do it themselves. I find that profoundly perverse, and the nub of the debate is whether that slogan has any merit or value.

Mr. MacShane: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Duncan: I am prepared to take the risk.

Mr. MacShane: When the hon. Gentleman worked in Singapore, between 10 per cent. and 18 per cent. of all his income went into the Singapore central provident fund, which was set up by the Singapore Government to raise money from all salary earners to provide for the general lifting up of the conditions of the people of Singapore. Does he welcome the fact that a far smaller proportion of his income is taken by the British Government in the area of providence and insurance?

Mr. Duncan: I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman's comparisons are right. Certainly, if we could get tax levels down to 10 or 15 per cent., it would be a miraculous step forward, but that will not happen here, and it is not quite what is happening in Singapore. There is a contrast between the countries in the balance between the priority given to investment and the priority given to consumption, in the way in which money is spent by the state.

There is very little social security in Singapore, but the warmer temperature and cheaper food mean that those necessities are easier for people on lower incomes to acquire. The proportion given directly to cash handouts in welfare in Singapore is small compared with the amount that goes into investment that is taken from the pool of what is raised in taxation. So the hon. Gentleman's comparison is defective.

My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, East (Mr. Ainsworth) drew on an argument that is critical to the defective slogan that the rich are getting richer and the poor poorer. The statistical analysis from which the premise is drawn is deficient. The implication is that a fixed series of people are poor and are getting poorer as the rich get richer.

As my hon. Friend pointed out, the report of the Institute for Fiscal Studies makes it absolutely clear that although, in comparative terms—as a ratio of the poor to the rich—a category of the poor is getting poorer, it is not true to say that the same people are affected all the time. If one traced a sample, one would find that those people had been able to work themselves up the ladder, but by taking a sample that is different every time, the conclusion is drawn that the poor are getting poorer.

As the IFS says:

"All these statistics actually tell us is that the poor in 1991-92 were typically poorer than the poor in 1979. Not that people at the bottom in 1979 had got worse off."

In point of fact, the slogan that the poor are getting poorer and the rich richer contains so much deception, deceit and inaccuracy that, if the Opposition want to be true to their consciences as they are for ever calling on us to be, it is time they revised the words they so often use.

The hon. Member for Garscadden chided and taunted me, saying that he believed it was my view that inequality does not matter. By and large, that is my view. The obsession with inequality has become a red herring, which diverts energy from a proper attack on poverty and low pay. If one irons out inequality and makes that one's target, one is merely homing in on those who are identified as being rich. In terms of solving the problems of the poor, the arithmetic would not add up. If it does not add up, there is no purpose in the objective beyond trying to make a philosophical point and employing it with envy and venom, which is sad to see and entirely counter-productive.

Lord Callaghan said in this House nearly 50 years ago that he would much rather see a proportionate tax or a tax on expenditure than a vicious progressive tax on income, and I agree. One of the first rules of economics is to understand the difference between stocks and flows. The socialist will look at the stock—the cake—and say, "It's unfair. I've got to divide it." But it is the old lesson of the golden goose. Economic prosperity comes from a continuum—a dynamic. If it is undermined by slicing it in half, for a one-off redistribution, the energy will be sapped, and the dynamic will be the lesser for it. The obsession with inequality is counter-productive and puts a brake on the wealth-creating energy, which, in the long run, is what one needs to solve the problems of poverty and low pay.

The hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) mentioned Singapore. This country has a balance of Government spending that is biased too much in favour of consumption and too little in favour of investment. Even the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone), in an economic analysis document that I received in the post this morning, said that the problem with the British economy is that there is not enough investment. He is right. At the same time, however, he and many of his hon. Friends will be calling for immediate increases in the amount of money given to those they deem to be in need. One cannot have it both ways.

The other pernicious effect of the despotism of democracy, in which we all compete for votes by promising to spend other people's money, is that people's expectations have been raised to unrealistic heights. The sad and horrible truth about our democracy at the moment is that so many politicians' promises will never be met from the resources made available by people paying their taxes later.

It is time that we took stock of what can be afforded and shifted the balance between consumption and investment, to plan properly for the future and for the burden on those in work. As the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston said, the ratio between those in work and the elderly is going to change adversely, and we must provide for that now. If we promise that too much can be delivered straight away, we will never meet the expectations of those who are working their way through the system now.

Mrs. Gorman: Does not my hon. Friend agree that Hong Kong would be a better analogy to support his argument than Singapore? In the former, an open and free labour market and productivity, coupled with low taxes and amazingly high savings levels, has produced phenomenal growth—so much so that the majority of people there enjoy a higher standard of living than many people in Europe.

Mr. Duncan: I totally agree, and that is where I would like to see us heading. We have reached a point where we are minority shareholders in our own incomes. The best part of 50 per cent., or more, is taken by the state. Once one reaches that point, it is difficult to reverse the process. Doing so is the challenge that we, as politicians, face in the years ahead. If we can reverse the process, we will do more for the poor and the low-paid than anything a socialist Government could ever do by simply raising the taxes of those who are earning—a one-off, declining tax—supposedly to give to those in need, which will draw us all down.

I must dwell for a moment on the minimum wage, which is a great concept for a party in opposition, because it appears to promise those who feel deprived a better income, but it all depends on the level. My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, East mentioned a shopkeeper. The hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston would not say what the minimum wage would be for the shopkeeper in Surrey, East.

If the wage is below what is already being paid, it is a policy that is not worth the name, because it does not deliver any benefits. It is merely an undelivered promise that in no way raises a wage. If it is higher than what a shopkeeper is prepared to pay an assistant, it is bound to have a detrimental effect.

It is astonishing that that dichotomy has not been properly analysed, and that the Opposition will not commit themselves to a number. No number, no policy. It is meaningless. If it is below the equilibrium market price for labour, it is a complete irrelevance. If it is above, it is a tax on jobs, which will drive people out of work.

It is a lie to convey to the low-paid the impression that they would somehow be better off and that the policy would not cost anyone their job; it would. It is going to cost jobs. If it does not, it will make people work illegally.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: My hon. Friend touches on the nub of the argument about the minimum wage. The policy is technically, but also philosophically, flawed, in that it involves the intrusion of politics into the arrangements that business people, whether large businesses or small shopkeepers, make with their staff.

Mr. Duncan: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is high time that those responsible for writing in the newspapers and broadcasting on television properly dissected the true effects of that cretinous policy with a forensic accuracy. It is cretinous because, if the wage is low, it is nothing, and if it is high, people will be out of work or driven to work illegally.

Yet the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston said that it would be a wonderful system, because, if we raise wages, people will pay national insurance contributions and will be off benefit. That is a cost to someone. It will be a cost to the employer or the employee, and it will drive people out of work.

The hon. Member for Garscadden said that people in his constituency say that they cannot buy things or do things. Too many people are in that predicament. The wish to solve it is an objective that is shared—I hope he will take this in good faith—by both sides of the House. But to say that greater intervention, a minimum wage, higher taxation and an anti-business culture, which we have seen in so many aspects of what the Opposition say, will make things better is patently absurd.

We have a lot of catching up to do. In the years since the war, we have spent too much before we had it and invested too little. If we do not reverse that balance, as we have started to do dramatically in the past 15 years, we shall be back to the bad old days, and socialism will drag us and the poor down even further.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan), who made a speech for the Opposition. He talked about all the terrible things that have happened for most of the past 50 years. I must ask which party has been in power in the past 50 years—or the past five, 10 or 15 years. His speech reflected the split in the Conservative party. We heard the first glimmering outlines of the new philosophy of what will be a split Tory party in opposition. I wish the hon. Gentleman well, as I admire his intellect. I do not have to agree with what he produces, writes or says, but I admire intellectual dexterity, and he has much of it.

We talked earlier of tadpoles. The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton talked of kissing Baroness Thatcher in the hope that she would turn into a frog—or perhaps it was the other way round. Clearly the hon. Gentleman is prepared to embrace the past, in the hope that it will define the Tory party's future. He is the author of a remarkable book, which I am sure has been read by all Conservative Members, called "Satan's Children". I recommend it to everybody.

Mr. Duncan: "Saturn's Children".

Mr. MacShane: Oh, "Saturn's Children". Forgive me. I knew that it was project Pluto or a message from planet Portillo, but getting the name exactly right escaped me. We look forward to reading it. As the author of many a remaindered book, I hope that the hon. Gentleman's publishers did not print too many copies.

The fundamental difference in this debate, which we saw in the sniggering from the Government Front Bench during the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), is that the Opposition attack poverty while the Government attack the poor. That is certainly the impression in the country.

Far cleverer than Karl Marx, the contemporary Conservative party has created not one but two reserve armies in the labour market. The first is the reserve army of the unemployed. We do not know how many people are unemployed, because the Department of Employment, that famous massage parlour for unemployment statistics, has been abolished. So the debate that used to entertain both sides of the House is over. We no longer know whether it is 2.5 million, 3 million or 4 million, because the Department of Employment and its vital statistical work in that area exist no more. However, we still have a massive reserve army of unemployment to drive down wages.

I admire the Conservative party, which has not ruled this country on and off for 300 years for no good reason. It has created a second reserve army: the poverty-in-work army. That consists of those in employment of a sort—part-time, low-paid or zero-hours-contract employment. Like Blücher arriving on the field at Waterloo, the Conservative party's armies of unemployment and poverty helped to render the lives of so many people insecure with low pay and unable to plan with any confidence in the future.

I simply ask hon. Members who will troop through the Lobby in an hour and a half's time to think of our children, nieces or nephews who have left university in the past couple of years. How many of them have a job or a job that matches the educational attainment into which they have put so much effort? We all know that the answer is: very few. We are talking about the future of our country, those who have invested in education and, like many hon. Members, gone to university and attained degrees. Yet they now find that their lives are ebbing along on minuscule wages and hand-to-mouth jobs, because we have so tilted our society's labour market away from work.

I pay tribute to the eloquence of my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton, who showed a mastery of statistics that I cannot repeat. He offered us a long statistical narration that held the House. In my constituency of Rotherham, one in six men are out of work. They are men without destiny or hope, condemned not just to regular signing on but to the new water torture of the jobseeker's allowance and the salami tactics of taking away from them any hope of sustained help from their fellow citizens, via the state, to conduct their lives decently.

Unemployment is now a bit lower. What a funny turn of phrase to say that unemployment is lower. We define our society in the ebbs and flows of unemployment rather than permanent, enduring job creation. Unemployment is a little lower than a couple of years ago, thanks to a significant devaluation, which has provided the boomlet that the Prime Minister and his Cabinet make so much of in their speeches. But compared with 1990, there is now 20 per cent. more unemployment among male workers in Rotherham.

The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) talked about a society divided against itself, and a war of all against all. He is good at reeling off Hobbesian phrases. Let us compare the present with 1979, when life was, perhaps not a paradise, but far better for male workers in Rotherham than it is now. It was also better in 1970, 1960, 1951 and the first half of 1945—all years when this country was governed by a Conservative Government. I shall come back to that point later in my speech.

What is fascinating about the society in which we live is not the non-application of old or new Labour party or socialist ideas, but the betrayal of the idea that we live in one nation and even a betrayal of the Conservative philosophy which, until the past 15 years, accepted a sense of responsibility for social community.

Every week at my surgery, since I was elected a year ago, I have confronted someone whose life prospects would be helped—[Interruption.] My cough is caused by the filthy smog in which we have to live under the Tory Administration but that is another debate. At each of my surgeries—[Interruption.] I ask hon. Members either to stand up or shut up. If they are sitting down, they should let me get on with my speech.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Would the hon. Gentleman tell us whether smog in London was better in the halcyon days of 1950, 1945 and before?

Mr. MacShane: As a small boy, I dimly recall struggling my way to school through dreadful foggy smogs. How grateful I was for the excellent Clean Air Act 1956. This is rather a big diversion, but how I wish that the Government could return to those values of seeking to lift up the general status, health and social standards of the entire nation.

To return to the debate—even if the House is relatively empty—I recall that a vigorous couple, the man aged about 30, recently came to my surgery with their two children. He had signed a contract for £8,500 a year to deliver computer parts for a company in Sheffield. He was getting up a 7 o'clock in the morning to deliver his orders, working right through the day to 6 or 6.30 pm, coming home and spending an hour or two planning his delivery route for the next day. His hourly rate of pay was under £3.50.

They were young, vigorous, confident people, and he and his wife had calculated that they and their two children would be better off on the various forms of benefit that are available. He asked whether he could move to an hourly rate, but there is no mechanism for that. I asked him whether he was a member of a union. He said that he was not, and that, if he joined a union, he would be dismissed. I asked what would happen if the other drivers joined him and put it to their employer that they should get a better hourly rate. His answer was that they would all be sacked on the spot.

I see that the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, who has taken employment back under her wing, is smiling, but that is the life story of millions of people—a life story of low pay, no help and more hope with social security.

I have a letter from a Mr. William Clarke in my constituency, who came to see me. I urged him to go to the jobcentre to find a job. He is 53, and a qualified heavy goods vehicle driver. There are plenty of heavy goods vehicles on our roads; there is plenty of trade—we are told that the economy is booming. But no one will give him a job. He went to the jobcentre, but he reports that all the HGV jobs are temporary with flexible full-time hours, temporary with full-time hours, or temporary but only in categories for which he is not qualified.

He went to be retrained and added extra qualifications to his HGV qualifications to get a job. What did he find? The job qualifications had suddenly changed. In much of our industry, employers are taking on workers only if they qualify for family benefit. Single young males who are relatively unskilled will not be given a job. Males who are not single, but are skilled and have a wife and children will get jobs. That may be good. I am all for encouraging employment for male family heads of household, but they are taken only because of the taxpayers' subsidy via the benefit system. That cannot be right.

The Rotherham picture fits into the national one. There are 1.5 million of our citizens, thousands in each of our constituencies, who earn less than £2.50 an hour—the price of a Pimm's on the Terrace. We have to pay £2.5 billion as a taxpayer subsidy to firms each year. I shall be interested to see whether the Secretary of State will deal in her winding-up speech with the idea of a national minimum wage and what that costs in Europe, a subject of which much was made earlier in the debate.

The unemployment statistics for Europe show that, in Austria, Denmark, France, Germany, the Netherlands, Italy, Spain and Sweden, just to cite EU members—I am quoting the latest issue of The Economist—the unemployment figures are falling as fast as, if not faster than, in the United Kingdom. Four times as many jobs are being created in Germany as in Britain, and that is with the social chapter and wage negotiation that amounts, in effect, to a national minimum wage.

Other speakers have referred to Asia—the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton certainly did. However, the base for the success of all the Asian economies is a much more compressed ratio of wages of employers and employees—8:1 in Japan compared to over 30:1 in Britain. There are no Richard Greenburys earning 100 times the starting wages of the equivalent of a Marks and Spencer shop assistant in Japan. In Hong Kong and Singapore, too, there is a much narrower differential in the ratio between the bosses and what the people who actually generate the wealth earn than in the United Kingdom.

That is also true of the rest of Europe. The ratio of earnings of the chief executive officers and chairman of the top firms in France, Germany and the Netherlands to those of their employees is much smaller than in Britain. The fundamental problem is that there has been a significant devaluation of employed work in Britain. We are moving to a rentier society, with rich incomes for those with funds invested and miserable giro payments that destroy morale for those who depend on state benefits.

In essence, the values of 1968—of anything goes, what I want I can have, what happens next door does not concern me—have been embodied in the contemporary Conservative Government. That is why Labour is appealing against greed at the top and against a society in which people's expectations are set by lottery winners, the values of Hugh Grant or the salary of Cedric Brown. Instead, we are trying to return to a society in which people's values are based on community and neighbourhood.

The argument of the Conservative party is, as I understand it, based on the Laffer curve nonsense about taxation. The rich do not work hard enough because they are not rich enough and, according to the Secretary of State for Social Security, the poor do not work hard enough because they are not poor enough. That is a fundamental divide.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): The hon. Gentleman seems to have based his entire diatribe on the idea that the Government should spend more. Perhaps he would consider the example of the United States, where Government expenditure as a percentage of GDP is 35 per cent., yet their unemployment rate is only 5.4 per cent., down from 6.7 per cent. a year ago. If he thinks that an incoming Labour

[Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown]

Government will somehow magically improve employment prospects in this country, how are we to compete with the United States?

Mr. MacShane: I shall pray in aid the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the honourable Newt Gingrich, who voted for an increase in the national minimum wage in 1990 and 1991. The Americans seek to put a floor under exploitation precisely so that the state does not have to subsidise low-pay employers, which is the philosophy of the British Government.

I would buy into some of the Conservatives' arguments if they applied the American experience, and if, for example, there were 52 regional Parliaments and control was decentralised from Whitehall. However, the fundamental difference is that in this country we have neither the American experience nor that of our more successful European or Asian competitors.

That was recognised more than 100 years ago by that well-known socialist Benjamin Disraeli, who proclaimed:

"the first consideration of a Minister should be the health of the people".

He was not talking about health solely in terms of hospitals, but in the broad social sense.

In his excellent book entitled "The Great Democracies", Winston Churchill described what the Conservative party did in the 1870s:

"A Trade Union Act gave the unions almost complete freedom of action, an Artisan's Dwelling Act was the first measure to tackle the housing problem, a Sale of Food and Drugs Act and a Public Health Act at last established sanitary law on a sound footing. Disraeli succeeded in persuading much of the Conservative party not only that the real needs of the electorate included healthier conditions of life, better homes, and freedom to organise in the world of industry, but also that the Conservative Party was perfectly well fitted to provide them."

How far the Conservative party has travelled since then. Its meanness and indifference and its sniggering about poverty that we have heard from Conservatives today proves how unfit, how divided and how irrelevant contemporary Conservatism is, whether of the Vulcan or the "dithering", "don't know" and "undecided" factions.

If we want to build one nation again, we shall need a change of Government. Only a Labour Government can deliver to the citizens of Britain the one nation they need and merit, and in which they should live.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): I am most grateful to the Opposition for choosing a debate on social and economic policy. My only regret is that their motion does not live up to the occasion.

Labour's motion condemns what it calls "damaging inequality", but it does not deal with the fact that the policies that Labour has traditionally espoused would bring about a damaging equality. What concerns me is that Labour's policies would create a damaging equality between the working men and women of Britain and the workshy. We have heard nothing about the measures that Labour would introduce to encourage working people. Labour policy invariably deals with how one can increase the income of the workshy, which results in employment traps which in turn are a major problem for the social and economic fabric of this country.

The motion then condemns so-called "insecurity". It should certainly be tackled, but it stems largely from the rapidly changing world economic situation. We have always said that no one owes us a living, but the tiger economies and Latin America are coming up rapidly and beginning to compete with us. It is indeed the case that no one owes us a living, but how would Labour policies deal with the serious insecurity facing us? We have seen the steps taken by the Government, but the Labour party offers in exchange only the minimum wage and the social chapter. Many of my colleagues have dealt with those two particular Labour policies. There is no doubt that if they were carried out as Labour proposes, insecurity in this country would increase considerably.

The Labour motion goes on to say that "the Government must take action which promotes employment opportunities, particularly for the long-term unemployed, increases the skills and adaptability of the workforce".

It is clear that Labour did not listen to the opening speech of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security, who catalogued the steps taken by the Government. Indeed, those steps are outlined in considerable detail in the admirable Government amendment.

I shall now concentrate my remarks on the current trends in social and economic policy and their impact on the family. I wonder how many people have faced up to the facts. Today, one in five families with dependent children is headed by a lone parent compared with only one in 12 in 1971. How many people are aware that the proportion of families headed by single mothers who have never been married has grown from 1 per cent. to 7 per cent. in the same period? Today, nearly one in three births occur outside marriage compared with one in 16 only 30 years ago. Marriage rates have reached their lowest point since records began more than 150 years ago. There has been a sixfold increase in the annual divorce rate since 1961. If current trends continue, four out of 10 new marriages will end in divorce.

Two out of three mothers with dependent children have jobs or are actively seeking work compared with fewer than half only 20 years ago. Economic activity among mothers of children under five has increased from just over a quarter to almost half. Those facts have been exacerbated by a mixture of changing employment patterns and the impact of the tax and benefits structure.

I would contend that the social and economic policy followed for many years has resulted in the undermining of the breadwinner. The strength of the role of the father-provider of the family has been severely eroded. In the past 30 years, this country has lost 3 million relatively well-paid full-time jobs for semi-skilled and unskilled male factory workers, and modern technology has also limited the low-skill male jobs in transport, warehousing, retailing and offices.

As a result, the unemployment rate for young low-skilled males is high, despite the development of new schemes and training by the Government. That has led in turn to those very young men not providing what is known as a "marriage prospect" to eligible young women and a low rate of creation of stable marriages in which to bring up children. Their loss of self-esteem derived from full wage packets also leads to delinquency and crime.

Conversely, modern technology has created millions of new jobs requiring greater skills, and they are more suited to the aptitudes and preferences of women. Jobs are also more flexible and not necessarily full time. That has created a swing in the balance of employment, encouraging female employment to such an extent that nearly half the work force is female. Indeed, more than 50 per cent. is expected to be female in the year 2000, and many women are maintaining their jobs through parenthood.

The net result has been the undermining of the father as breadwinner, and it militates towards single-parent families, illegitimate births and divorce, all of which have an impact on the children of the nation. The trend for mothers of young children to work is growing. It is interesting to note that the proportion of working married women with children under five has risen from 27 per cent. in 1977 to 47 per cent. four years ago, according to the latest census. That has not happened through choice.

The social attitudes survey shows that 76 per cent. of mothers thought that they should stay at home full time with their children. The figure rose to 80 per cent. in lower-income groups. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) is shouting from a sedentary position, but the fact is that, unlike her, most women would prefer to stay at home and look after their children.

Ms Harman: How long are women to spend at home looking after their children? Are they supposed to stay at home until the children are 30, or perhaps 40? It is no good making a blanket statement to the effect that women must get out of the labour market for ever once they have children. Clearly, they must leave it temporarily, but how long does the hon. Gentleman have in mind?

Mr. Arnold: How long is precisely as long as those children need their mother properly to develop them. My worry is that the fact that if mothers do not stay at home, especially if they wish to, it damages the development of their children. As I said, the social attitudes survey shows that 76 per cent. of those mothers believe that they should stay at home, and the statistics increase to 80 per cent. in lower-income groups. The mothers know the impact on their children in terms of socialisation, nurturing and support.

The House should ask itself, why have those mothers done so? The answer is that real and perceived financial need have driven them to do so. Prices, especially housing costs, have increased to absorb two salaries; as the job market has changed, wages have adjusted to equality through lower unisex rates; and taxation policy has progressively removed the previous bias that favoured the family.

In recent years, taxation policy has changed savagely, withdrawing favoured status from married couples and causing a heavy impact on the family. That has come about in response to calls for fiscal simplicity and sexual equality. In recent years, we have split the taxation of the family. When a mother gives up paid work to care for her children, she forfeits not only her income, but her tax allowance, which is worth at least £880 to the family and is not transferable to the husband.

There has been a further impact on the married couple's allowance—which has been frozen, and therefore eroded in value, for the past four years—through the downbanding from standard rate to the 20 per cent. band last year and to the notional 15 per cent. band this year.

The benefit to families has been reduced from £430 a year ago to £258 this year—a loss to every family of £172. Further, if the married couple's allowance had kept up with inflation and had continued to be applied at the standard rate, it would be worth £200 more this year.

Mr. MacShane: I am genuinely interested in the line that the hon. Gentleman has pursued. Does he agree that, if we want to consolidate family life and, especially, give young children a good start, it would be helpful if we could enact parental leave provisions that would allow both parents to spend time with them, particularly with young babies, in the first six months, 12 months, 18 months or two years?

Mr. Arnold: Proposals such as that would be just as damaging as the minimum wage in wrecking the chances of families with young children of getting jobs. We should be bolstering the father in being the breadwinner, and structuring the tax system so that mothers can stay at home, as so many of them wish.

It is interesting to note that, for the average family with the mother caring full time for the children, the impact of the loss of her income and tax allowance benefit combined with the devaluing of the married couple's allowance and mortgage interest relief for families is a severe squeeze on family net income.

Tax and national insurance contributions for single persons on average income have declined from 31.5 per cent. in the last year of the Labour Government to 28.6 per cent. today, despite the increase in taxation in recent years. They have declined less for a married person, from 27.8 per cent. to 26.8 per cent., but the significant statistic is that the burden of taxation on married couples with two children under 11, assuming a non-earning wife and taking into account child benefit, has increased from 20.9 per cent. to 21.9 per cent.

A Conservative Government must pay attention to that. Our taxation policies have had an adverse impact on families, whereas the impact on single persons and married couples without families has improved. It is time that the Government took that very much on board.

The Treasury has benefited considerably from recent measures such as the reduction in the married couple's allowance. The married couple's allowance, as we recall, was introduced in 1991 with independent taxation, and it now applies to 10.5 million families. The Chancellor, by reducing that tax allowance from the 25 per cent. band to the 15 per cent. band this year, has made some considerable savings, and salt has been rubbed into the wounds of families by the impact of the so-called allowance restriction on personal tax coding, which draws attention to and emphasises the 15 per cent. band.

I wonder how many people realise that the gain for the Treasury and consequent loss for families has already increased to £2,090 million simply as a result of the downbanding, and that the impact since 1991-92 of not increasing the married couple's allowance for inflation has been a benefit for the Treasury at the expense of families, of a further £3 billion. The impact on families of the downbanding of mortgage interest relief at source has been that the Treasury has gained more than £1 billion at the expense of the family.

I hope, therefore, that, in preparing his Budget this autumn, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will produce a Budget for the family. I believe that he should restore the married couple's allowance to the standard rate band, which would cost the Treasury £2.4 billion. There should be no similar restoration of the additional person's allowance for single parents of children other than for those who are widowed, as that would be a disincentive for illegitimacy and for divorce.

A capacity should be introduced for non-working mothers with dependent children to transfer their basic allowance to their working husband. If that were to be done, there would be a major impact, worth £861 to the family, at a cost to the Treasury of £2.8 billion.

I believe that, in considering social and economic policies, we should consider the impact on the family. If the Government face up to those matters in the Budget in the autumn, not only will there be a significant effect on the employment market through releasing jobs currently carried out by mothers and making them available to less skilled males, which will have an economic benefit as a spin-off, but we shall reverse the tide that has worked against the family, to the detriment of the development and growth of our young people.

8.57 pm

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East): Few of my constituents would recognise themselves in the picture that the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) painted. In contrast to the smaller micro-economic analyses that have just been made, let me mention one or two global statistics.

Unemployment costs the nation between £20 billion and £30 billion per annum. The former Department of Employment's own figures clearly show the average cost of an unemployed person in terms of benefits and revenue and spending power forgone. That is the nature of what we face today.

It is all very well Conservative Members saying that unemployment has been falling for X months. Bearing in mind the way in which unemployment is measured, they cannot be accused of telling us anything that is not true, but, as other hon. Members have said, there have been so many changes in the way in which the employment statistics are collected in recent years that no proper comparison can now be made between when the Conservatives took office and the present day.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) said that the true comparison was between roughly 1,050,000 people in 1979 at the end of the Labour Government and 2.5 million now. We can accept with glad hearts and great pleasure the fact that some of our constituents have found work in recent months, but whatever Conservative Members tell us about unemployment falling, it does not alter the fact that the record of the Conservative Government on employment is abominable in every sense of the word.

As a result of the growth in unemployment, the social security system is less and less able to cope with the demands placed on it. Although the cost of social security in real terms has doubled, benefits paid are now worth less to the individual than in 1979. So we have had a doubling of the cost yet less support for people who are unemployed or otherwise unable to get into the labour market.

Other recent statistics show that one third of males aged 16 to 65, and therefore potentially economically active, are not in employment for one reason or another. It is no wonder that the social security budget is creaking at the seams. It is no use Conservative Members telling us that they intend to clamp down on scrounging. Opposition Members support that: we do not believe that people should be able to obtain by fraud, cheating or other methods benefits or anything else to which they are not properly and fully entitled.

Let me summarise a kind of framework. I talk of wealth, I talk of work and I talk of welfare—three Ws. Each one is a necessary step to the other, for without work—I mean real work that adds value—there can be no worth. Unless wealth is created, at a personal level or collectively, there can be no welfare. So we all know where we are starting from. We can now see in perspective what it means to have 2.5 million-plus people unemployed in this country. It means that the wealth-creating forces are diminished and that the wealth that would be created cannot be distributed in any way, never mind be kept in the wealth creator's pocket. It is lost and we cannot regain it. Conservative Members and, indeed, Opposition Members are concerned that money has been lost through strikes, illnesses and accidents at work, but now we have a deep self-inflicted wound.

For people who are in work, the quality of work has changed beyond recognition. At one end of the spectrum, it is certainly true that there has been massive enrichment of the few, but for the masses the quality of work has diminished. No longer can people with skills which they learnt perhaps in difficult circumstances necessarily transfer those skills to another job. The very technology that engineers, scientists and technicians have created has been used to dispossess those who have the skills of their rightful inheritance. It is paradoxical, but none the less that is the way in which technology has moved in the past 15 or 20 years.

The trade union rights that underpinned people's safety at work have been washed away over the years by legislation. Let me tell Conservative Members, and the world if it wants to listen, that where the economic system is dominated by the simple economics of supply and demand, when the demand for labour increases none of the changes that the Government have made will make a scrap of difference. The employees, the workers, the labour force will reclaim that which they think is theirs. The Government will have made no difference to the way in which the structural part of labour relations is played out in Britain. All that the Government will have done is to apply the cruel market forces of supply and demand, which simply mean that today employers can hold down wages simply by using the single economic tool of unemployment by frightening people that they might be out of work tomorrow. Tomorrow, when those people have jobs, the Government can be sure that their position will start to be redressed. The Government may understand it, but they will live to regret it if they do not.

Much remains to be done to restore a proper balance between unions and their members and employers and their organisations. Only when the scales are balanced and fairness prevails may we expect real progress.

Ministers claim that the number of employed people is rising, and to some extent that is borne out by the facts; but many of those jobs are part time and poorly paid. As for the minimum wage—

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): My hon. Friend is about to refer to the minimum wage. Does not low pay equal poor health, poor housing, poor social conditions and poor educational opportunities?

Mr. Purchase: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point, with which I shall deal in a moment.

The Conservative party has no right to press Labour to say what the minimum wage should or will be, when it will not say what its minimum wage is. When we ask, "What is the least for which anyone should work?", you have not a word to say. Is it 50p an hour? Is it £1 an hour?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. The hon. Gentleman must stop blaming the Chair.

Mr. Purchase: I seem not to learn these simple lessons, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise profusely—but, as you know, I am somewhat excitable about matters such as this.

It is incumbent on Conservative Members to tell us the amount for which they believe that people should work. If that amount is nothing, they should say so; if it is 50p an hour, they should tell us that it is 50p an hour. I suspect, however, that they know nothing of these matters, and that they therefore will not rise to the bait.

Wealth should be a function of work, adding real value to the goods and services that are provided. In that context, Britain once had a strong economy: we made things, exported things, ensured that the quality of the goods was first class and traded with the world. We held our own. It was not until the Conservatives implemented their policies of the late 1950s that we saw balance of payments problems that the country had not hitherto experienced in peacetime; even then, the Conservatives had begun to forget that, as an island economy—notwithstanding our wider role in Europe and, indeed, the world—we must import certain goods, apply our skills, initiative, innovation and invention and then export those goods at a price greater than that which we originally paid.

That put our balance of payments into perspective, and we got it right: we were paying our way. In 1964, however, a Labour Government inherited a balance of payments deficit of some £400 million. That does not sound a lot, but I think that it would amount to a considerable sum in modern-day money—an amount approximating to the balance of payments problems that we experienced throughout the late 1980s, which were resolved only through the sale of the family silver.

Making money has now become the way in which so-called wealth is created; but it is not real wealth. It is imaginary wealth, because it has no strength or material value. What do I mean by that? Let me give my answer in three ways. At a local level, while small firms struggle to win orders and to fulfil them on the basis of delivery dates, quality and price, thieves and burglars are ripping off the rest of society. In every street in every town, many people are involved in petty thieving of one sort of another, taking away the value that is created by people who go to work. Nationally, white-collar crime is rising inexorably. Scams are reported day and night in our local and national newspapers. At board room level, directors over-reward themselves in an immoral way. People are sitting on each other's remuneration committees, determining who will get what. [Interruption.]

Mr. Purchase: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Pike: People are ripping off pension funds.

Mr. Purchase: Indeed—speak a little louder.

We now know that many pension fund managers are paid on a results basis and are turning over shares, adding to our short-term financial problems just to line their own pockets. Pensioners are often the losers in such matters. Massive pension fund scams have taken place—not least the Maxwell disgrace, with all that that has meant—as a result of which people have tried to make changes, but without much success.

Currency speculators do not care what their activities will do to a nation state. It is simply a matter of pressing buttons—again using the technology created by scientists, engineers and technicians in this country and elsewhere. Their tools are being used against them. Speculators are turning their countries inside out at the press of a button. It is paradoxical. At the same time, they speculate internationally in shares, without a care for whether the company that they speculating for or against will go down the tube, and whether men and women will become unemployed. That is a "make money" society; it is not the "earn" society that Labour Members want to create. It is not about the spivs in the City of London.

On high and low pay, if what Conservative Members were saying about minimum and low pay were true, it is certain that Calcutta and the sweat shops would be a paradise, and that the City of London would be a desert, but we know that the opposite is true because these people speculate and exploit everywhere they go. Respect no longer exists for working men and women who create real wealth in this country. Some people think that large-scale international spivvery should be rewarded. That is not right.

Under the Tory Government, for the first time this century, we have seen the steady—at times almost imperceptible—reversal of the way in which income is distributed in favour of people who have the least. For the first time in a century, that worthy civilised trend has been reversed under this Government.

What does it mean? With so many people out of work, with the social security system under so much pressure, the ideals of Beveridge—for the welfare state to act as a safety net, but always recognising that we would have a society that depended on full employment, however that was defined—are creaking under the strain. The rich are getting very rich and the poor are getting very poor—such is the society that has been created in Britain today.

The value of benefits has diminished but their total cost has doubled since 1979. What has been the result of the benefits culture? In many cases, people, especially the young, have lost any understanding of the connections between work, wealth and welfare. They believe that, broadly speaking, wealth and welfare drop on the mat in the form of a giro cheque. You have robbed them of their dignity, of their right to work—

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): The Tories have.

Mr. Purchase: The Conservatives have robbed them. I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I know that you are too kind a man to do that.

The Conservatives have robbed those people of their dignity and of their understanding of the connections, which are so important for a civilised life in which we can both give and take when that is necessary. Young people have borne, and will continue to bear, the brunt of the Government's policies. Inequality is growing every day and it is reaching obscene levels. An elderly woman with disabilities came to my surgery on Saturday. She wants and needs to move from her present council flat to a ground-floor flat. The council are willing to relocate her, but it cannot afford to pay the costs of her furniture removal. She went to social security as she is on income support and was advised that she would have to apply for a loan in order to pay her removal costs.

That woman worked for most of her life and her husband paid into pension schemes all his working life. Now, at 70, she is reduced to having to apply for a loan to move house on account of her disabilities. Is that the society that the Conservatives laud in their amendment? They should disown it without further delay because that inequality is unacceptable in a civilised world.

From time to time I like to compare levels of inequality in this country. One could compare the woman to whom I referred with the Queen, the richest woman in the world, who is so rich that she does not know how much money she has.

In the world created by the Conservatives drug dealers earn more money than centre-lathe operators, theft is more valued than earning a living and gambling has been elevated to a grand scale by the national lottery. People now think that their only hope of escape is a win on the lottery—whether it is £1,000 or the figure offered last weekend. Gambling has been institutionalised and the state has become a bookmaker.

My town has an awful reputation for prostitution. Wolverhampton apparently has more prostitutes per capita than any other town in England. Young girls as young as 11 are known to ply their trade in my town. The House condemns sex tourism, but we have it on our doorstep courtesy of a Conservative Government. I could describe the Government—if it is not unparliamentary, Mr. Deputy Speaker—as a state pimp because of the policies that they have introduced and the way in which they have allowed society to rot from the roots up. I do not believe that that is too strong a description of the Conservative Government.

9.17 pm

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I have been allocated the princely total of three minutes in which to devastate the House with the erudition of my remarks.

I entirely support the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who opened the debate. I believe that he is determined to use taxpayers' money to provide incentives to get people into work rather than use it to pay people for not working. I commend him for that approach.

I am worried, however, when I see the scale and the range of incentives. Every incentive, such as the jobseeker's allowance, back-to-work bonus and all sorts of other benefits to top up earnings, comes out of the taxpayers' pockets and taxpayers on low wages will be less motivated to work to build up their family fortunes. Therefore, I suggest that perhaps it would be better to examine family incomes as a whole and not rise to the Labour party's bait.

Labour Members keep grinding on about the necessity of introducing minimum wage laws. I do not wish to rehearse the sensible arguments advanced by Conservative Members about why minimum wage laws are a bad idea. It has been mentioned several times that President Clinton is in favour of minimum wage laws. I am not surprised about that because President Clinton is a socialist by our standards. Of course President Clinton commends the concept, but in the United States of America—which has had minimum wage laws for many years—unemployment among unskilled and minority groups in particular has persistently increased relative to employment. Minimum wage laws have removed from employers the cost of their discrimination. If an employer must pay a certain wage regardless, he will tend—for whatever prejudiced reason he may have—to choose the most attractive candidate. Minimum wages always discriminate against the people that Opposition Members wish to help.

I invite my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security to explore other areas of job creation, particularly those associated with home and family work. Recently, the French have created many new jobs for young and unskilled people in homes whose family members go out to work. In France, if one needs someone to help with domestic duties—such as looking after an elderly relative or small children—one can offset the cost against the family's gross income.

Wages within the family should also be considered. There should be less pressure for every job to achieve a minimum wage starting point. In many households, one wage supplements another. If a woman is prepared to take a part-time job at a relatively low wage—perhaps because it is unskilled—to supplement her family income, that is as valid a reason for working as that of the family's top wage earner. Considering family income as a whole will bring some sanity to our attitudes to wages.

Ms Harriet Harman (Peckham): This debate has shown that despite all the drama surrounding the Tory leadership election, nothing has changed. The stark divide between this side of the House and the Government remains. The Tories have brought unemployment, division and insecurity—and they have produced no policies today that will change that. Labour believes that the task of government is to modernise our economy and to build our community. Britain needs new policies for economic success and social renewal.

We need nothing less than a skills revolution, to put our businesses and economy at the front line of economic competitiveness, and to help people to get work and get on in their jobs. However, when the Secretary of State for Education and Employment was Secretary of State for Employment, she cut training. We need an attack on the national scandal of poverty pay. While privatised utility bosses award themselves huge pay increases, millions of men and women at work struggle in the twilight world of low pay. When the right hon. Lady was Secretary of State for Employment, she abolished the low pay protection of wages councils. Again today, the Tories have rejected a national minimum wage.

We need a comprehensive strategy to tackle unemployment, take people off benefit and put them to work—in particular, to end the menace of people being trapped on the dole for years. Again in today's debate, the Tories boasted that unemployment is a problem solved, and they plan instead to cut benefits to the unemployed.

We need to make people at work feel more secure. House prices fall because no one can plan ahead. High street shops struggle because people do not want to spend. The Tories tell us that a fearful and insecure work force is a good thing. People throughout the country know what is needed—but we have Tory failure and no change in policies that have failed.

The Prime Minister has been re-elected leader of his party—just, and Cabinet posts have changed hands. What has changed in the real world in Britain today? What has changed for the unemployed? Nothing. Still the Government deny that unemployment is a problem; still they refuse to take action to take people off the dole and put them into work; still they cut the benefit bill, not by putting people into work but by cutting the amount of benefit that people have to live on. There are cuts in unemployment benefit—from 12 months to six months; and cuts in help with mortgage payments for the unemployed. But the problem of unemployment remains—as my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) put it, people of working age are not at work.

What has changed for the young black unemployed man in London? Still, 60 per cent. of young black men under the age of 24 are without a job. What has changed for the people of Manchester? My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) told us movingly about the problems of unemployment that remain in his constituency. The Government would simply sweep them aside and pretend that they do not exist.

Unemployment is scarring our communities. As my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) said, one in six men in Rotherham is out of work. Unemployment is scarring communities in every region of Scotland and Wales—and still the Conservative Government reject commonsense proposals for immediate action to put people back to work. I refer to the release of council house receipts to enable councils to start building again, an environmental task force to provide work and improve environmental standards, and a tax relief of £75 as an incentive to employers to take on people who have been unemployed for more than two years. The Government reject all these proposals, claiming that unemployment is not a problem.

Unemployment is a problem, however, not just for the unemployed but for those in work, because it is one of the major reasons why people in work feel insecure. What has changed for them? Nothing. Will people feel more secure in their jobs when they read in the newspapers that "Tarzan's in charge"? I do not think so. Will house prices rise now that the Department of Employment has been abolished? I do not think so. There is an epidemic of insecurity at work which has swept from the private sector through to the public sector, from manual workers through to management. There are too many people who fear that each pay packet may be their last.

People have no long-term confidence in their employment. But to buy a house or even a car they have to make a long-term commitment: 25 years for a mortgage, five years for a loan on a new car or three for a loan on a second-hand car. Yet today one fifth of employees are out of their jobs within a year. More and more jobs are on temporary contracts. Negative equity traps people in their homes and makes them nervous about spending. They are afraid to move or to take risks—afraid to plan for the future. No wonder house prices have fallen in real terms by 30 per cent. in the past six years. Just because the Prime Minister is temporarily more secure in his job does not mean that other people are more secure in theirs out in the real world.

People know that the only way they will feel secure is if the economy is growing strongly—not boom and bust. They know that they need a fair framework of rights at work, including the right to join a union. And they need the right education and skills.

The new First Secretary of State and Deputy Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Education and Employment have been touring television and radio studios saying that the abolition of the Department of Employment shows that training and skills are now to be the Government's top priority. I challenge the right hon. Lady: is she making training a priority, or will she simply implement the training cuts that are set to run for the next three years? Already cuts in training are under way for this year, next year, and the year after. The training budget is to be cut by 12 per cent. in real terms over the next three years. Will she stop those cuts or will she implement them? Training for Work, the main adult training programme for the unemployed, is to be cut this year, next year and the year after. Will the right hon. Lady stop that or implement it?

We have no doubt that the cuts will be implemented. When the right hon. Lady was Secretary of State for Employment she chopped back the Department's training budget by £100 million over three years. The promises that the right hon. Lady will make tonight are already broken. The people know that the Tories are the Government of broken promises. They are the Government that we cannot trust. They promise to make training a priority but they cut it back to the bone.

When the right hon. Lady was Secretary of State for Employment she did nothing to provide training to those in work who need it most, the low paid with no skills. Let there be no mistake about it, this is a public policy issue. Today's worker without skills is tomorrow's long-term unemployed. The Tories reject our proposals that would ensure that all employers would invest in the training and development of their employees.

What has changed with low pay? The answer is that it has become worse. People know that our society is riven with unfairness, division and inequality. There is excessively high pay at the top and excessively low pay at the bottom. It makes for a divided society and an inefficient economy.

Mr. Pike: Is it not a fact that the low paid who are on family credit can be hit to the extent that for every pound that they receive at a certain stage they may benefit by only 3p? Is it not time that the Government did something to help those people?

Ms Harman: That is right. Those who are trapped in low pay and depend on benefits find that they are no better off if they earn more because of the pound-for-pound withdrawal of benefit. The low paid who are trapped in poverty and dependency cannot escape. That is why we must have a national minimum wage. The gap between top executives and their employees is twice as wide in the United Kingdom as it is in Japan. Cedric Brown has become famous for his huge pay increase while millions of our fellow citizens work all hours yet still struggle to make ends meet.

[Ms Harman]

These are the figures. Over 1 million—

Mr. Duncan: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Harman: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman if he will say whether he is prepared to justify 300,000 people earning less than £1.50 an hour. Does he think that that is acceptable? Will he justify pay of £1.50 an hour?

Mr. Duncan: I do not like the fact that many people are earning only that amount, but to tax the rich and introduce a minimum wage would not solve the problem. The hon. Lady was in her place when I talked about a minimum wage. Does she accept that if a minimum wage were set at below the level that an employer was prepared to pay it would be an irrelevance? Does she agree also that if it were set above that level it would undoubtedly have a detrimental effect on employment? Will she answer those questions and tell us at what level in today's circumstances she and her party would set a minimum wage?

Ms Harman: The hon. Gentleman says that he does not like people earning less than £1.50 or £2.50 an hour. The Government, however, have resolutely set their face against doing anything to increase such rates of pay. Far from that, they have removed protection that would have prevented people earning lower and lower rates of pay. I shall come to the hon. Gentleman's argument about the level of a minimum wage later.

Who on the Government Benches will justify pay of £1.50 an hour? Is it the Tory economic miracle after 17 years to threaten people with pay of £1.50 an hour or no job? We are not faced with an accident.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Answer the question.

Ms Harman: I shall respond to it later.

It is not that the Government do not know what to do about low pay. It is not merely that the Government do not care about low pay. Low pay is not the consequence of Government incompetence or even Government neglect. It is a central part of their strategy of low pay, deregulation, insecurity, competition by means of even lower pay, cutting costs and a fearful work force. Under the Government low pay is not only a national scandal but an instrument of Government economic policy.

The Government are not trying to prevent low pay. They are in favour of it. The Secretary of State for Education and Employment, when she was Employment Secretary, abolished the wages council. She stripped away low-pay protection from 2.5 million workers. The Government are now asking the unemployed, before they can get their benefit, before they can get the jobseeker's allowance:

"What is the lowest wage you are willing to work for?"

They are using the unemployed to drive down wages still further.

But the British people reject the cruelty and the unfairness of low pay and they reject the Tory strategy of competing on low pay. Our determination to act on low pay is founded on our belief that the Government have a responsibility to reduce divisions, and that economic success for this country can be achieved only by being a high-skill, high-tech, high-investment economy.

We believe that low pay is a problem for the low-paid. It is also a problem for the taxpayer and for our society as a whole. It is a problem for the low-paid who struggle to make ends meet, who are trapped in benefit dependency and who work longer and longer hours. Low pay is a problem, too, for the public purse, because when employers do not pay proper wages, the taxpayer has to pick up the bill for housing benefit, council tax benefit, income support and family credit. In the past four years, the cost of those benefits for people in work has doubled and it now stands at £2.4 billion—£100 a year for every taxpayer to subsidise low pay. Are the Government going to justify that? Top-up benefits should be precisely that, not a subsidy for employers. That point was made forcibly by the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth).

We believe that low pay is a problem that demands Government action, and we will take action.

The Tories will not take on the arguments—

Mr. Duncan rose—

Ms Harman: The Tories will not take head on the arguments about the minimum wage, so they say that if we have a minimum wage people would be concerned about losing their jobs. It is true that people are concerned about losing their jobs.

Mr. Duncan: What rate?

Ms Harman: I will get to that point in my speech, if the hon. Gentleman will give me a break.

It is true that people are concerned about losing their job—15 years of Tory rule have certainly made sure of that—but a minimum wage, where it is sensibly introduced, does not cost jobs and we shall introduce it sensibly. [Interruption.] Around the world there are many different examples of different methods of minimum wage fixing, but they all have—[Interruption.] Conservative Members are not listening. They have asked all afternoon what our approach is to the minimum wage. I am about to tell them if they will just keep quiet. [Interruption.]

All around the world, many different methods are used by different countries to fix a minimum wage [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I will have no more barracking from sedentary positions. The hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan) has asked his question. He might now listen. [Interruption.] Order.

Ms Harman: All around the world, there are difficult examples of how different countries, with Governments of the left and of the right, fix a minimum wage, and they all have one thing in common: they involve both sides of industry—employers and unions [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. [HON. MEMBERS: "Name him."] I am tempted to name him. I have warned the hon. Gentleman. Another murmur from the hon. Gentleman and he will be named.

Ms Harman: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Those countries all have one thing in common: they involve both sides of industry—employers and unions—in coming together to agree the level for the minimum wage, and that is the approach that we shall take in Government. I have consulted many employers in manufacturing and services about the methods for implementing low-pay protection. We shall carry on doing just that in Government. We will establish a low-pay commission to recommend the level of the minimum wage, just as the wages councils did.

Employers and unions in consultation—that is what business is asking us to do to fix the minimum wage. We will not listen to the Tories; we will listen to employers and unions. There will be consultation involving both sides of industry, which is what they do in other countries. That is what happened in this country with the wages councils, that is what Winston Churchill did and that is what we will do in government.

The Conservative concerns about job losses are crocodile tears; they are bogus. When we introduced the Equal Pay Act 1970, women's pay was increased by law, and employers and Conservatives said that it would cost women's jobs and drive them back to the home. It did not happen. When the Secretary of State abolished the wages councils, she said that ending low pay protection would involve an increase in jobs. It did not happen. Pay went down and jobs in the wages councils sectors were lost. Now we have the worst of all words: low pay and no new jobs.

There is no evidence from this country or from anywhere in the world that low pay protection, when sensibly introduced, costs jobs. In all other developed countries, a floor under wages is a matter of consensus between parties on the right and parties on the left. Everywhere else, it is normal and is regarded as a necessary minimum standard. The Government have failed to recognise the important role for Government in a changing labour market. They do not understand that Government should make people feel partners in change, not victims of it. They do not understand that the role of the Government is to help people combine work and family responsibilities. They do not understand that it is the role of Government to ensure that there is a skilled and confident work force.

The Tory policies have failed and the British people know it; that is why they do not trust the Tories. The Deputy Prime Minister is going round the television studios talking about a new start. If he went round the country and talked to people, he would realise that the British people do not trust this Government. The only new start they want is a new Government for this country.

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mrs. Gillian Shephard): The debate has been long. It must have been a disappointing one for the Opposition because it is, after all, their Supply day. For there to have been only two or three Labour Back Benchers in the Chamber for long stretches is obviously a scandal and a disgrace. It is better to pass a veil altogether over the attendance of the Liberal Democrats, who were not in their place for many hours.

The debate was opened in an elegant, even donnish, way by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). However, no amount of elegance or donnish charm could disguise the fact that he was circling round the vacuum that is Labour policy. He said nothing whatsoever.

I should not fail to mention the quite extraordinary contribution by the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner). Not only did he treat the House to a dazzling display of "Where's the ball?", but he signally failed to convince the House of his altruistic concern about the merger of the Department for Education and the Department of Employment. I remind him that "vanish" is an intransitive verb. We should, perhaps, forgive the hon. and learned Gentleman. It is not only his birthday tomorrow, but it was his 40th wedding anniversary last week, as he announced to an astonished House last Thursday. In my later remarks, I shall aim to dispel his wilder fantasies and anxieties.

My hon. Friends the Members for Romford (Sir M. Neubert), for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth), for Surrey, East (Mr. Ainsworth), for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Duncan), for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) and for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) made extremely valuable contributions to the debate, reminding the House not only of the need to be realistic about the problems that we face, but of the welcome fact that unemployment has fallen for 21 consecutive months and that we have a higher proportion of people of working age in work than the European average. They reminded us that a minimum wage would destroy enterprise and would cost jobs. Since the Labour party is unable to define the level of a minimum wage, what they say on the matter is so much hot air. My hon. Friends also reminded us of the opportunities and—very importantly—the current context.

Mr. Duncan: Did my right hon. Friend hear what I heard and what I believe the Official Report will confirm? Did not the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) promise—I think that is the right word—to give us the level at which she would set a minimum wage? Did she not break that promise within five minutes by refusing to do so? Will my right hon. Friend now invite the hon. Lady to give that number, without which the Opposition's policy is worth nothing?

Mrs. Shephard: Whether or not the hon. Lady made such a promise, she certainly did not give a number. Without a number, all talk of a minimum wage is so much hot air. It is clearly the intention of the Labour party to introduce a minimum wage, but as it knows that such a minimum wage would destroy enterprise and cut jobs, it does not dare to set a figure.

We heard much in the debate about poverty and job security. That is as it should be. Those are important issues and it is right that they should be debated. We heard a good deal less from Opposition Members about the context and about the nature of the world as it is now. We have a global economy that is fast moving and competitive, and we heard little from the Opposition about how the country is to thrive and prosper in those circumstances.

Predictably, we heard nothing whatsoever from Opposition Members about how jobs and security can be created. All we had from Opposition Members was a refusal to look at the world as it now is and a deep reluctance to face the reality of change or to master that change. As we approach a new century and a new millennium, we must look forward and prepare positively for the challenges that those will bring. There is no place for those who look only backwards, or for people whose hearts are in the Ministry of Labour that was founded in the 1890s and not in the Department for Education and Employment that has been founded in the 1990s.

The world is changing fast, and change engenders uncertainty and concern. That is not unique to this country. Right across the developed world, people feel insecure about jobs and threatened by new technology and by the opening up of markets, as tariff barriers disappear. I understand those fears, but technology change is here and will not go away, and nor will changing patterns of world trade. When GATT was formed, tariffs averaged 40 per cent. They are now down to 3 per cent. Britain is a part of the world marketplace and there are formidable competitors in that marketplace.

Mr. MacShane: May I invite the Secretary of State to throw away the script from which she is carefully reading and tell us what she thinks without the aid of a scripted speech?

Mrs. Shephard: Dear me—what an insightful contribution from the hon. Gentleman. I wish that the hon. Gentleman could have seen the faces of his colleagues as he ground on and on earlier in a speech full of carefully composed quotations. The hon. Gentleman might like to listen carefully as I proceed.

What is new and will increasingly face us in the next century is competition from low-wage economies whose peoples are as well-educated and as highly motivated as our own. Those economies are developing rapidly in south-east Asia, south America, eastern Europe and Africa. That is a challenge that young people who are now in our schools and universities will face when they leave formal education and start to earn a living. It is our challenge too, because it is our task to equip our young people when they leave formal education not just with the knowledge and skills that they need to survive, but with the attitude of mind to grasp the opportunities that they will be offered to enable them to thrive and prosper.

There is one way and one way only to guarantee job security and the benefits, whether material or otherwise, that come with it. That is to create enterprises in Britain which can take on the best competition in the world and beat it. To achieve that, people who work in those firms must have the skills and knowledge to do so. In tomorrow's world, with which we are concerned, industrial and commercial success will be based on knowledge, design and innovation.

We are steadily shaking off the legacy of the 1970s. We now have one of the best industrial relations records in the world. Productivity growth is as good, or better, than anywhere in Europe and inflation is once again under control and down to levels last seen more than 30 years ago.

Of course I accept that insecurity over jobs is a real factor. That is why the Department provides more than 1.5 million employment and training opportunities to help unemployed people get the new jobs that they want. The Employment Service plays a vital role, working with training and enterprise councils, to provide jobs and training. More than 200,000 new vacancies are being notified to job centres every month and unemployed people are getting those jobs. Britain now has fewer people claiming unemployment benefit than any other major country in Europe. More of our adult population have jobs than in any other major European country.

We have also made progress in education. The knowledge and skills of those joining the work force for the first time are improving. Less than a quarter of our young people got five good GCSEs 15 years ago, now it is over 40 per cent. The number of young people gaining two GCE A-levels has doubled to 28 per cent. since 1979. Britain now graduates more of its young people than just about any country in Europe. That is a record of achievement and of consistent improvement, and a solid base on which to build Britain's skills. There remains a lot to do, but the framework is in place and the improvements are there and are measurable.

Much has been said tonight about division and I accept that there has been a divide in this country—a divide between the academic and the vocational. It is a false divide. That is why the new Department for Education and Employment has been so widely welcomed—

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): By whom?

Mrs. Shephard: I will tell the hon. Gentleman. The Association of Metropolitan Authorities, for example, strongly welcomed and supported the merger, which has been its policy for many years. It has been welcomed by the Secondary Heads Association, which said,

"We welcome the merger and have argued for it in the past. There is a need for coherent linking of provision for post-16s."

The Professional Association of Teachers said:

"This is very good news. PAT has been suggesting it for some time. Education and training need to be considered as a whole."

The National Union of Teachers welcomed it, saying:

"Bringing education and training together should serve to promote vocational education and the development of lifelong learning."

The National Commission on Education welcomed it, as did the Institute of Directors, which said that it is "a sensible rationalisation, drawing together policies for education and training."

The Confederation of British Industry has welcomed it. Howard Davies said:

"The CBI welcomes the changes announced today by the Government. We have long argued that responsibilities for these two vital areas should be brought closer together. The proposed structure will help to provide a clearer focus and more coherent policy formation."

It welcomes it because it can see the opportunities that it will bring. It sees that in our schools—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. While one can have no objection to hon. Members having conversations, they must be quiet. It is very noisy indeed on both sides of the House and I ask for a little less noise.

Mrs. Shephard: Those bodies can see that there will be positive benefits and new opportunities in our schools. Schools need industry and employers increasingly play an important role, giving teaching materials, supporting events and providing motivation on careers, particularly to young people who may need just that motivation and who find school days irksome. Employers can see that, as young people from the age of 14 onwards start to make those choices, helped by the invigorated careers service, they will be better informed if careers advisers, teachers and employers work more closely together. They can see that more and more young people are staying on at school after 16. Over 90 per cent. now stay on compared with less than one in three in 1979. They know that young people face a bewildering range of options—academic or vocational—which we can tackle with no turf wars through the new Department. They can see that we can better co-ordinate key policies to drive up skill levels and promote business success.

We can encourage closer links between education and the business world. We can promote greater coherence between academic and vocational qualifications. We can encourage even closer relationships between further education and TECs.

Mr. Mackinlay: What young people want to hear from the right hon. Lady tonight is how they can get jobs that are appropriate to their skills and aptitudes when they leave college or university. Does she not acknowledge that thousands of young people leaving college and university face skivvy jobs or jobs that are totally inappropriate to the expensive training and education that the state has provided, which will provide them with no job satisfaction? What will she do to provide real jobs for skilled people who have a great deal to contribute?

Mrs. Shephard: As this is an Opposition Supply day, I had hoped for a few ideas from the Opposition, but they have not been forthcoming. The hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) obviously has not noticed that unemployment has been falling for the past 21 months and that graduate unemployment has also been falling. I remind him of that and point out that it means a number of things. It means that the Government's labour market reforms are working; that the best help for unemployed and employed people is the sound and stable economic policies that we are pursuing; and that the Employment Service has done a magnificent job in placing unemployed people back into work. All those facts should be obvious to the hon. Gentleman, as should the nonsense of his party's policy of a minimum wage, which would destroy enterprise and jobs.

I was describing the benefits that will flow from the merger of the Department for Education and the Department of Employment. It is only the Labour party, linked as always with its old friends in the TUC, that cannot see those benefits. It is locked in the past and condemned by its knee-jerk reaction to oppose any change. Only Labour Members fail to see that this country's future lies with a skilled and well-educated work force.

The hon. Member for Peckham may be in touch with the TUC but she is out of touch with opinion in industry and the teaching profession.

Ms Harman: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Shephard: No, I have only two minutes left.

Who will speak for the Labour party on those matters in future? We wait to see. On tonight's showing, it is unlikely to be the hon. Member for Peckham, who arrived with her indignation prepared in advance. Unfortunately, she arrived without the answers. Yet again, she has proved herself incapable of answering the simplest of questions about Labour's intentions. She cannot answer the basic question: what would be the level of a minimum wage? May I give the hon. Lady a friendly warning? She may be wise to avoid making a commitment on that matter because if the experiences of her unfortunate colleague, the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), are anything to go by, it normally suffices for an Opposition spokesman to make a policy statement for it to be countermanded by Labour high command, sometimes within months, sometimes within weeks, and once within two hours. How sad it is that the House has been subjected to the sort of imprecision and vacillation to which, alas, I became all too accustomed in respect of education. The interests of children in schools, students in our colleges and universities—

Mr. Gordon McMaster (Paisley, South) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 30 (Questions on amendments) and agreed to.

MADAM SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the increase of 38 per cent. in average incomes and the rise in spending of all income groups since 1979; welcomes the fact that the United Kingdom has fewer people claiming unemployment benefits and more jobs than any other major European country; welcomes the creation of a new Department for Education and Employment to improve further Britain's skill base and competitive position; applauds the £700 million package of measures to improve incentives to work for those on benefits and increase the rewards of work for lower-paid families; welcomes further initiatives, such as the Jobseeker's Allowance, the Back to Work Bonus, and the pilot of an Earnings Top-up for childless people on low earnings; believes that supplementing low pay to help people into work is preferable to destroying jobs through a statutory national minimum wage and the social chapter; and recognises that improving opportunity and the reward for effort is less socially divisive than encouraging dependency and the politics of envy.

Competition (Local Government)

10.15 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir Paul Beresford): I beg to move,

That the draft Local Government Act 1988 (Competition) (Defined Activities) Order 1995, which was laid before this House on 8th June, be approved.

The order completes the Government's programme for the extension of compulsory competitive tendering to white collar professional services by adding financial, information technology and personnel services to the statutory CCT regime. It also amends the current definition of building cleaning to including the cleaning of police buildings.

CCT has, of course, brought many benefits to local taxpayers in the past 15 years, but perhaps more significant in the longer term have been the improvements in service quality and efficiency brought about by better management and a clearer strategic focus. Not least have been savings which we estimate at well over £400 million.

The Government first set out their intention to extend CCT to white collar professional services in November 1991. Since then, we have been engaged in a thorough debate with local authority representatives on the framework for white collar CCT. Parliament approved orders defining the first of these—legal and construction and property services—in November last year.

On 18 May, we announced to the House details of the regime which would apply to the remaining services described in the order. The definitions are part of a package which also includes the competition percentages for this work, revised rules for tendering and the implementation timetables, all of which will be set out in further statutory instruments once the order receives Parliament's approval.

In many cases, decisions on these matters have entailed careful judgments which balance the need to bring competition to bear on white collar services with the operational flexibility that individual authorities rightly seek. I intend to monitor closely the implementation of white collar CCT, and will undertake to reconsider any aspect of the regime if there is hard evidence of problems in applying the new rules.

We have met many of the concerns of local authorities in putting together a challenging but, I believe, fair regime. CCT will not impose a rigid model for service delivery, but instead will encourage innovation, improved quality and greater value for money. The onus is now on local authorities to respond positively to the challenge of competition.

I commend the order to the House.

10.18 pm

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): As the Minister pointed out, the order defines the activities to be included in the Government's latest extension of compulsory competitive tendering to financial services, information technology services and personnel services. The Labour party has some misgivings about CCT. We would like to raise one or two issues this evening and persuade the Minister to respond to them.

The Government are still intent on breaking up local government services even though there is now growing evidence that CCT costs more than it saves. CCT is causing the loss of tens of thousands of jobs in local government, and it discriminates largely against women. The quality of services provided by local government is falling dramatically as services move into the private sector.

As local government is swamped by bureaucracy as a result of compulsory competitive tendering and the preparation for, in particular, white collar CCT, and the private companies cut the terms and conditions of employees in order to maximise profit, there is increasing concern about the abuses and collusion that appear to be taking place among private contractors.

Experience of blue collar CCT has shown that we can expect more of the same problems next year as white collar CCT is implemented. The Government's insistence on CCT is based on the premise that quality will be improved and costs reduced. The Minister mentioned cost reductions of £400 million; perhaps he will tell us where he obtained that figure, which tends to be contradicted by information available to the Opposition. To us, the opposite appears to be the case: costs appear to be increasing, and quality appears to be declining.

The Government's own research found that costs had decreased by an average of some 6.5 per cent., over a range of a 15 per cent. cut through to a 2 to 3 per cent. increase. That has been achieved mainly through the imposition by private companies of pay reductions, reductions in holiday entitlement and, of course, considerable job losses. In-house contracts have been won at a similar cost in jobs and conditions of employment.

It is unlikely that any such cost savings will be replicated in white collar CCTs. The percentage of work to be put out to competitive tender is smaller; the type of work is more quality-orientated; and there is a fear that the bureaucracy involved will far outweigh any savings to be achieved. In fact, the sheer volume of work involved in preparation for compulsory competitive tendering has added some 10 per cent. to the costs—and, in bureaucracy terms, to the value of the contract.

White collar CCT places a greater emphasis on quality than blue collar CCT. Many local government departments have built up technical expertise that will be fragmented with the introduction of white collar CCT; many in-house departments will lose the expertise that they have built up over a number of years. In my view, white collar CCT is unnecessary. At present, there is considerable downward pressure on local government as a result of recent financial settlements: over the past few years, many local authorities have been squeezed, and many of the areas that we are debating have suffered cuts as a result of capping and other Government restraints.

Is compulsory competitive tendering saving money, and does it discriminate against women? The Minister will know of a report compiled by the Centre for Public Services, on behalf of the Equal Opportunities Commission, which published some startling findings. It involved a case study of four services and 39 specific instances, and concluded that, in those four services alone, there have been 74,000 job losses. It also stated that the cost of unemployment, combined with the loss of income resulting from job losses, cuts in hours, loss of holiday retainers and lower wages, was some £41.2 million in the four services.

Gender differences were highly significant, changes in women's employment accounting for £32 million, or 70 per cent., of the cost of increased unemployment and loss of income to central Government. The study calculated cost savings to be only about £16.4 million—a sum outweighed by costs of £41.2 million. Nationally, over the four services, we have a figure of £126 million. Put another way, for every £1 million of CCT savings, the cost to the Government and to the public purse—and so to unemployment benefit, family credit and other benefits—is £2 million.

Women's employment fell by 22 per cent., and male employment by 12 per cent. Obviously, a higher proportion of women are affected by CCT. Average hours declined by 25 per cent. The decline in hours and pay means that the weekly earnings of a greater number of women are below the national insurance lower earnings limit, and that those women are often excluded from employment protection.

There is a trend towards multiple jobs. Women have a number of contracts with the same local authority or private contractor, which bring them above the national insurance threshold only when they are combined. Many local authorities and companies are happy for women to remain below that threshold, so that they do not have to contribute to the national insurance fund.

More than 200,000 white collar and professional staff, men and women, will be affected by the extension of CCT from 1996. Four out of five women's jobs affected by white collar CCT are in low-paid grades. Does the Minister accept those findings, and if so, what action does he propose to take as a result of those conclusions? It is obvious that the impact on women's employment is highly significant.

Those problems are likely to be replicated in white collar CCT in personnel, information technology and financial services, as quite a high number of female full-time jobs exist in those sectors. What will the Minister therefore do about that report? Does he accept it, and if not, will he, at the very least, commission his own research? At the very best, he should shelve the whole white collar CCT programme until those issues have been far more thoroughly researched. If he does not accept the report, I should like to hear his reasons why.

On job losses overall, 12 per cent. of local government jobs have been lost. Some 167,000 manual jobs were lost between 1989 and 1993.

We come to the issues of efficiency and competition. Local government is required to achieve a 6 per cent. return on capital used in local government. That condition does not apply to private companies—no requirement exists for that 6 per cent. return. Private sector companies can make a loss, and it does not affect the fact that they hold that contract. Surely that is unfair competition and militates against efficiency.

For example, in grounds maintenance, in 1994-95 the contractor AAH Environmental made a loss of £3 million, which was sustained through the parent company AAH plc. The highways direct service organisation of Bradford metropolitan borough council, however, is to be closed from April 1996 because of a loss of £1.18 million in 1993-94, despite the fact that, in previous years, it had achieved surpluses in other activities. That loss, however, cannot be offset in the same way as such losses can be in the private sector.

Having said that, some 85 per cent. of direct service organisations are achieving their target. Those DSOs plough back the profits and surpluses they make from CCT to a far greater extent than Conservative authorities or authorities controlled by other than Labour councillors.

Competition has decreased. There is overwhelming evidence of cartels and collusion. In building cleaning, four companies have 29 per cent. of the contracts. In grounds maintenance, five companies have 53 per cent. of the contracts. In school meals, three companies have 78 per cent. of the contracts; and so it goes on. In those sectors, therefore, CCT appears not to have increased competition at all.

In May this year, 11 private contractors were found guilty of price rigging. The companies involved in tendering in areas such as financial services will be far bigger and better able to offset any losses on particular contracts. The application of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 has persuaded some private contractors that it is not worth tendering within local government, because they cannot derive profits from cutting jobs, hours of work and conditions of employment. For example, Securicor recently sold its cleaning company and AAH—the company that I just mentioned—is to sell off its environmental services division.

The quality of the services provided by the private sector has declined dramatically. I recently attended a conference at which the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, West (Mr. Jones), said that over-emphasis on quality of service in local government would be viewed as anti-competitive behaviour. So local authorities will now be prevented from concentrating on providing quality services, because that will be regarded as anti-competitive. The idea of quality service provision has gone out of the window in favour of providing the cheapest service.

There are numerous examples of contracts being terminated because of quality issues. I shall name only my favourite one. The West Wiltshire local authority sacked its grounds maintenance contractor which had failed to achieve the targets stated on the contract, because it said that the "grass was growing too quickly". In April 1995, The Daily Telegraph said:

> "The Government's drive to privatise council services is in crisis . . . Scores of contractors have gone bust or been sacked, costs are rising and local government auditors have given warning about the increasing risks of corruption . . . Some of the contractors have also expressed doubts . . . particularly when (CCT) compels councils to privatise, often against their will, and attracts over-aggressive bidding with a resultant low priority on quality".

That quote comes from a newspaper that is not exactly pro-Labour.

Finally, I refer to the section of the regulations concerning police buildings. It has been highlighted that the requirement for police authorities to put out their building cleaning to private contract could jeopardise the security of those buildings. A number of police buildings serve a dual purpose, and many others have a security requirement. Trade unions and other bodies involved with police authorities and building cleaning point out that that security could be put at risk by contracting out work to the private sector.

It is clear that CCT is costly, more and more inefficient and provides a poorer quality of service. The emphasis is on excluding local government in favour of private sector profit on the basis of dogma. There is a cost in jobs, levels of pay, conditions of work and, above all, in terms of quality of service to the council tax payer, who is required to accept the cheapest available service. I ask the Minister to reconsider the order, and particularly the issue of discrimination against women.

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): As I have expressed my views and those of my Liberal Democrat colleagues about compulsory competitive tendering to the House on various occasions, my remarks tonight shall be brief.

I have always argued that there are clear benefits in introducing competitive tendering for some public services. Competition can help to eliminate waste and it can put the spotlight on the level of service required at what cost. Moreover, external contractors can sometimes possess a useful expertise which is not available within a given local authority. The opportunity for a local authority to choose between its own expertise and that of other outside contractors can only enhance that authority's ability to provide quality services with good value for money.

However, we must be clear that, in order to gain full advantage from competitive tendering, we must allow local authorities to use it as a part of their individual management and organisational policies. The compulsory element of the current tendering process undermines the right of local authority managers to manage, and the right of councillors to set council policy. That prohibition of local decision making is itself anti-competitive.

Under present CCT regulations, local authorities are not permitted to take fully into account the costs of transition to externally provided services. Neither may they account for continuing tendering costs or make any allowance for the loss of internal direct labour capacity. Tying a council to external corporate pricing that way does not aid real competition.

Above all, CCT often does not even make economic sense. The Equal Opportunities Commission survey of the real costs of CCT cast a good deal of doubt on the ground of cost alone. When CCT was first introduced, Newbury district council—my own authority—made a policy decision to fight for and to win, wherever possible, every contract that it was forced to put out to tender.

In almost every case, the council was successful, but the result in almost every case was increased cost to the authority, because the tender price had to be added to the cost of an extra layer of bureaucracy—the contracts board that was put in to oversee the running of the contract. Under the system, one had two sets of management—one to oversee the running of the contract and one to oversee the contract itself.

When arguments are made about public service and public accountability, it becomes clear that CCT is by no means a policy born of common sense but one driven by dogma. If councillors have been elected to govern in their own particular style, with specific commitments to service provision, they should be able to fulfil those obligations. The whole principle underlying local government is that local people are the best judges of their local needs, and that they express that judgment in local elections. Compulsory competitive tendering goes directly against that basic principle of local democracy.

I am pleased that the order before the House has been toned down a little by the Minister, but there remain matters of great concern. We know, thanks to the Equal Opportunities Commission, that CCT is particularly detrimental to women who wish to work part-time. I fully support the remarks of the Labour spokesman, the hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley), about women. Moreover, the complicated regulations involved in CCT for finance, information technology and personnel are a bureaucratic nightmare, well described as a job creation scheme for accountants.

The cleaning of police buildings, different parts of which may be sensitive at different times, is not a service that should ever have been subjected to CCT. I hope that the Government are looking forward to the first serious leak of confidential information that results.

In the light of the Secretary of State's changes to his original proposals, perhaps he is just beginning to get the message that the Conservative vision of local government as simply an allocator of contracts to the private sector, with precious little scope for accountability, is not shared by almost anybody involved in local government. It is not shared by local authority associations, Opposition parties or the public. Even some Conservative councillors, I am happy to say, have had just about all they can take from CCT.

The Government have twisted and turned over local government review, and I understand that they may be about to ditch the strict capping regime. As the Government seem to be in the mood for tuning, they ought to know that a U-turn on CCT would be widely appreciated throughout the country.

Sir Paul Beresford: I will first touch on some of the points made by the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel), who displayed a mind-boggling misunderstanding of how competitive tendering can be used and the control that can be exercised.

If the hon. Gentleman's local authority finds extra costs incurred in managing and controlling CCT systems—whether in-house or external—it had better look at it again. From my considerable experience, significant savings can be made. One must examine the way that the contract is set up and the specifications. Additional costs are a sign of incompetence on the part of the local authority. If the hon. Gentleman had done more homework—

Mr. Rendel rose—

Sir Paul Beresford: I have not finished yet.

Mr. Paul Boateng (Brent, South): Churlish.

Sir Paul Beresford: Desperately so.

The hon. Gentleman should recognise that, in terms of the police, we are talking about a contract for 20 per cent. of the space available. That overcomes the difficulty that he was talking about.

Much play has been made of the commission's conclusion that CCT discriminates against women—

Mr. Rendel: The Minister described my local authority as having been obviously incompetent in its dealings over CCT. Does he realise that, at the time I was talking about, that local authority was Conservative-controlled?

Sir Paul Beresford: What I said stands. For a small fee, I am sure that we can arrange for someone to come down and help the authority. But under any other control, things would probably have been considerably worse.

The idea, stemming from the Equal Opportunities Commission, that CCT as a policy discriminates against women is the poorest piece of research I have seen for quite a long time. It looks at a very narrow range of services; it takes a very partial view of the evidence.

I do not accept the finding that CCT costs local authorities and the Exchequer more. Based on my personal experience of a London authority, in which we brought in an outside contractor to take over the IT services of a huge London borough, the resulting savings amounted to more than £1 million, with all on-costs added in. Moreover, a better service resulted. It is therefore untrue to say that CCT costs more.

The hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) said that CCT costs more—a point that I have already dealt with. He also talked about a lack of future competition. My experience, after 12 or 15 years of competitive tendering in one London borough, has been exactly the opposite. The competition is harder and tighter, and that has spread throughout all authorities that adopt a realistic attitude—

Mr. Boateng: Which borough was that?

Sir Paul Beresford: I am talking about Wandsworth borough council, the council that managed to provide some of the best services in London—with a zero poll tax on two occasions. Part of that was due to the use of competitive tendering.

These debates have gone on for some time—

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Blackpool, South) rose—

Sir Paul Beresford: Nothing new has appeared. The proof of the pudding has been in the results. Many local authorities have adopted the route that we suggest this evening, and I commend the motion to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Local Government Act 1988 (Competition) (Defined Activities) Order 1995, which was laid before this House on 8th June, be approved.

Legal Aid

10.42 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. John M. Taylor): I beg to move,

That the draft Legal Advice and Assistance (Scope) (Amendment) Regulations 1995, which were laid before this House on 20th June, be approved.

This is a purely technical amendment, which is intended neither to extend nor to reduce the scope of assistance or representation, but merely to put transfer for trial, as we are now going to call it, on the same footing from a legal aid point of view as committals have been in the past.

10.42 pm

Mr. Paul Boateng (Brent, South): As this is a purely technical motion, we welcome it.

Question put and agreed to.

HEALTH

Ordered,

That Mr. Iain Duncan Smith be discharged from the Health Committee and Mr. John Marshall be added to the Committee.—[Sir Fergus Montgomery, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

ADJOURNMENT

Resolved,

That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

Adjourned accordingly at seventeen minutes to Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

Tuesday 11 July 1995

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

National Minimum Wage

1. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment she has made of the effect of a national minimum wage on the employment prospects of unemployed people in other EU countries. [31781]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Phillip Oppenheim): Reports by the OECD, the IMF and the European Commission confirm that a statutory minimum wage destroys jobs and job prospects, particularly for young people. That is most clearly demonstrated in France, where youth unemployment is twice the United Kingdom rate, and in Spain, where it is three times as high.

Mr. Wilkinson: It is welcome that my hon. Friend should spell out so unambiguously the potential consequences to this country of any imposition of a statutory minimum wage. In that regard, would it be only a self-imposed imposition, because neither European Union employment law, nor even the social chapter of the notorious Maastricht treaty itself, could impose such a requirement on this country?

Mr. Oppenheim: My hon. Friend is right. A minimum wage will be imposed in this country only if it is imposed by the Labour party if it gets into government. Its policy on the minimum wage is doubly dishonest. First, it pretends to the less well-off that there is some easy, cost-free method of raising their pay. Secondly, the Opposition will not indicate the level at which it will be set until after the election. They are giving the less well-off a menu without prices in the hope that they will not discover the true cost for their jobs until it is too late.

Ms Harman: How can the Minister justify to the House the fact that more than 1 million people earn less than £2.50 an hour? How can he justify the fact that the taxpayer has to pick up the bill for low pay to the extent of £2.4 billion? Is not the real reason why the Tories are against a national minimum wage that they are in favour of low pay? Is it not a disgrace that they have abolished the Department of Employment and that employment issues, such as unemployment and low pay, are to be consigned to the basement of the Department of Trade and Industry?

Mr. Oppenheim: The hon. Lady is wrong. The pay of the least well-off has increased substantially. The pay of a single man in the bottom 10 per cent. of earnings—[Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short) will contain herself and listen, she might learn something. According to the labour force survey, which the Labour party says that it supports, the pay of a single man in the bottom 10 per cent. of earnings has risen by £27 since 1979—faster than prices. Under the last Labour Government, the pay of the same person would have fallen. Until Opposition Members can tell the country at what level they would set the minimum wage, their policy will have no credibility and will be nothing but a dishonest and cruel deceit on the less well-off.

Training Schemes

2. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when she next expects to meet representatives of East Anglian training and enterprise councils to discuss training schemes for the long-term unemployed. [31782]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. James Paice): Both my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I enjoy regular contact with the TEC movement in East Anglia.

Mr. Bellingham: Will the Minister find time today to pay tribute to the excellent work that the Norfolk and Waveney TEC has been doing for the long-term unemployed? Is it not worth reflecting on the fact that the TECs have been resisted at every turn and undermined by the Opposition, in spite of the excellent work that they have been doing? Does he also agree that, for the long-term unemployed, it is important to ensure plenty of business start-ups? What is he doing to help that?

Mr. Paice: I am happy to extend my good wishes to Norfolk and Waveney TEC, which has done a good job. Last year, when we published the TEC league tables, there was a substantial improvement in its performance, and I look forward to a continuing improvement next month, when we publish the tables for the past year. My hon. Friend is right to point out the problems of people wanting to start work and to become self-employed. That is why we have amended the rules of the training for work scheme to enable people, through training for work, to receive all the necessary advice, counselling, help and financial support, while they develop their business plans, so that any TEC is able to provide considerable support to such people.

Mr. Chidgey: Will the Minister confirm the success—I believe that it is right to call it that—of workstart pilot projects, especially in East Anglia, and will he confirm that he is planning to create another 5,000 places at a cost of £7.5 million? How can he reconcile that rather minimal investment with the forecast that there will still be over 1 million long-term unemployed by the year 2000, and the fact that unemployment is costing the country £20 billion a year? Does he think that some of the cuts in training expenditure should be transferred to workstart projects, which will improve training and the chances for the long-term unemployed of getting back into work in worthwhile jobs?

Mr. Paice: The hon. Gentleman is quite right. There will be 5,000 places in workstart schemes this year, which is a considerable increase on last year. He is not right to talk about substantial cuts in the training budget. The fact is that TEC budgets this year are almost identical to what they were last year. Yes, training for work has had a reduction; but there has been a substantial increase in other budgets so that the total has hardly changed.

The most important thing is that the overall number of opportunities for the unemployed has been maintained at last year's figure of 1.5 million, despite the fact that, during that time, unemployment has fallen substantially. There are more opportunities for those who are unemployed today in proportion to what was available a year ago.

Inactivity Rates

3. Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on inactivity rates. [31784]

Mr. Paice: The United Kingdom has a lower inactivity rate than any other major European Union country.

Mr. Milburn: Is the Minister aware that, over recent years, the number of people who are economically inactive and therefore displaced from the labour market has risen to over 7.8 million? Does that figure not give the lie to ministerial claims of success in tackling unemployment and creating jobs? More significantly, is it not symptomatic of a Government approach that is summed up by the decision to abolish the Department of Employment at the very time when there are more, not fewer, people struggling to find work?

Mr. Paice: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman fully understands what the economic activity and inactivity rates include. He suggests that those who are in the category of looking for work are somehow inactive; they are not. The unemployed are classified as economically active; the inactive figures to which he refers include, for example, the massive increase in the number of young people staying on at school. There has been an increase in the staying-on rate from 48 to 73 per cent. in the past 10 years. That is very good news for those young people's future career prospects, because they will have greater career opportunities and greater earning capacity. That is why the rate of inactivity has not gone down as much as the hon. Gentleman might wish.

Mr. Waterson: Does my hon. Friend agree, when we are talking about inactivity, that those in employment who fail to turn up for work for no good reason should be docked that day's pay, and that that should include Welsh Opposition Members who failed to turn up for Welsh questions?

Mr. Paice: It is entirely up to employers to make their own rules regarding deductions from wages for non-attendance. So far as the House is concerned, that is down to you, Madam Speaker.

Ms Short: I am afraid that the Minister is far too complacent. He seems to be unaware that one in four men of working age is without a job and that large numbers of those people are discouraged older workers. That is a result of one of the few successful Government policies: the encouragement of low-paid work. Virtually all the new jobs in the past 10 years have been low-paid, and have been overwhelmingly taken up by women living with an earning partner.

We have a growing crisis of work-rich families on the one hand and, on the other, work-poor families who are trapped in unemployment outside the labour market because the jobs available will not keep a family. We have a crisis and a soaring benefits bill. Have the Government any plans to address that?

Mr. Paice: Rarely has the House been exposed to such a nonsensical diatribe. The hon. Lady's facts are diametrically opposed to the truth. The simple fact is that in this country, as in every other country apart from Japan, there has been a small reduction in male activity rates, but it is not correct to align that fact with a change in the employment pattern over the past 10 or 20 years.

The hon. Lady suggests that all the jobs that have been created are part-time jobs for women, but that is not true. The vast majority of jobs in the early part of a recovery from recession are part time but, as recovery becomes more established, they become full-time. That is why full-time jobs are being created at the rate of two for every one part-time job at the moment. That is good news for all those who are unemployed and looking for work.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Will my hon. Friend confirm that there has been a substantial rise in economic inactivity over the past 20 years—I believe from 2 to 13 per cent.—among men? Has he noted the especially high incidence of economic inactivity—dropping out of the labour market—among men over the age of 55? Now that the Department of Employment has been merged with the Department for Education, will my hon. Friend give new thought to how we can help to make such involuntary early retirement a dignified condition, and how we can support people who have this experience in developing a satisfying new phase of life?

Mr. Paice: It is not Government policy to encourage people to become economically inactive. We want everyone who wants a job to have the opportunity to find one, but the only way in which we can create jobs is by having a dynamic economy with low inflation, low interest rates and a competitive currency, which are precisely the criteria that we have. That is why we have a sustained rate of growth in our economy, one that is better than those of virtually all of our competitors.

European Works Councils

4. Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment she has made of European works councils. [31785]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Small Firms, Industry and Energy (Mr. Richard Page): It is too early to assess works councils and other arrangements being established in response to the European directive.

Mr. MacShane: I thank the Minister for his reply. I do not know whether he represents the Department just abolished but a range of Front-Bench jobs have been created—perhaps those holding those jobs could form a works council to negotiate with their new boss. Now that Britain's main companies are forming a European works council at the rate of almost one a week and in defiance of the Government's opt-out from the social charter, will the Minister join me in welcoming that trend and urge all the other multinationals in Britain to form European works councils as soon as possible?

Mr. Page: I am from the DTI and proud of it. May I correct a misapprehension under which the hon. Gentleman seems to be labouring? The Government are not against the creation of works councils and voluntary arrangements, but we are against compulsory bureaucratic legislation.

Mr. Brazier: Does my hon. Friend agree that, while there is a range of different ways in which employers may choose to organise their bargaining rights with their employees, what is completely wrong and anathema to Conservatives is the idea that bureaucrats in Brussels should lay down in detail what sort of relationship employers and employees should have with each other? Is that not one of the reasons why the Japanese and Americans seeking to invest money in Europe have chosen to invest pre-eminently in this country? Is it not a fact that we have attracted almost half the total inward investment in the European Union precisely because investors do not want to be dictated to about how to organise their working arrangements?

Mr. Page: My hon. Friend introduces the real world into this question—the real world of jobs, growth and development. It might be useful to remind the House that unemployment stands at almost 18.5 million in the European Union, whereas the figure is down to 8.3 per cent. in the United Kingdom, which is much lower than the European average, and still dropping. Some of our competitors in the European Union, such as France, have an unemployment rate of 12.4 per cent. That is the real world: creating jobs—jobs for British people.

Recently Unemployed People

6. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what new proposals she has for those who have been permanently employed who have recently become unemployed. [31787]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mrs. Cheryl Gillan): We shall continue to follow policies that have reduced unemployment by more than 660,000 since recovery began and enabled nearly 300,000 new jobs to be created in the past year.

Mr. Flynn: I warmly congratulate the hon. Lady on her promotion to new duties, which is richly deserved, since, on a memorable occasion, she drew the Prime Minister's attention to Rentokil, a company that he has used effectively to get rid of the entire Department of Employment. The employees and Ministers of that Department have alternative employment prospects, but, sadly, many people who lose their jobs in mid-life have no such alternative and their working life ends at 50. When a similar event happens to many Conservative Members, and they then go on the jobseeker's trail, will the hon. Lady tell me what answer she will give to the question on the jobseeker's agreement "What is the minimum wage you would be prepared to work for"? I am sure that she will give the same answer that she expects of all other people.

Mrs. Gillan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his generous welcome, and might I add how pleased I am to see him in the Chamber today—he has decided not to work part-time after all. The hon. Gentleman has missed the point behind the merger of the Departments for Education and of Employment. That merger sends the clearest possible signal that education and training are at the top of the Government's agenda to improve the country's competitiveness. The merger will also offer a real focus to active labour market policies and build on the achievements of recent years in reducing unemployment.

Mr. Fabricant: May I also take this opportunity to congratulate my hon. Friend on getting to the Front Bench and say how nice it is to see someone with such a lovely blond hairstyle, which is so appropriate? There is hope for us all yet.

Does my hon. Friend agree that the question from the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) and the earlier question about works councils demonstrate that the Labour party still believes that it is the Government, rather than markets and industries, that can create jobs? Is it not the case that we have the lowest corporation tax in Europe and that it is that which is securing inward investment and jobs?

Mrs. Gillan: I thank my hon. Friend for his generous welcome for my appearance at the Dispatch Box, and I agree with him absolutely. The prospects for the unemployed in the United Kingdom continue to improve and new vacancies continue to be notified to jobcentres—more than 200,000 a month. It is our policies which are helping to put people back to work.

Ms Eagle: Will the Minister give us some information on when we will next be allowed to ask questions about the unemployment rate, since this is the last Employment Question Time that we shall be allowed to have? Will she confirm when it was decided to abolish the Department of Employment? What is the expected rate of redundancy among civil servants at that former Department?

Mrs. Gillan: The hon. Lady is quite ungenerous in her remarks about the merger of the two Departments. In fact, I was reading just earlier this morning that that merger has been welcomed by the Confederation of British Industry, the Institute of Directors, the National Union of Teachers, the Secondary Heads Association and the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers—just to name a few. The hon. Lady should re-examine what we doing in those two Departments and generously welcome the Government's brave policy, which will improve education and training right across the board.

Labour Statistics

7. Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people were in full-time work at (a) 1 July 1993 and (b) 1 July 1995. [31788]

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mrs. Gillian Shephard): Over the quarters ending August 1993 and February 1995, there were 19 million and 19.2 million people in full-time employment in Great Britain.

Mr. Dunn: Will the Secretary of State please spell out the implications for those in employment of the introduction of the social chapter, the minimum wage, and the loss of inward investment that would result from the policies of the Labour party and the parliamentary part-timers, the Liberal Democrats?

Mrs. Shephard: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his lovely blond hairstyle. As he well knows, the social chapter would roll back successes made in the United Kingdom in the past decade in modernising our industrial relations and removing the regulation that deters employers from taking on extra people. In the past decade, we have also provided extra help for unemployed people to find work.

The social chapter would increase burdens on employers. It would raise unemployment. Conservative Members believe that terms and conditions of employment should not be laid down by Government, much less by Brussels, but should be negotiated between employers and employees. Obviously, a national minimum wage would deter job creation. It would deter enterprise and destroy jobs. That is obvious to everyone except the Labour party.

Mrs. Mahon: Is it not true that nearly 600,000 women in part-time jobs had to stay there because they could not obtain full-time jobs, and that 2.5 million part-timers earn less than the national insurance threshold, thus excluding them from statutory sick pay, maternity pay and a retirement pension? How does the Minister believe those people will live when they get sick and when they get old?

Mrs. Shephard: It is true that the growth of employment in the early stages of recovery was concentrated among part-timers, but the hon. Lady should also know that full-time employment has now increased at a faster rate than part-time employment, and that only 14 per cent. of people who worked part time this winter did so because they could not find a full-time job. The imposition of a national minimum wage is the wrong way to tackle low pay and unemployment, and women would suffer the worst as a result.

Mr. Tredinnick: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that the number of people employed in manufacturing increased by 15,000 in the quarter to March, and that that was the third quarter running? Will she also confirm that many of those jobs are in the east midlands, and most of them are full-time jobs?

Mrs. Shephard: I agree with my hon. Friend. Indeed, the Government's general approach to the labour market—a sound macro-economic policy, open trade and flexible labour markets—has helped the recovery and the creation of jobs, which he so rightly welcomes, in the east midlands as elsewhere in the country.

Ms Harman: Bearing in mind that, when the Secretary of State was Employment Secretary, she brought in the legislation that abolished the wages councils, thereby taking away low pay protection from 2.5 million workers, will she confirm to the House the figures that are in the latest labour force survey, which show that, in spite of the fact that pay for those in the bottom of those wages council sectors has fallen, and therefore they have suffered from the loss of that low pay protection, there has been no increase in jobs in those sectors and therefore we have the worst of all worlds—losing low pay protection and no extra jobs?

Mrs. Shephard: The hon. Lady has misread the labour force survey. She should know from that that the wages of those who were previously covered by wages councils have increased faster than other wages. I repeat that pay must be a matter for determination between employers and employees. The hon. Lady needs to understand that a national minimum wage would have precisely the effect that she would so much deprecate.

Youth Unemployment

8. Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment she has made of the effects of labour market regulation on levels of youth unemployment. [31789]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Schools (Mr. Robin Squire): The Government believe that labour market regulation damages the level of employment, particularly for young people. Youth unemployment is higher in France and Spain, both of which have a statutory minimum wage.

Mr. Bottomley: The House will welcome the growing number of teenagers who stay on in education and training. Will my hon. Friend make inquiries to ascertain what rates of pay are agreed for people aged 17 and 16 in the Trades Union Congress, in the CBI, in his own Department and in the House of Commons Commission? I believe that he will discover that regulation is not only what is imposed by Government, but that it can be agreements between managers and unions that exclude young people from obtaining the experience on the basis of which they will be hired and taken on.

Mr. Squire: My hon. Friend will understand if I do not answer every aspect of his question. I shall certainly look into the point that he raises. It will assist the House as well as my hon. Friend if I say that, in September 1994, there were 2,313 16 to 21-year-olds employed in the former Department of Employment—56 per cent. of them were paid more than £8,000 a year. I shall come back to my hon. Friend, not only on the equivalent figures with regard to education in the combined Department, but on the other aspects that he mentioned.

Mr. Burden: Why should young unemployed people have confidence that the Government have any concern for their welfare or the welfare of anyone in work when Ministers have admitted that, on no fewer than 16,000 occasions in the past five years—there are records to show this—employers have broken the law in relation to notification of redundancies to the Department? On not one occasion have Ministers prosecuted an employer for breaking those laws. How will the abolition of the Department of Employment help to resolve that problem? Will the Government now start insisting that employers have to abide by the laws of this land?

Mr. Squire: The answer to the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question on the consequences of the abolition of the Department is that there will be no change in terms of the state of the law, which will continue to be implemented as it has in the past. The hon. Gentleman asked his question against a background of a significant improvement in the prospects of young people gaining employment over the past two years. Claimant unemployment for under-25s has fallen by 200,000 over the past two years—a faster rate of decline than for the population in general. As the House knows, but the Labour party tends to ignore, the rates for youth unemployment in this country remain among the best in Europe.

Agism

9. Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations she has received concerning agism in employment vacancies. [31790]

Mrs. Gillan: I have not yet received any representations myself but, like my predecessor, I am committed to the campaign for older workers. I commend to the House the excellent publication, "Too old . . . who says?", which provides advice and guidance to those seeking work. Agism makes no economic sense for individual employers or for the nation.

Mr. Evans: May I add my congratulations to the many other congratulations that my hon. Friend has received on her well-deserved and popular promotion to the Front Bench? My hon. Friend will know that I am extremely concerned about that group of the work force in their 40s and 50s who, through no fault of their own, lost their jobs during the recession and are unable to find work. What incentives and guidelines are the Government giving to employers to ensure that they do not turn their backs on that valuable resource?

Mrs. Gillan: I thank my hon. Friend for his generous remarks.

I know that my hon. Friend takes a great interest in the subject and the issue of agism. He has already raised with me some individual cases in his constituency. My predecessor successfully raised the profile of older workers but, importantly, with inflation and interest rates lower than for many years, our economic policies are improving everyone's employment prospects.

Dr. Reid: In congratulating—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House is in good spirits today.

Dr. Reid: In congratulating the hon. Lady on her promotion, may I bring to her attention the fact that many older workers are among the long-term unemployed? Will she explain to us in her first outing today why there are now three times as many long-term unemployed as there were when the Tory Government took over in 1979—and do so without assistance from her pal at the side?

Mrs. Gillan: I do not intend, even on my first outing, to take lectures on unemployment from the Labour party, particularly as the levels of unemployment rose quite unacceptably under the last Labour Government—if, indeed, there is anyone in the House who can remember that Government.

I have already mentioned the Government's campaign for older workers, which, with the support of the advisory group on older workers, aims to demonstrate the benefits of policies that allow people of all ages to contribute to their employers' success. The campaign also encourages older workers to be positive about the range of skills and knowledge that they can offer.

Strike Records

10. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what comparison she has made between the strike record in the United Kingdom and Germany currently and between the United Kingdom and West Germany in 1979. [31791]

Mr. Oppenheim: In 1979, the United Kingdom lost 29.5 million days through strikes—more than 50 times West Germany's total of 0.5 million. In 1993, by contrast, the United Kingdom and the unified Germany each lost 0.6 million days to labour disputes.

Mr. Townsend: I thank my hon. Friend for those interesting and encouraging figures. Does he agree that Britain's improved industrial relations record in the 1980s produced a very good case for abolishing the Department of Employment some years ago?

Mr. Oppenheim: That is an interesting perspective. Many extremely good civil servants worked in the Department of Employment, which was a very good Department. I think that they will go to other Departments and spread around their good work.

My hon. Friend makes another good point. The Government's labour market reforms have led to a revolution in British manufacturing productivity. In the 1960s and 1970s, Britain was anchored at the bottom of the G7 league for growth in manufacturing productivity. In the 1980s and in the 1990s, Britain has been at the top of the G7 league for growth in manufacturing productivity. That is the best way to ensure more and better paid jobs for people.

Training and Enterprise Councils

11. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how TEC licensing will improve standards of training; and what assessment she has made of the proportion of TECs currently achieving good standards. [31792]

Mr. Paice: Three-year licences are awarded to training and enterprise councils that meet rigorous standards for performance and capability. All TECs are required to achieve a licence by 1997.

Mr. Evennett: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that training and retraining are vital in today's society and that they must be worth while, of a high calibre and must help the participants? Is he aware that, although some TECs have failed in some areas, the majority have done a very good job? SOLOTEC in my borough of Bexley has done an excellent job in the past few years.

Mr. Paice: My hon. Friend is correct: training on its own is inadequate unless it is of a high calibre. That is why we have concentrated on a range of measures to drive up the performance of our training courses through TECs and it is why we publish performance league tables for all TECs every August. That demonstrates the rate of improvement in many TECs, including SOLOTEC, which I am pleased to congratulate on its success. There is a further range of measures, including funding according to performance, designed to improve the output of TECs.

I make it absolutely clear that the licensing process is extremely rigorous. If TECs do not meet the standards necessary, they will not get a licence and they will not get a contract.

Mr. Barron: The Minister talks about improving standards of training. Did not Coopers and Lybrand's study into the output-related funding of training conclude that the Government have virtually destroyed training provision in this country? Why were the implications of output-related funding not evaluated properly before the scheme went national this financial year?

In view of decisions taken last week, training providers and training and enterprise councils want to know one thing. When the right hon. Member for Norfolk, South-West (Mrs. Shephard) was Secretary of State for Employment, she made a £100 million cut in the training budget. There will be training cuts this year and next year as well. Will the training that the Government abolished just prior to their abolition of the Department of Employment be restored?

Mr. Paice: My right hon. Friend will address the TEC national conference on Thursday. She will reassure it of our total support for the role that TECs play and will continue to play in the provision of training. The hon. Gentleman was clearly not listening earlier when I said that training budgets overall have not changed from last year. He identified one specific sector of the training budget—training for work—but overall it has not changed. The evidence is entirely clear on output-related funding. TECs running output-related pilots improved their training output dramatically, and it was entirely logical that they were the way forward for the whole country.

Mr. Gallie: Is my hon. Friend aware of the pick-up in the house building programme recently? Does he share my concern about the lack of basic skills within that industry? What steps can be taken throughout the construction industry, perhaps to reintroduce the traditional apprenticeships of old?

Mr. Paice: I have good news for my hon. Friend. First, the Construction Industry Training Board is responsible for training in that industry. Secondly, it has embarked on the provision of modern apprenticeships, along with many other organisations and employers who this year will make available nearly 50 different vocational modern apprenticeships to enable a vast range of people to obtain recognised qualifications based on competence testing. That is the way forward to meet the skills needs of the future.

Low Pay

12. Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps she is taking to tackle the problem of low pay. [31793]

Mr. Oppenheim: Since 1979, the real take-home pay of a single man in the bottom 10 per cent. of earnings has risen by £27 a week and that of a single woman in the bottom 10 per cent. has risen by £29 a week. We all want pay levels for the less well-off to rise even further but it has to be sustainable, based on improving productivity, efficiency and competitiveness. To suggest that pay can rise just by political diktat without improved productivity is dishonest and deceitful and would undoubtedly cost many people's jobs.

Mr. Jones: I am glad that the Minister has the same fervour and commitment to his policies as the former Secretary of State for Employment, but in the deregulated wage market of the global economy, what determines the base rate without a minimum wage? Malthus would have said that it was the level at which workers can just survive and do no more than perpetuate their own numbers. What would the Minister say the base rate should be? Is it 50p an hour? How low will the Minister go?

Mr. Oppenheim: I am not sure what the hon. Gentleman's base rate should be, but I am glad that he has bothered to turn up for questions today. The only sustainable way to improve people's earning power is to improve their education and training so that they are more productive and can earn more on a sustainable basis. The Labour party's policies are misguided. Even Sir Gordon Borrie, chairman of Labour's Social Justice Commission, wrote in The Guardian recently—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I insist that the hon. Gentleman stops barracking from a sedentary position. Mindless barracking gets the House nowhere. It does not advance the quality of our debate one bit.

Mr. Oppenheim: Sir Gordon Borrie wrote in The Guardian:

"The interesting question is at what level a minimum wage should be set. Too high a figure will cost jobs; too low a figure will not be worth having."

I could not agree more. No amount of waffle and double-talk can hide Labour's attempts to deceive the less well-off into thinking that there is an easy, cost-free way to raise pay. There is not. Labour is deceiving the less well-off.

Mr. Forman: In the interests of maintaining Britain's global competitiveness—a very important national interest—does my hon. Friend agree that, in so far as it is necessary to use social transfers to support those on low pay, family credit and similar forms of benefit support are much better than the minimum wage, which could distort and prejudice our competitive position?

Mr. Oppenheim: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The best way to improve living standards for everyone, particularly the less well-off, is to improve the productivity, efficiency and competitiveness of the British economy. It is because we are now so much more efficient and productive than we were in 1979 that pay at all levels has risen substantially, not least for the less well-off.

Ms Rachel Squire: Does the Minister agree that it is waffle and double-talk to oppose a minimum wage while the Government spend £2.4 billion subsidising sweatshop pay through the benefits system? Does the Minister further agree that it is an insult to the people of Dunfermline and west Fife and of many other communities that the Government's only reward, when there is a desperate need for decently paid jobs, is to spend another £75 million on an additional top-up earnings benefit, rather than provide productive work?

Mr. Oppenheim: One of the biggest myths in the Opposition's campaign for a minimum wage is that it would get rid of all in-work benefits, yet the Opposition spokesman was told recently by Andrew Dilnott, head of the Institute for Fiscal Studies, that even a minimum wage of £8 per hour would leave many people claiming income support. If it is now Opposition policy to get rid of all in-work benefits, they should say so.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 11 July. [31811]

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Sir Michael Neubert: Has my right hon. Friend had time to study yesterday's debate in Hansard—and not just my speech? Is he aware that, on the very day when the Leader of the Opposition was refusing to put a figure on a national minimum wage, his Social Security spokesman was assuming a rate of about £3 or £3.50 in the House?

The Prime Minister: I have not yet read Hansard, but clearly I had better look at it very carefully, and I will. I did not know that which my hon. Friend stated, but if it is the case, I strongly suspect that the Leader of the Opposition knows that a minimum wage is economic nonsense but that he regards it as politically expedient. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will make clear one day precisely the figure that he has in mind; he certainly owes it to the public to do so. Perhaps he will soon tell us.

Mr. Blair: Does the Prime Minister agree in principle that Members of Parliament should disclose their earnings from outside consultancies?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman knows that a Select Committee is examining that matter. The Committee has reported, and I will do it the courtesy of awaiting its report.

Mr. Blair: That was the recommendation of the right hon. Gentleman's own Committee. Does he accept the principle or not: yes or no?

The Prime Minister: I told the right hon. Gentleman that I asked a Select Committee to examine the issue. When it has done so, I will deal with the matter.

Mr. Blair: Is the Prime Minister really saying that the Committee cannot come up with an answer in eight weeks, or is it just a coincidence that the main recommendation on which it cannot agree a definition happens to be the main recommendation to which Conservative Members object? Is it not time that the Prime Minister asserted his authority? The Nolan report is the right hon. Gentleman's report. He commissioned it and said that he accepted it, and he should ensure that the Government implement it in full without further delay.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman's attempt to use this report as a political football is pretty transparent and pretty shabby. He knows that the Select Committee has made excellent progress. It has met 14 times in 14 days—more intensively than any Select Committee has met before. It is still considering these matters. It will report and then the House will make its decision, as I have said from the outset, on matters relating to Back Benchers.

Q2. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 11 July. [31812]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Thompson: Does my right hon. Friend recall that some 10 years ago the newspapers were obsessed with the money supply, trade figures and days lost through strikes? Is it not a tribute to this Government that the number of days lost through strikes last year was only 1 per cent. of the number lost in 1979? Is not the Leader of the Opposition somewhat naive to claim that the unions no longer have an armlock over his party, when old Labour is still waiting in the wings to support strikes and organise "boyocotts"?

The Prime Minister: As a wise old policeman once said, there is no need for an armlock when the suspect comes along quietly. The right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) has already offered the unions most of what they want—the social chapter, a minimum wage, new trade union rights—while his Front-Bench team enjoys the sponsorship of all trade unions. I think that, almost without exception, his Front-Bench team is sponsored in one form or another.

Mr. Ashdown: Does the Prime Minister agree that, at this precise moment, the United Nations' ultimate will is being tested by the Bosnian Serbs in Srebrenica and that, on this occasion, if that will fails the United Nations' mission in the front-line areas of Bosnia is likely to fail with it?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is clearly referring to the situation in Srebrenica. I can certainly confirm to him and the House that the situation is very serious. UN commanders on the ground have asked the Bosnian Serbs to release the UN protection force's troops whom they have been holding and to halt their offensive.

I can confirm to the House and to the right hon. Gentleman that that has not yet happened and that, at the direct request of UN commanders on the ground, close air support operations have been carried out by NATO aircraft near Srebrenica. It was in their operational judgment that air support was necessary for the protection of the contingent in Srebrenica as a result of the fact that the Bosnian Serbs had ignored the clear warnings given. I believe that the UN commanders on the ground were right. They deserve and will receive the full backing of this Government for their action.

The situation in Srebrenica is certainly very serious indeed at the moment. Unless the warring parties are prepared soon to indicate that they are prepared to return to some form of discussion to reach a political settlement, there is no doubt that continuing fighting will put the future presence of the United Nations forces at risk.

Mr. Robert Jackson: Does my right hon. Friend recognise the widespread dismay among scientists and in universities at the transfer of the research councils to the Department of Trade and Industry? Will he confirm that his Government will continue to value fundamental research? Will he confirm that the research councils will continue to sustain the dual support system of university funding? Will he undertake to reconsider this decision, which abruptly overturns a policy developed after widespread consultation and announced in a White Paper only two years ago?

The Prime Minister: I can confirm to my hon. Friend that the role of the Office of Science and Technology is unchanged and that it will continue with the role that it has had over recent years. The transfer implies no reduction in our commitment to fundamental research or to the dual support system, and our policies remain as set out in the White Paper two years or so ago. That will continue, as will the technology foresight process.

The purpose of the transfer is to strengthen—not weaken, but to strengthen—the contribution of science, engineering and technology to long-term wealth creation. With that in mind, the office is best situated in the Department of Trade and Industry.

Q3. Mr. Dowd: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 11 July. [31813]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Dowd: Following the sorry spectacle of the Tory leadership election and the worn-out ritual of the reshuffle, may I congratulate the Prime Minister on retaining his post in the Government now run by the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine)? When are we to be told what the First Secretary of State's responsibilities are? When are we to have an opportunity to ask the First Secretary of State oral questions? Why after five years has the Prime Minister decided that he needs a deputy? If he does need such an insurance policy, why should the taxpayers have to foot the bill?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the First Secretary will support me across the full range of Government policies. He will have direct control over Government policy on competitiveness and deregulation, and he will answer questions in the House. He has a reputation for straight talking, as has the deputy leader of the Labour party. Indeed, both my right hon. Friend and the right hon. Gentleman have a reputation for robustly attacking the Labour leader, and I expect that to continue.

Mr. Yeo: May I return to the crucial subject of the minimum wage? Does my right hon. Friend agree that those who support it must be so desperate to suck up to their trade union paymasters that they do not care how many British jobs they destroy in the process? Does he also agree that any political party that advocates a minimum wage but cannot agree on what it should be is utterly unfit and unready for government?

The Prime Minister: There seems to be some uncertainty and dithering about the minimum wage on the Opposition Front Bench. The Labour leader smiles; he may well smile, but I should rather hear an answer to the question "What will the minimum wage be?" than see him smile.

The Labour leader has said:

"Econometric models indicate a potential jobs impact."

What he means is that there will be job losses as a result of a minimum wage. The deputy Labour leader—engaging in the straight talking to which I referred a moment ago—has said there would be a jobs

"shake-out . . . any silly fool knew that."

What he means is that there will be job losses. I know that; the right hon. Gentlemen know that; and the whole House knows that. As soon as we are told what the minimum wage will be—a point on which the Labour leader dithers and cannot make up his mind—we shall be able to calculate how many people will lose their jobs.

Q4. Mr. MacShane: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 11 July. [31814]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. MacShane: Will the Prime Minister join our Commonwealth partners, Australia and New Zealand, in their opposition to the nuclear bomb tests in the Pacific?

The Prime Minister: No, I will not.

Mr. Dykes: If my right hon. Friend has time in the course of his busy day, will he send warm congratulations to the RUC in Northern Ireland on the sturdy way in which it has stood up to the wilder elements among the Orangemen? Is it not about time that these provocative and silly historical marches were banned?

The Prime Minister: I congratulate the RUC on its restraint and professionalism in dealing with those incidents—and, indeed, with other recent incidents. I believe that it deserves the whole-hearted support of all hon. Members and all responsible leaders in Northern Ireland.

Q5. Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 11 July. [31815]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Jamieson: Does the Prime Minister recall making a solemn promise in March 1993 to take action in regard to spiralling water charges in the south-west, where prices have doubled in the past two years? After two years of pondering the problem, will he tell the House how he will help consumers in the south-west—or is that another matter that he has referred to the Deputy Prime Minister?

The Prime Minister: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will ask his right hon. and hon. Friends whether they will cease pressing the Government to maintain the high standards of cleanliness and improvement in those waters that is giving rise to the charges. Perhaps the support given by his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition for European directives will indicate that he does not wish us to disobey the directives with which we are dealing. We have sought to cut charges by rearranging the speed of the capital expenditure that is taking place to assist people in the west country; that is the only way in which it is practicable to help.

Q6. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 11 July. [31816]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Marshall: Will my right hon. Friend contrast his policy of improving services on the Northern line through increased investment with that of Jimmy Knapp of disrupting those services?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend makes a good point, but there is a wider point. The hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson) spoke up for water consumers. Why do he and his colleagues not speak up for rail passengers? Why are Opposition Members happy to support strikes on British Rail while they parade around claiming to be in favour of the consumer? The reality is that the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers' call for a strike on the underground—[Interruption.] I do not know which Opposition Front-Bench Member shouted then, but perhaps he or she is sponsored by the RMT. The RMT's call for a strike on the underground will damage the progress that has been made by London Underground and will cause unnecessary misery and disruption to passengers. I return to the central point. How can the Opposition claim to speak for consumers while they ignore rail passengers and leave them to face the strikes without a single word of condemnation from their Front Benchers?

Ministerial Visits

Q7. Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Prime Minister when he next expects to visit Ayrshire. [31817]

The Prime Minister: I have no current plans to do so.

Mr. Donohoe: I am sure that the people of Ayrshire will be glad of that. May I turn the Prime Minister's attention to the national health service and, in particular, to Ayrshire and Arran health board's idea of taking all its services into the private sector and allowing companies from the United States to come in purely on the basis of profit? What has the Prime Minister got to say about that? How can he possibly say that the health service is safe in his hands?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman knows, or should know, of the increased resources for the health service, the 1 million-plus extra patients treated by the health service and the better services being provided by the health service. He seeks yet again to trade politically on a health service that he knows is improving and is providing a better service than at any stage in the past—and a better service than any Labour Government could provide for the people of this country.

French Nuclear Testing

3.31 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I beg to ask leave under Standing Order No. 20 to discuss a matter of definite public importance, namely French nuclear testing in the Pacific. You will know, Madam Speaker, that this is a genuine and meant request for a debate, and not posturing or flag-waving. I have sent you a copy of a debate from 2 July 1973, in which I moved the motion on behalf of the official Opposition:

"That this House deplores the failure of Her Majesty's Government to make adequate protests to the Government of France for ignoring the decision of the International Court at The Hague on nuclear testing, and supports the two Commonwealth Governments of Australia and New Zealand in their opposition to impending tests in the Pacific."—[Official Report, 2 July 1973; Vol. 859, c. 47.]

I would have preferred this request for an emergency debate to have come from the Opposition Front Bench, rather than from me as a Back-Bench Member.

As the year 2000 approaches, it is desperate that a western European country should, without consultation of any kind, unilaterally impose a potentially catastrophic act on colonial territory on the other side of the world. In the south Pacific, an indigenous people's opinion has been brushed aside, and a hard-won status quo on the most dangerous of all weapons in a dangerous world has been brushed aside with it.

That France may not care about its image abroad is one thing. It is another thing altogether that a country should defy an international moratorium and, by baleful example, encourage others to do so.

It is this defiance that makes it so urgent that the House of Commons should make a judgment this very week. As one of the four remaining Labour Members who voted to go into the Common Market with the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), I am entitled to say that France's European allies have shamefully underestimated the issue, in contrast to the loud and impotent outrage in Australia, New Zealand and Polynesia.

The matter is important. An apologist for France said on the "Today" programme that not one fish would be harmed. That is arrant nonsense. Apart from anything else, those who cause explosions in coral atolls had better be careful what they do. Professor Ghillean Prance, the director of Kew gardens, is only one of the witnesses who says that there is interbreeding between the coral atolls of the entire Pacific area—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is now getting into a debate instead of making an application to me, and his time is up. However, I have listened most carefully to what he has said, and I have to give my decision without stating any reasons. I am afraid that I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20 and I therefore cannot submit his application to the House.

BILL PRESENTED

Pardon for Soldiers of the Great War

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay, supported by Mr. Peter Bottomley, Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, Mr. Don Dixon, Mr. John Hume, Mr. Ken Maginnis, Rev. Ian Paisley, Mr. Allan Rogers, Mr. Alex Salmond, Sir David Steel, Mr. Dafydd Wigley and Mr. Paul Flynn, presented a Bill to provide for the granting of pardons to soldiers of the British Empire Forces executed during the Great War of 1914 to 1919 following conviction for offences of cowardice, desertion or attempted desertion, disobedience, quitting post, violence, sleeping at post, throwing away arms or striking a superior officer; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 14 July, and to be printed. [Bill 161.]

Points of Order

3.35 pm

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I am sorry to raise a point of order for the second time, but a Minister who admitted in private having misled the House and misrepresented a Member of the House yesterday, has refused to apologise publicly for an offence committed in public. I say that especially because the BBC allowed the untruth to be repeated on the radio this morning. It was suggested that I had acted dishonourably, so it is important to me that the matter be put right publicly. I ask you, Madam Speaker, as the custodian of Back-Bench interests, to remind the Secretary of State for Wales, who is a comparatively new Member of the House, that he should respect the courtesies of the House and tell the truth.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. William Hague): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. As the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) knows, I have already written to her on the matter. I received a suggestion yesterday that she would seek to raise a particular matter during Welsh questions. Having looked into the matter, I accept the fact that the suggestion came not from her but from one of her constituents. She is right to expect an apology from me, and I have already given her one. Equally, her constituent was right to expect that she would be in the Chamber to represent his interests. Other constituents throughout Wales were also right to expect their Members of Parliament to be here to represent their interests. Welsh Labour Members have brought nothing but ridicule upon themselves by their failure to be here to do what they are elected to do.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Can you help me concerning the protocol of giving an apology in the House as the Secretary of State for Wales has just done? Is it appropriate and proper that, having unreservedly apologised, he should then abuse the House by going off into a diatribe about something that has nothing to do with the matter in hand?

Madam Speaker: We must leave that matter where it is at the moment, but I expect apologies in public if some misunderstanding has taken place, as obviously happened in this case. We must leave it there now.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. As a member of the Select Committee examining the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill, I ask whether you have seen reports in the press today suggesting that Government policy is to be reversed, because Ministers are balking at the notion of increasing public subsidy for Eurorail, which is run by the Prime Minister's friend Lord Parkinson. Those press reports are potentially damaging to the work of the Select Committee. If there is a change in Government policy surely the Secretary of State for Transport should come to the House and explain exactly what the position is.

Madam Speaker: I make no comments on press reports, but of course I expect that whenever there is an important change in Government policy, on whatever issue, a statement should be made from the Dispatch Box so that we are all clear about it.

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. On a similar matter reported in the press today, there was a suggestion that the change in Government policy—

Madam Speaker: Order. Ministers may comment on press reports, but since I entered the House more than 20 years ago I have made it a rule, both as a Back Bencher and as Speaker, not to comment on press reports, so the House must not ask me to do that now. If there is a point of order for me as Speaker to deal with I shall deal with it, but I do not want to hear about press reports.

Mr. Simpson: I intended, Madam Speaker, to ask for a statement to be made to the House about whether there is to be a change in Government policy on the imposition of tax on church bells. The House wants to understand whether that is part of a sleaze story about Government bonging or whether another political clanger has been dropped, so we would like to know whether the Secretary of State will make a statement to the House.

Madam Speaker: An amusing comment and a good try, but not really a point of order.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Is it really in order that there should be a statement on press reports that are quite false, because on the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill, we in north-west Kent asked a question and got a clear answer from the Ministers that these press reports are rubbish?

Madam Speaker: That is why I never comment on press reports. I think that that is a very good policy to adopt.

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Madam Speaker: With permission, I will put together the motions on statutory instruments.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(3) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.),

ROADS AND BRIDGES (SCOTLAND)

That the Roads (Transitional Powers) (Scotland) Order 1995 (S.I., 1995, No. 1476) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

MERCHANT SHIPPING

That the Fishing Vessels (Certification of Deck Officers and Engineer Officers) (Amendment) Regulations 1995 (S.I., 1995, No. 1428) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Merchant Shipping (Certification of Deck and Marine Engineer Officers) (Amendment) Regulations 1995 (S.I., 1995, No. 1429) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Streeter.]

Question agreed to.

Railway Communities (Job Creation)

3.40 pm

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make provision for the creation of alternative job opportunities in communities that have lost a substantial number of railway industry jobs since the passage of the Railways Act 1993; to empower Ministers to provide direct assistance to former railway industry employees seeking alternative employment; to encourage inward investment; to promote new business start-ups in railway communities and to provide new infrastructure for business premises in these communities; and for connected purposes.

I should remind the House that I am sponsored by one of the rail unions, RMT, but I speak today on behalf of many of my constituents in my union and others who are affected by rail privatisation.

Later today, on an Opposition motion, the House will debate the merits or otherwise of rail privatisation. I hope that I do not need to tell the House where I stand on that matter. My Bill does not argue for or against privatisation of the railways. It simply acknowledges that the House passed the Railways Act 1993, that the Act is being implemented and that it is causing a significant reduction in employment on the railways. My Bill seeks to reduce the impact on railway workers who have been made redundant and on the economies of railway towns.

There are quite a number of precedents for the Government taking action to replace jobs that have come about as a result of industrial restructuring. In 1984, the Government established British Coal Enterprise Ltd. to bring alternative employment to areas affected by pit closures. Since 1984, British Coal has made 143,300 people redundant. In the same period, British Coal Enterprise Ltd. says that it has created 123,600 new jobs. Some 57,244 jobs have gone to ex-miners, and another 66,000 to other people in mining communities. Similar programmes have been introduced in the steel industry.

When British Rail closed its Swindon works in the 1980s, the British Rail board invested £1.3 million in establishing an enterprise agency to bring new jobs to the town. I would not argue for a new agency for the railways if there was no need. Rail privatisation is still in its early stages, but already British Rail has made 13,600 workers redundant and thousands of other jobs have been lost in private sector rail manufacturing industries. In my own constituency, for example, since 1992 there have been 2,300 job losses. In 1992 there were 4,700 jobs. Since then, British Rail has declared 650 redundancies, and the private train builder, ABB, has made all 1,650 of its employees redundant.

Other railway jobs in York are at risk, too. British Rail's York office of the civil engineering design group will be privatised in a matter of weeks. The York office of a BR subsidiary, Signalling Control UK, is also to be privatised this year. So, too, are the two York-based infrastructure maintenance units, and the two York-based British Rail track renewal units. The east coast main line franchise is due to be let at the end of this year or the beginning of next year.

York needs help. We have already lost some 2,300 jobs as a result of rail privatisation. York is not an assisted area. We do not qualify for EU regional grants, for instance, under objective 2.

On the practicalities of my Bill, since 1984 British Coal Enterprise Ltd. has invested about £165 million. Roughly £100 million of that has gone on economic regeneration in coalfield communities and £65 million on the resettlement of miners in other jobs. In round terms, the 120,000 jobs created by British Coal Enterprise Ltd. have cost £1,350 each. At the present rate of attrition of railway jobs, the railways need to invest £10 million or £15 million a year, assuming that the cost of replacing railway jobs is broadly the same as that of replacing jobs in coalfield communities. It is not a great sum of money compared with the £700 million that railway privatisation has cost already.

British Coal Enterprise Ltd. is a subsidiary of British Coal. I suggest that the British Rail board could and should establish a subsidiary, which might be called British Rail Enterprise. Of course, there is a chance that this Bill will not reach the statute book, but there is no reason why the Government cannot act without legislation. There is no statutory basis for British Coal Enterprise Ltd.

Rail privatisation has come about as a direct result of Government policy. Large-scale job losses in the railway industry have come about as a direct consequence of rail privatisation. The Government have an obligation to do as they have done in other industries that have been restructured as a result of Government policy, which is to invest in alternative employment in the areas most affected by the Government's rail privatisation policies.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Hugh Bayley, Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, Mr. Peter Bottomley, Mr. Alan Williams, Mr. Alan Howarth, Mr. Malcolm Wicks, Mr. Alex Carlile and Mr. Keith Hill.

RAILWAY COMMUNITIES (JOB CREATION)

Mr. Hugh Bayley accordingly presented a Bill to make provision for the creation of alternative job opportunities in communities that have lost a substantial number of railway industry jobs since the passage of the Railways Act 1993; to empower Ministers to provide direct assistance to former railway industry employees seeking alternative employment; to encourage inward investment; to promote new business start-ups in railway communities and to provide new infrastructure for business premises in these communities; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 14 July 1995, and to be printed. [Bill 160.]

Opposition Day

[17TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Rail Network

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): I have to announce that Madam Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.47 pm

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I beg to move,

That this House deplores the impact of the privatisation threat on investment in the rail network and on deteriorating staff morale; and reiterates the need to retain Railtrack as a crucial public service in order to maintain and develop a co-ordinated national transport policy.

This debate is intended as a triple opportunity. First, it is an opportunity for the new Secretary of State, whom I very much welcome to the debate, to state his position on the privatisation of the rail system and on Railtrack in particular. Clearly, the House will want to know whether he shares the enthusiasm and optimism—indeed, the over-optimism—of his predecessors. I note with interest his contribution to a debate on public transport on 23 March 1990, which was introduced by his late colleague Mr. Robert Adley, whose views on privatisation we all recall. The Secretary of State said:

"more people are writing to their Members of Parliament—certainly those in London—complaining about conditions . . . they expect part of the greater wealth that has been created to be diverted to the improvement, modernisation and expansion of public transport in London, the south-east and in other parts of the country."—[Official Report, 23 March 1990; Vol.169, c.1395.]

In a few moments I shall be able to demonstrate that that simply has not happened. Let us hope that, now that he is in the elevated position of driver in the cab, he may be able to change the way in which British Rail and the rail system are driven.

Secondly, of course, this is an opportunity to help the Labour party off the fence, not just on the subject of strikes, on which they will no doubt want to make a statement, but on the future of the rail network. It is an opportunity to get them on board for a proper policy for the public ownership of the rail network.

Thirdly, and most importantly, the debate is a wonderful opportunity for Back Benchers on both sides of the House to express the concern, frustration and anger that our constituents are expressing to us about the way in which our great rail network is being dismantled before our very eyes.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Blackpool, South): My constituents are annoyed and frustrated about the rail unions, which are determined to wreck their travel arrangements. What does the hon. Gentleman have to say about that, or is he an apologist like Labour's Front Benchers?

Mr. Tyler: Of course not. I am sure that hon. Members understand the frustration and anger of the staff in all parts of the rail system who are seeing their industry being dismantled. They are also seeing a huge waste of money which could be invested in better conditions for them, including better pay, as well as in improving the service. However, that is no excuse for taking industrial action and I agree that it is not helpful to the rail system, the rail customers or rail staff to take precipitate action—as, indeed, some other staff have made clear in the past few days. No doubt the spokesmen for the Labour party will wish to dissociate themselves from this industrial action as clearly and precisely as we do.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not mind me asking whether it occurs to him that, when negotiations between employers and employees are taking place, the most useless and unhelpful thing that someone can do in the House—especially when he is not party to those negotiations—is to express his views in the terms that the hon. Gentleman has just used?

Mr. Tyler: When the hon. Lady's party was in government, I recall many previous occasions on which Labour Ministers did precisely that. I see no reason not to now.

We believe that a publicly controlled, publicly directed public service is not inherently inefficient. It can be extremely efficient. In particular, I pray in aid the Post Office. As a student of history, Madam Deputy Speaker, you will know that the Post Office was taken into public ownership by that great radical Charles I in 1635. After the disturbances of the civil war, it was re-established as a public service by Charles II by Act of Parliament in 1660.

There is no inherent reason why a useful public service should not continue to be of very considerable use to the public if it remains publicly controlled. However, what we cannot do with a modern railway system is to play trains with it. At present, our rail network in the British Isles is being disintegrated in a socially, economically and environmentally damaging way. No other country in western Europe would dream of doing that at this juncture because there are great opportunities on offer to an efficient public rail system. If it is to become a wholly private concern, even if regulated, we can look to what has happened in the other former utilities as a guide to what would inevitably happen to the railways.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Would the hon. Gentleman care to comment on what British Airways was like—a sheer embarrassment to this country—while it was nationalised? Does he think that it is purely coincidental that, as a privatised entity, it is now considered to be the world's favourite airline?

Mr. Tyler: The hon. Gentleman selects but one previous utility. He should consider what ICI says about the cost of electricity. Privatisation does not necessarily result in greater competition or more effective management of a great public service. What is clear about British Rail is that the substantial improvements that were made in the 1970s and 1980s are being put at risk. I know that a number of hon. Members wish to contribute to this short debate, so I should like to make some progress.

Clearly, under the Government's present plans, the franchising director is only partly accountable to the public. Indeed, it is only when there is uproar in the House and among all the parties over issues such as through ticketing, that one is able to influence the way in which the passenger service requirements are implemented.

The role of Opraf is not to be a servant of public policy; it simply provides an opportunity for Ministers to pass the buck and put at arm's length their responsibility to the travelling public. No one is confident that standards will be met, let alone improved. Similarly, the price cap is hardly an effective and sensitive influence on the rail system.

We recognise that the core of an effective rail network is the track—the infrastructure—and therefore Railtrack. I shall concentrate for a few minutes on the role of Railtrack because I and my colleagues believe that it is the secret to the success of our future public transport system. The core must be publicly controlled and directed, and there must be a guarantee of homogeneity in the whole operation.

Privatisation has placed intolerable burdens on Railtrack. They include the corporate plan, which was due this summer—indeed, now—but which is still not forthcoming, and the timetable for modernisation of the west coast main line and the contract for signalling which are to be in place by the end of the year, which is highly unlikely; and enabling European Passenger Services to operate a public service to Manchester and Scotland through the channel tunnel by 1 January 1996. Again, that is a strain. It is asking the impossible while steps are being taken to create new structures throughout Railtrack and the operating companies.

If Railtrack were in private hands, which would be a fundamental fault because it would split the infrastructure from the management of trains and divide responsibility for their operation among many operators, it would fly in the face of the experience of all other member states in the European Union and, indeed, most other developed countries. Accountability would disappear.

Meanwhile, customers and staff are bewildered and confused by the way in which the system is being carved up. As the House knows, there are already some 100 bits to the jigsaw. The little green book, which some hon. Members may have seen, contains the most amazing array of maps which it is extremely difficult to follow. I had occasion to wish to write a complaint about a delayed train a couple of days ago, and it took several minutes to wade through the document to find out to whom I should complain.

Let us consider Gatwick, which is the means of entry into this country for a large number of visitors. Gatwick Airport Services Ltd. runs the station on a lease from Railtrack but there are five train operators going in and out of the station—Gatwick Express, InterCity Cross Country, Network SouthCentral, Thames Trains and Thameslink. Anyone who has been there recently and shared the experience of some visitors who are unfamiliar with our curious signs and curious language and our curious lack of anyone else's language will have discovered that it is impossible to find the appropriate train. Staff simply do not know what services are being provided by other companies. Hon. Members should test it for themselves—I bet that Ministers have not done so recently, unlike one of my colleagues.

The plethora of different information at Gatwick makes it impossible. One enters an apocalyptic world. For example, indicators are non-existent at platform level, and if one goes up to the higher level, one is in danger of missing one's connection. Nobody knows what is happening. With two sets of loudspeakers and conflicting information, it is impossible to know what is going on.

Let us consider another example. I have here a note on the railway services serving a particular constituency in the north-west of England which I visited yesterday and this morning—Littleborough and Saddleworth. The services provided in that constituency are, according to British Rail, partly

"a joint venture between Regional Railways North West and Greater Manchester PTE . . . and also between Regional Railways North East and West Yorkshire PTE".

The number of companies is so confusing that even the staff do not know who is responsible for the various services. In the past few days, my colleague in that constituency has conducted a survey of passenger opinion and he was not surprised to find that the huge majority of the travelling public in that area believe that services are getting worse as a result of the threat of privatisation. They do not share others' enthusiasm for that change. That survey revealed that nine out of 10 passengers believe that rail privatisation will cause services to deteriorate still further.

It is not just a question of reliability or punctuality, but, of course, of safety. As has been apparent from last week's report from British Rail and Railtrack's answers to questions put in previous weeks, the disintegration of the rail system is causing a reduction in concern about safety. Sadly, recent examples of that may underline that point.

I have already referred to the low morale of the staff. I am not suggesting that that is the sole reason for the current industrial unrest, but it is an important factor. That sense of frustration is not improved by the swathe of consultants, lawyers, accountants and merchant bankers who are picking over the intended structure of the RT operation.

We believe that the cost so far of privatisation is well in excess of £0.5 billion, about £550 million, and others have suggested today that that cost will increase to £700 million by the end of the year. How much better for that investment to be put into improved rail services—perhaps the channel tunnel rail link, which is of considerable importance to many hon. Members who represent the south-east, let alone to the future of freight services all over the country. I note that several Conservative Members have nodded in agreement.

As I said earlier, the background to the problem is that in 1992-93, investment in British Rail, excluding channel tunnel investment, stood at just over £1 billion. In the current year, that investment has fallen to £600 million. The danger is that, once that slide becomes even more exaggerated, it will be extremely difficult to make that investment level, let alone increase it.

Like that other monstrosity, the poll tax, rail privatisation will have to be dismantled, but at a great cost to the taxpayer. That will be a disgraceful waste of resources, which should be spent on investment in a better service.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The hon. Gentleman, who speaks on behalf of the Liberal Democrats, is speaking against rail privatisation in almost an evangelical way. I would like to know when the change took place in the Liberal party's approach to rail privatisation, because some of us were opposed to it in principle long before we came to the House. We all know that the Liberal party was in favour of rail privatisation before the general election. The hon. Gentleman has given the impression that his party has always been against that policy, but when did that change take place? When did the Liberals discover the reality of privatisation?

Mr. Tyler: After that diatribe, I am not sure that I should accept the hon. Gentleman's compliment about evangelical fervour. If the hon. Gentleman had attended other debates on transport, he would know only too well that we have always supported the retention of the Railtrack infrastructure.

Mr. Skinner: No.

Mr. Tyler: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman does not understand the difference. If he travelled as often by rail as I do perhaps he would understand it. Railtrack controls the major infrastructure of the system and the Liberal Democrats have always supported it as a public service. If the hon. Gentleman ceases to heckle me, I will repeat that we see an opportunity—

Mr. Skinner: Accept the truth.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I wish to hear the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) who has the floor, and not others who do not have it.

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to you, Madam Deputy Speaker. The Liberal Democrats have always welcomed the possibility of private investment in individual services because we believe that such private finance will offer real benefits to those services. Indeed, the hon. Member for Bolsover may like to stay for slightly longer in the debate than he usually does and hear what the Labour Front-Bench spokesmen have to say, because he will find that they support me on that subject.

Mr. Skinner: I was here yesterday; you were missing.

Mr. Tyler: Railtrack is being sold off as an afterthought of the Government. As Christian Wolmar said in The Independent a few days ago, that was "a sharp—and unannounced—change in policy. Railtrack privatisation did not even figure in the 1992 Conservative manifesto".

I do not know whether it figured in the Secretary of State's election address; perhaps he will tell us later. Mr. Wolmar continued:

"It also ties the Government to the type of rail privatisation . . . which has been widely criticised as unworkable . . . it seems the quick buck has been too much of an attraction—it may be a fatal one."

I suspect that that will not be the case immediately, but in the long run it will undoubtedly be one of the ways in which the public will regard the Government as more interested in private profit than in public service.

Mr. Skinner: Like you were.

Mr. Tyler: There is an argument, which no doubt Conservative Members will suggest is at the root of the issue, that other privatisations have worked, and they may quote examples. Neither assertion is correct.

In the first place, there has been no privatisation of a rail system in the world on that format, and certainly none that has been successful. Indeed, as I said earlier, there is considerable doubt about the effectiveness and the profitability, in terms of the overall public profitability, of the privatisation of many of the other utilities. I quote, for example, the opinion of Mr. Edward Brady of Imperial Chemical Industries in the Financial Times only 10 days ago. He said:

"We are paying . . . £50 million a year for electricity at Runcorn, compared with £30 million in April 1991, before the privatisation".

Tell him that privatisation is a wild success.

Similarly, the argument that other countries have taken that route is simply untrue. Ministers may have been deluded by comparisons made by Conservative central office, but unfortunately, Conservative central office remains woefully behind the times until the new incumbent reaches his desk. I hope that no hon. Members will quote the last brief prepared by Conservative central office; it is woefully out of date on all subjects, including the opinions of Opposition parties. No doubt, now that the right hon. Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney) is there, there will be a shake-up.

Sweden does operate a rail network with separate track and operators, but both halves are publicly owned and publicly controlled. It is we who should learn the lessons from abroad. At a recent channel tunnel initiative seminar organised by the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, Professor Reid of Birkbeck university described how French planning uses private and public utility projects, and he described how 51 per cent. publicly owned Societé Economie Mixtes—forgive my French—operates. It is obviously a good model that we could follow in this country with advantage.

We Liberal Democrats have a non-doctrinaire acceptance of mixed public and private investment partnerships. We believe that we should have a non-sectarian interest in seeking secure, well-planned, well-prioritised investment in railways, and we shall have no misgivings about maintaining a 49 per cent. private investment if that is found to be useful in the long term in a publicly owned and publicly controlled Railtrack.

However, I do not understand, I do not believe that the House will understand and certainly the travelling public do not understand, where the Labour party stands on that matter. There appear to be varying theses. The gospel according to St. Dunfermline, St. Holborn, St. Oldham and even St. Sedgefield appears to vary day by day.

I notice that the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) has joined us. I am delighted to see him, because I can quote back to him something that he said on BBC Radio 4 on 10 January 1995:

"If you're asking me to set out at this moment in time exactly what we would do, I cannot sensibly give that answer".

I hope that this afternoon he may give that answer, either sensibly or insensibly. I shall return to the Labour party later.

The Tories are obviously split too. Many of them share and have expressed the misgivings of the late Robert Adley, who, as the House will recall, described privatisation as the poll tax on wheels. The enthusiasm for his Conservative successor in Christchurch resulted in a huge Liberal Democrat swing and victory.

Our plans for Railtrack are simple. We want to see the basic railway infrastructure in public hands. Once that statement has been made and once the Labour party come on board, we believe that it is highly unlikely that the Government will be able to pursue, helter-skelter, their present plan to privatise Railtrack by April next year. It will not be an attractive proposition for the City, as there are far better things for the institutions to invest their money in. Why should they take on the liabilities of Railtrack when they can see much more interesting projects in which to invest their money?

The trading value of Railtrack has plummeted since it was first suggested as a privatisation plum. It was originally suggested that it might be £6.5 billion, but now the figure has fallen way down and is more in the region of £1.5 billion—even before the declaration of principle from the Labour party, which I hope and expect this afternoon.

If Railtrack is privatised before the next election, we would support any steps necessary to re-acquire a majority holding at the issue price or the market price, whichever was the less, so there would be no profit to anyone who invests on that risk basis. If the sell-off is postponed, as it is likely to be, there is no cost. The cost to the nation and the Government is nil. That is why it is so important to make that statement now.

The repurchase can be spread over a number of years by means of a bond so that it would not suddenly be a blip in the public sector borrowing requirement over the first year or two of the lifetime of a Parliament. It will then be open to the Government—generally, nationally, regionally and locally—to determine access charges and investment priorities in furtherance of other priorities.

I hope that the Labour party's position will be clarified by today's debate and we are glad to give Labour Members the opportunity to do so. The Labour party's current plans are confused, confusing, and certainly counter-productive to achieving progress. We know that the Labour party faces dissention from among the ranks of its traditional supporters in the unions. A few days ago the RMT president said:

"The Labour Party should understand and commit themselves in government to a railway, publicly owned, publicly accountable and run in the public interest.

Proper forward planning and an expansionist budget would

"achieve the fully integrated transport system this country needs."

However, the Labour party's transport policy has yet to be hammered out. As "Rail Privatisation News" recently reported:

"When Rail Privatisation News suggested to Party insiders that a commitment to keep Railtrack in the public sector would be both electorally popular and appease the Party's left wing membership, the response was that 'these things are settled in the Leader's office'".

The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is listening intently—I hope that he is taking due note as he may need to make representations.

Mr. Skinner: As I was earlier trying to explain to the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler), who speaks for the Liberal Democrats, the Labour party has a long tradition of being in favour of public ownership of the railways. When we get back into power, we shall take back the railways. If it was left to me, I should take them back without compensation, and would not give a penny piece of compensation.

Mr. Tyler: I see that the hon. Member for Oldham, West, who is listening intently to the rebellion in his ranks, is amused by that statement.

I believe that this afternoon, by endorsing our guarantee to the travelling public to retain Railtrack as a public service, the Labour party could give one signal and, by so doing, avert the derailment.

I know that other hon. Members wish to contribute, so I shall be brief. In conclusion, let us heed the words of John Welsby, the chairman and chief executive of British Rail, who, last week, in his statement at the front of the annual report, said:

"investment in the existing railway is not at a satisfactory level, and will not sustain the industry in the long term."

We should mark his words. He continued:

"It is important that fragmentation is not allowed to become an obstacle to worthwhile investment".

I submit to the House that they are wise words from the people who carry real responsibility for the rail system in this country. I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will support us and them tonight.

4.14 pm

The Minister for Railways and Roads (Mr. John Watts): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'believes that privatisation offers the best opportunity for reversing the historic decline suffered by the railway system under nationalisation; and further believes that the privatisation of Railtrack offers the best future for Railtrack, and for passengers and freight users, by making greater use of private sector skills in managing the network and in providing greater scope for private capital investment in the upgrading of the railway system.'.

It is interesting to watch the Labour Front Bench gradually fill up as the debate develops. That is obviously occurring because of the severe challenge to the Labour party's position from the Liberal Benches. If I were the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), I would be shaking in my shoes in view of the skilful way in which the Liberal party's stance has changed. While the right hon. Member has been learning Tory phrases, pretending to adopt Tory values and borrowing—I could say "stealing", but that would have no place in the modern Labour party—our clothes, he is being outflanked on the left by the Liberals.

It used to be said that the centre ground was the battlefield of British politics. But as the Labour party has grabbed at our coat tails and tried to scuttle to the right, the Liberals have occupied the vacant turf to the left. The Liberal Party is now the only party that is prepared to stand up for nationalisation. Perhaps it is merely paving the way for even closer union between the Labour and Liberal parties, or perhaps it is simply nostalgia for the halcyon days of the Lib-Lab pact—I leave it to hon. Members to judge.

The motion moved by the hon. Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Tyler) refers to "the privatisation threat on investment in the rail network".

Let us examine the facts, as we have done in the past. During the period in office of the last Labour Government—who were sustained in office by the votes of the Liberals—investment in the railway averaged £924 million per year in current prices. In a comparable four-year period from 1990-91 to 1993-94, investment averaged £1,350 million—no less than 46 per cent. higher than under the investment policies supported by the Liberals when they last had an opportunity to contribute to sustaining a Government in office.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West) rose—

Mr. Watts: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, although I know what he will say.

Mr. Meacher: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman knows what I intend to say. In looking at the record of recent years, he ended significantly at 1993-94. Would he like to give the House the figure for investment in the rail network—excluding the channel tunnel—in 1994-95?

Will he confirm that that figure, at £617 million, is far and away the lowest investment figure in real terms since the war?

Mr. Watts: I am happy to confirm that, following the years to which I have referred, investment last year and in the current year continues at around £1 billion. I will not accept the hon. Gentleman's invitation to ignore the substantial investment in international rail services. Is he suggesting that they are not part of the rail network?

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): As to investment by British Rail, and therefore by the Government, is my hon. Friend aware that the people of Kent are extremely grateful for the hundreds of millions of pounds that are spent on new Networker rolling stock—as my constituents who commute to London prove every day?

Mr. Watts: My hon. Friend makes a very strong point.

I will not be tempted by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) to ignore the substantial investment in international rail services any more than any other business, in announcing its performance, would say, "We've invested X billion pounds, but let's forget about all of our investment in developing a new business. Let's forget about the £400 million spent on upgrading track to provide better freight services through the channel tunnel, which is allowing rail freight to compete with long-distance road haulage—for example, runs from Glasgow to Milan now take 36 hours by rail and 72 hours by road. Let's forget about all of the investment in our new business, and let's pretend that the old business is all that matters and that that is all we must contend with".

In his concluding remarks, the hon. Member for North Cornwall referred to the comment by the chairman of British Rail in his last annual report, that, in his opinion, the level of investment in the year on which he was reporting was insufficient to sustain the rail network. The hon. Gentleman will recognise that the chairman of British Rail was referring mainly to investment, which will remain the responsibility of Railtrack, but let us leave that on one side and consider the regime within the arrangements that we have established for the privatised railway to ensure that there is sufficient funding for the necessary investment to sustain the core network.

Mr. Tyler: Is the Minister somehow suggesting that investment in Railtrack's responsibilities is a lesser priority than investment in British Rail? If that is the case, it is in direct contradition to what Railtrack is saying, which is that it now has a major problem with the hiatus in investment in basic maintenance to ensure that speed and weight restrictions do not have to be imposed on services, and to maintain safety standards.

Mr. Watts: No. On the contrary, Mr. Welsby and I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the major investment priorities for the railway are now in the infrastructure. That is why the regime approved by the regulator provides for access charges to provide funding for Railtrack's investments to run at around £600 million a year—the level judged necessary to maintain the existing core network.

If the hon. Gentleman were to discuss Mr. Welsby's comment with him, he would not suggest that British Rail needs more funding for investment. Indeed, he has told us on many occasions that there is currently no business case for further investment by British Rail in rolling stock, and that the need for investment is in the infrastructure. That is where the major part of the investment is going.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): The manager of the Network SouthEast service that would have got the York trains, had they been ordered, argued strongly with the British Rail Board that there was a business case for investment. The Prime Minister's motion says that privatisation will provide "greater scope for . . . upgrading the railway system."

If the Minister believes that to be true, will he explain how the nationalised railway has managed to invest £800 million in electrifying the east coast main line, but the private sector has not been able to bring on stream the channel tunnel link?

Mr. Watts: First, I find it gratifying that, in the new atmosphere running through the rail industry, the directors of train operating companies strongly advocate the needs of their passengers. I am sure that, when passenger operating companies are in the private sector, that advocacy of the standard of service that they want to deliver to their passengers will be heard even more strongly.

Secondly, the hon. Gentleman picks up some points from misleading articles in the press today that the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) sought to raise with Madam Speaker as a point of order. That speculation is totally without foundation. It is far from the case that the private sector will prove incapable of delivering the channel tunnel rail link, but the hon. Gentleman will have to wait for the competition currently under way to be brought to a conclusion. I accept that the hon. Gentleman will probably wish to be a doubting Thomas until I can show him proof.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): As the Minister is dealing with current issues, and particularly as the newly promoted Minister of State, Scottish Office, is on the Front Bench, will he explain the position vis-a-vis the new Secretary of State for Scotland?

In Edinburgh today, the Scottish Office has been briefing the press that the new Secretary of State is to call in John Ellis, director of ScotRail, in a fresh political intervention over the future of Scottish-Anglo sleeper links. Will the Minister confirm that the Secretary of State for Scotland has made that intervention? Is there a change of policy? What discussions, if any, have there been between the new teams under the Secretaries of State at the Department of Transport and the Scottish Office?

Mr. Watts: My right hon. Friend the new Secretary of State for Scotland has picked up on the close interest in the future of Scottish rail services shown by his predecessor, who is now President of the Board of Trade. I understand that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is having discussions with ScotRail. I doubt that the hon. Gentleman is surprised, knowing my right hon. Friend.

I was referring to the regime of track access charges approved by the regulator, which will provide Railtrack with the funding necessary to invest about £600 million a year to sustain the quality of the existing network. In the current year, Railtrack expects to invest more than £700 million—an increase of one fifth over its expenditure in the past year. The hon. Member for North Cornwall mentioned the west coast main line. This Friday, Railtrack intends to invite tenders for the development of a new state-of-the-art signalling system that is the key to the £900 million project to upgrade the west coast main line.

I have been trying hard, but I have not yet detected where the so-called

"privatisation threat on investment in the rail network" is having an impact. If Railtrack were left as a nationalised industry, as the Liberals clearly want and as some members of the Labour party might want—and the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) undoubtedly and definitely does want—Railtrack would continue to be subject to the constraints of public expenditure controls. It would have to compete year after year with bids from health, education, social services and so on. We all know that, whichever Government are in power, they never have a bottomless purse. If Governments act as if they do, that has a deleterious effect on our fellow citizens as taxpayers.

One main advantage of a privatised Railtrack is that it will be freed from those constraints, be free to make commercially driven investment decisions and have much wider access to private capital for investment in the upgrading of the railway system.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall expressed doubts about the structure that we have chosen, saying that the pattern was not well received or likely to be adopted in other countries. When I attended the recent European conference of Transport Ministers in Vienna, considerable interest was shown by our partners—to the extent that the Austrian Minister who hosted the conference invited me to give a paper on railways restructuring. It is clear that we are the market leader in setting the structure for a railway system for the 21st century.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall gave his party's views on the future of Railtrack. Our policy is crystal clear. Railtrack is to be sold by stock market flotation within the lifetime of this Parliament. The national railway network will remain as an integrated system, providing the train paths required by passenger and freight train operators.

The right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) started his assault on traditional Labour territory, in a recent speech in Perth.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: It was not that recent.

Mr. Watts: It was not that long ago. The right hon. Gentleman said:

"Unlike the Labour Party, the Liberal Democrats won't just criticise the Government for its plans".

There is the challenge for the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish). He knows what he must say in his reply, because the hon. Member for North Cornwall told him. The right hon. Member for Yeovil continued:

"We will guarantee that, if privatisation goes ahead, we will put our rail infrastructure back under public control."

There were no empty, uncosted promises. He named his price. He is obviously a much more confident forecaster of the stock market than I would want to be. Although he did not use the word, he said that the cost of fulfilling that promise would be a snip:

"£200 million a year for five or six years."

Mr. Kennedy: He did not say that.

Mr. Watts: He said £200 million a year. If the hon. Gentleman would like to read his leader's speech, I have it here. I accept that "snip" is my word, but I think that it indicates the right hon. Gentleman's attitude. He said that such action would cost £200 million a year for five or six years, and he went on to say:

"Given that the government's total spending bill is £300,000 million a year, £200 million is perfectly affordable. Indeed, it is cheap".

There we have it.

Mr. Tyler: I do not think that the Minister heard my point. If Railtrack does not go into the private sector before the general election, does he concede that the price of buying it back would be nil?

Mr. Watts: In the unlikely event that the right hon. Member for Yeovil formed a Government, and we had privatised Railtrack—as we intend to—the Treasury would have received the money. The net cost in either event would be nil.

In the spirit of conciliation, I shall try to agree with the right hon. Gentleman on one point. He was right to say—I heard his hon. Friend the Member for North Cornwall repeat it—that the key to an integrated rail network is the track. Of course we are maintaining an integrated national system of track in our privatisation plans for Railtrack.

The right hon. Gentleman's reasoning is flawed because of his belief that it is necessary for the state to own the network. Why does he consider ownership such an essential ingredient in delivering integrated transport, whenever he might mean by that phrase? If ownership is the key, why does he stop at the track? Why does he not extend his principle to train operations? Indeed, in hearing the hon. Member for North Cornwall explaining how confusing he found it to be offered a choice of services at Gatwick, operated by five different companies, surely the logic of his argument is that he wants to nationalise train operators as well.

Mr. Kennedy: This is very interesting logic—let us pursue it. From the Government's point of view, if this is the direction in which one wants to go in this hypothetical argument, surely, if one is to privatise at all, one would want to privatise the track alongside the operators who will run the track, instead of splitting it up and making it an accountants' and lawyers' paradise, which is what we have turned it into.

Mr. Watts: I want to privatise the track; I want to keep it as a national system. I want to privatise operators who will run their services over the track and, in some instances, will be able to provide choice for passengers and freight customers, who will make use of their services.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Watts: Not at the moment, but I might later.

The logic of the argument of the hon. Member for North Cornwall about the confusion that he found in having a choice of services at Gatwick and at Littleborough—I wonder what he was doing there—must be that he would want those services nationalised as well. Why stop there? If ownership and control is essential to the provision of an integrated transport system, whatever that means, do the British Airports Authority and British Airways need to be renationalised so that they can be integrated? Do buses and coaches need to be renationalised? What about the National Freight Corporation?

The logic of the arguments of the right hon. Member for Yeovil leads to the reincarnation of the British Transport Commission, and for every aspect of transport by land, sea and air to be owned and controlled by the state. Having been bold enough to adopt the orphaned policy of nationalisation, abandoned by its Labour family, why is the right hon. Gentleman shy of going the whole hog? This new commitment to state ownership and centralised control sits very uncomfortably alongside his other commitments to local decision-making.

Mr. Tyler rose—

Mr. Spearing rose—

Mr. Watts: I shall give way first to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing).

Mr. Spearing: Irrespective of ownership, does not the Minister's plan hinge on finance? If the rail service is to be as good—or bad—as it is now when it is under private operation, and if Railtrack is to be privatised with some notional return on capital, how will the financial surplus, or rather the deficit which is covered by the nation as a whole, be met? Will it be met entirely by the alleged efficiency of the operators and the alleged efficiency of Railtrack, which does not currently operate? How can the Minister square the financial matters, irrespective of ownership?

Mr. Watts: By continuing public subsidy to support socially necessary services, to which the Government have a strong attachment. But a new structure in which the parts of the railway industry that can operate on a proper commercial footing do so, and in which subsidy is targeted on securing services for passengers—replacing the miasma of cross-subsidy and lack of transparency—will ensure much better value for money for taxpayers.

Mr. Tyler: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Watts: I will give way one last time; then I must finish my speech.

Mr. Tyler: I now understand better why the Minister's colleague in the Austrian Government is so fascinated by the intricacies that the Minister obviously enjoyed presenting to him.

Why does the Minister say that it is impossible for the infrastructure to be in public control as part of a public transport policy, and for different operators to be allowed to use it, when that is precisely what happens on the roads?

Mr. Watts: I do not say that it is impossible. Indeed, when I spoke in Vienna I said that I believed that substantial benefits could be gained from restructuring so that the functions were separated. We go further, however, believing that there are further efficiencies to be gained from transferring businesses to the private sector.

Nationalisation has not proved a conspicuously successful model for our railways. Over the last 45 years or so, Governments of all persuasions have poured money into British Rail—over £54 billion in current values. Despite all that, the railways have continued to decline. In 1953, 17 per cent. of journeys were made by train and 24 per cent. of goods were moved by rail. Today both figures are about 5 per cent., and they have been dropping.

Why is that? It is because state ownership, and thus state management, has failed the railways. The monolithic monopoly did nothing for the passenger; it did nothing for the freight customer; and it did nothing for the owners—the taxpayers. Because of the structure, the old-style British Rail management was not in a position to be responsive to customers' needs. It had no incentives to improve performance. A giant unitary organisation cannot hope to supply services as well as a competitive private sector operating commercially.

Something had to be done. Someone had to be bold enough to grasp the nettle and create a new approach and a new framework for rail services in the United Kingdom. That is what we did with the Railways Act 1993. We did it for three reasons. First, we wanted to improve the quality of service to the customer. That comes first, because it must: it is the most important thing for everyone connected with the railway industry to remember. Secondly, we wanted to improve the efficiency of the railways. Thirdly, we wanted to halt and reverse the decline in the use of railways.

I cannot believe that more of the same—the failed structure and operation of nationalisation—is the preferred option among Opposition Members, especially given the example of the outstanding success of privatisation in other transport sectors. Let us compare privatised British Airways with loss-making nationalised continental flag carriers such as Air France; or let us consider BAA, which, in the private sector, invests on average three times as much each year as it did as a nationalised industry.

Privatisation will provide passengers with new guarantees that nationalisation has never delivered. Passenger service requirements will protect every station and every route on the network. Competitive bidding for franchises will ensure better value for taxpayers. Subsidy will be targeted more effectively. The fares regime announced by the franchising director will ensure that passengers share in the greater efficiency that privatisation will bring. Controls over key fares on every route will deliver fares 4 per cent. lower in real terms over seven years.

It is because of the outstanding achievements of privatisation in other transport sectors that we can be confident that rail privatisation will deliver for rail passengers what airline privatisation has already provided for airline passengers. That is why we have no fear of the future, and no nostalgia for the failed doctrine of state ownership and state control.

4.39 pm

Mr. Keith Hill (Streatham): Hope springs eternal, as they say, and it is evident from the somewhat unconvincing performance of the Minister of State that this is one privatisation too far. Despite the twists and turns of a Government increasingly desperate to proffer some crumbs of comfort to a sceptical public—most recently, for example, the highly misleading fare capping announcement and the so-called service guarantee, which is simply a myth—the public remain unpersuaded about the case for rail privatisation, and indeed deeply hostile to it.

Privatisation is undesired by rail passengers, and its structure—the separation of track, signalling and operations—has been condemned by virtually every railway professional at home and abroad. Its passage though Parliament was both time-consuming and profoundly contentious. The great rail sale has been greeted with almost total indifference by the private sector. Meanwhile, however, the uncertainty created by the privatisation has had a devastating affect on the rail manufacturing industry, and has placed a question mark over the 35,000 jobs associated with that industry.

The Railway Industry Association, the representative body of railway equipment manufacturing companies, has pointed to significant shortfalls in the expected investment in both the track and signalling since the inception of Railtrack. There is still no prospect of the urgently overdue modernising of the west coast main line, which will require major new investment in both infrastructure and rolling stock. Rolling stock orders for the west coast main line are dependent—if the Government survive for that long—on the granting of a franchise for that line, and that is unlikely to occur until 1997 at the earliest.

The worst effects have been felt in the rolling stock manufacturing sector as a result of the uncertainty created by privatisation. As my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Bayley) has pointed out, 1,800 jobs in York have been lost as a result of the hiatus in rolling stock orders. That is nearly 2,000 blighted lives and families as a direct result of rail privatisation.

Still, it is an ill wind that blows nobody any good, so let us not forget the real beneficiaries of privatisation. We have heard various estimates of the cost of rail privatisation, but let us go with the modest estimates of the Department of Transport. The Department now estimates that the cost of privatisation to date—for the work of legal experts, property and marketing consultants, accountants, tax specialists and merchant bankers—amounts to a still colossal £240 million. Privatisation has been a gold mine for the Government's mates in the City of London. The City slickers have made a mint from the great rail sell-off, and that is a scandal which must not and will not be overlooked during the whole sorry saga of the railway privatisation.

In all likelihood, rail privatisation will cost us all as taxpayers an extra £500 million a year to run the same level of service—if we are lucky. In 1993-94, before the so-called restructuring of the railway finances, the cost of railway grants to the taxpayer were just over £1 billion. In 1994-1995, after the restructuring, the final outturn figure is £1,560 million.

By 1996-1997—on the basis of the Government's estimates of the likely spending of the rail franchising director and the projections of current costs and revenues of the railway—the total cost to the taxpayer of running the same level of services is likely to stand at £1. 7 billion per annum. If the Minister has any doubts whatsoever about these estimates, I suggest that he consults the trends set out in figures 16 and 17 of the Department's "Transport Report 1995".

There will be an increase of at least £500 million in the cost to the taxpayer for a railway that will in all likelihood deliver the same level of services as before privatisation. It is difficult to see the benefit to the taxpayer or to the rail passenger of that massive growth in costs. What of the other proclaimed benefits of privatisation to the rail passenger?

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): I have considerable affection and some respect for the hon. Gentleman, and I may have missed him refer to this matter earlier on. He is talking about the potential benefits of privatisation to the passenger. I believe that I am right in saying that the hon. Gentleman is sponsored by the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers. Could he be more concerned about the benefits to the members of that union?

Mr. Hill: I hardly think so. The members of that union perceive few benefits under the existing conditions on the railway, never mind in the future. I shall anticipate the hon. Gentleman, who may continue by attacking—as is traditional with Conservative Members—the strikes declared in the railway industry. I find those attacks only too typical.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is it in order that Members who address the House should declare their interests before speaking in a debate?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I must make it clear to the House that it is incumbent upon each individual Member to decide whether it is necessary to declare such an interest. If an hon Member so decides, he must, of course, declare that interest.

Mr. Hill: I declare an interest in my south London commuter constituents, who are profoundly fearful of the consequences of rail privatisation, for reasons that I am about to spell out in yet further detail.

What of the other proclaimed benefits of privatisation to the rail passenger? The Government's most recent and desperate effort to paper over the cracks of rail privatisation has been the franchising director's commitment to cap fares at the level of inflation over the period of the initial franchise agreement. So far, so good. That is, on the face of it, good news for the captive commuters of London and the south-east, who have suffered fare increases well in excess of the rate of inflation for too long.

Unfortunately, all is not as it first appears. The wrinkles are already showing through the rouge. Individual fares may increase above or below the target range, provided the weighted average remains within it. That depends critically on the basket of fares being truly representative, which it will not be if below-average increases are concentrated on tickets which are, in practice, rarely sold. We must monitor that development very carefully indeed.

Mr. Spearing: I understood that that average was weighted according to the actual volume of transactions, as I believe is the case with the retail prices index. Is my hon. Friend saying that the average is not truly weighted in terms of expenditure?

Mr. Hill: I understand that the average is extracted from a basket of fares over a period. In that context, it is certainly possible—unless we are extremely careful—that the overall average will not be representative of the true level of fare increases.

The key leisure fares for my south London constituents—the one-day travelcard and the cheap day return—are specifically exempted from regulation by the franchising director. The key fare for my constituents, and for most of the constituents in London and the south-east, is the period travelcard. That card, which is indispensable to most London commuters, appears also to be exempted if London Transport and the franchisees can reach an agreement on its price. The temptation to collusion to fix a price for the travelcard at any level they want is obvious. So where is the benefit in that?

From an analysis of the franchising director's "Passenger Rail Industry Overview", which set out the details for the first three franchises, we know four things. First, there will be no protection for existing child fare reductions. Secondly, provision at stations of timetables showing all the services that call there will be required only

"as far as is practicable".

Thirdly, operators will be free to use any type of rolling stock that they like. Fourthly, if VAT were to be levied on public transport, the franchising director would reimburse franchisees, with no provision for passing the relief on to passengers. Again, where is the benefit for rail passengers in all that?

Finally, there are the two jewels in the crown of the announcement by the former Secretary of State on passenger service requirements. The first was his commitment on overcrowding. On 7 February, he said:

"Because the passenger service requirement specifies maximum load factors for peak services, they"—

that is, commuters—

"will receive a guarantee that the operator will have to put on extra trains if demand for services increases, instead of simply cramming more people into existing trains."

However, from the franchising director's detailed guidelines, we now know that peak period overcrowding limits will be based on timetabled services rather than on the services that are actually run. In other words, the operator can run as many short-formed trains as he likes, and can even cancel as many as he likes. Provided that the trains are on the timetable, he will be deemed to be achieving his loading targets.

The detailed guidelines also tell us that, in any case, overcrowding limits are set at a level lower than that currently achieved by most sectors of Network SouthEast. Contrary to the previous Secretary of State's firm expectations, there is no incentive whatever in the guidelines for franchisees to put on extra trains. What benefit does rail privatisation bring there?

In his speech on 7 February, the former Secretary of State also said:

"Our plans for the railways offer something new for passengers; they offer guarantees. For the first time there will be an absolute guarantee of service levels."—[Official Report, 7 February 1995; Vol. 254, c 210, 211.]

But in his guidelines issued in early June, the franchising director said of himself and the franchisee:

"Either party may propose a change to the passenger service requirement at any time during the course of the franchise".

If that can be done at any time, there is no guarantee. What is the point of a guarantee if it can be changed at any time?

Many of the Government's promises on rail privatisation, including guaranteed service levels and reduced rush hour overcrowding, are now seen to be worthless. Rail privatisation is a fraud and a shambles. What is more, it is a more expensive fraud and shambles. If the Government had an ounce of common sense or decency, they would scrap the whole daft lot of it.

4.53 pm

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): I have a sneaking suspicion that we have just been listening to the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers' brief, or part of it. It would have been a little more honest of the hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill) if he had confessed to being sponsored by that union and to being a long-term member of it.

This is a Liberal day of debate on railways, which are clearly the flavour of the month for that party. I am sure that all my hon. Friends found it interesting to see 12 Liberal Democrat Members in the Chamber at one point, which must be something of a record. Even the leader of the party popped in for a moment or two, although he did not stay to confess to his Perth speech, which was mentioned by the Minister.

It is good that the Liberals have raised the subject of the railways, because clearly the Labour party will not make much of a contribution. I am not sure whether Labour Members have all dashed off, as their Welsh colleagues did yesterday, or whether they are drinking tea somewhere in London.

I have noticed that, in various parts of London, Liberals are now indulging in a fair bit of scaremongering about rail privatisation. I have even seen one or two of the famous questionnaires that they hand out. Out of seven questions, I counted six leading questions that would never have been allowed in a court of law. There were questions such as, "Do you believe that rail privatisation will be a disaster for the railways?" What is one supposed to say?

One questionnaire claimed that £700 million was being spent on legal fees for railway privatisation, and then asked, "Do you think that that money should have been spent somewhere else, such as on the railways?" How is one supposed to answer that? The Liberals always get the answer "yes" from the people they so regularly canvass on the railway stations of London and elsewhere.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) may say that this is a central office research department plant, but what fascinates me about the Liberals is the fact that the hon. Gentleman's colleagues on the Isle of Wight welcomed the privatisation of rail services there. My hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Field) told me that. He has heard that from the Liberal council there, and read it in the local paper. So what is so wrong with rail privatisation according to the hon. Member for North Cornwall and his 11 colleagues, who are not speaking for the Isle of Wight this afternoon?

Mr. Tyler rose—

Mr. Tracey: Does the hon. Gentleman want to put the record straight or to twist it a bit more?

Mr. Tyler: I warned the hon. Gentleman not to use out-of-date Conservative research department briefs. If he had attended several previous debates, he would have heard his extraordinary statement repeated again and again, and specifically answered each time by my hon. Friends. We support the privatisation of individual services. I went to the Isle of Wight and specifically supported the initiative there, so why does the hon. Gentleman go on about it? The only possible reason is that, unfortunately, the new chairman of Conservative central office has not yet torn up those outdated briefs.

Mr. Tracey: I can easily say in response to the hon. Gentleman that all my hon. Friends and I support the privatisation of every single railway service in this country. As I shall explain, that seems to be working rather well.

Liberals are anti-privatisation—and anti-car too. They do not like too many cars on the road, or any cars that burn petrol and cause fumes, as the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) has told us many times. The Liberals also oppose road building, except when the bypass in question happens to be in a part of the world where they control the council, or hold one of the seats. It is not long since we heard about a little fracas concerning a bypass in Berkshire that the Liberals as a party support, although they often say the opposite.

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): Is not another example of Liberal hypocrisy the way in which they tell environmentalists how much they favour a carbon tax to cut noxious emissions, yet tell pensioners that they do not approve of VAT on gas and electricity?

Mr. Tracey: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Those of us who have ever had much to do with the Liberal Democrats, especially in the south of England, know only too well that there is often a slight shift of policy between one street and the next, or even between one front door and the next. If neighbours are not at their door at the same moment, it is convenient to tell a different story.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: The hon. Gentleman, uncharacteristically, is almost in danger of sounding embittered. As he is talking about different policies, will he say which ones he supported in the privacy of the ballot box last week? Did he vote for the Prime Minister—the least worst option, as the Minister for Transport in London described the victory—or did he vote for the alternative Conservative policies?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I cannot see how that can be relevant to the debate.

Mr. Tracey: I am grateful for your lesson on that, Madam Deputy Speaker. If the hon. Gentleman had been watching the television last Tuesday night, he would have discovered how I voted, because most of the British nation seemed to do so.

My hon. Friends and I are seeking to show that there are elements of hypocrisy in the Liberal party and in its motion. I fear that, because of its hang-up about rail privatisation, it is seriously misleading the public and, indeed, my constituents. Some Liberal Democrat councillors in the royal borough of Kingston upon Thames have been claiming that railway lines will close because of privatisation. That has been consistently and categorically denied by the managers of South West Trains, the franchising company in the area. Indeed, the passenger service requirement, which has been imposed by the franchising director, shows that there is now scope for an excessive number of trains compared to what we have at the moment.

I very much welcome the development of the franchising director and the PSRs, because it means that my constituents, and everybody else's, will for the first time have guarantees on services, whereas, as we all know only too well, in the heady old days British Rail could change services without telling anybody, without apologising and without doing anything to assist the travelling public.

Mr. Keith Hill: I have in front of me the guidelines for the first three franchisees, in which the franchising director says quite explicitly:

"Either party may propose a change to the passenger service requirement at any time during the course of the franchise."

Where is the guarantee in that?

Mr. Tracey: The point is that either party may propose a change. That does not mean that the franchising director will accept the change. [Laughter.] We can listen to the hypocritical laughter from Opposition Members, who are such great friends of the old British Rail, but, as I said earlier, it regularly changed services; it cut services, and very often it did not have the courtesy to tell the travelling public. That situation will not exist in future. I believe that there is a guarantee.

The Liberal Democrats, who at grass roots level are scaremongering about passenger services, are making residents and everyone else sick and tired of it all.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for generously giving way a second time. He should not rely on out-of-date Conservative central office briefs but do a bit more homework, because those of us from Scotland, who have been ahead in terms of the impact of privatisation, can assure him that the categorical, and no doubt sincere, ministerial assurances that were given about service provision were completely undermined by pre-emptive decisions based on subsidy, which is within the remit of the franchising director. I fear that the guarantees that the hon. Gentleman thinks he has are not worth the paper that they are not actually written on.

Mr. Tracey: I have a great affection for the hon. Gentleman. He, of course, represents a Scottish constituency; I represent a London constituency. I have had my guarantees from South West Trains, the franchising company running the trains on those lines.

I do not want to delay the House much longer, but I must share with it my experience of what is happening where Railtrack and South West Trains operate. I have, for a long time, been asking for refurbishment of Surbiton station, which is in my constituency and which is well known to commuters in south-west London and Surrey, because it is heavily used and was quite clearly in need of it. The greatest success that I had in three or four years was simply to get the clock there working again, which nevertheless was a great success to constituents who rely on it to tell the time. Now, as a result of Railtrack and South West Trains being in operation, £750,000 is being spent on refurbishment of the station. I very much welcome that; I do not believe that anybody can carp about that.

Secondly, on one of my lines, we have had a considerable problem with vandalism, and, indeed, with threats to passengers travelling alone. South West Trains put considerable investment into closed circuit television and into anti-vandal measures on the station concerned in response to the complaints of local residents, including the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay), who sits opposite in rather a different role.

Railtrack is investing £27 million in signalling and track work on the main line between Wimbledon, running through my constituency, and Woking. I have had discussions with Railtrack's managers, who now say that they are quite convinced that they have far more flexibility and freedom to invest in the necessary infrastructure improvements than they ever had when they worked under the control of British Rail.

We have had the successful privatisations of British Telecom, British Airways, the British Airports Authority, the freight companies, Sealink and so on—the successes that we all know so well. That is what we are aiming to achieve with British Rail and the privatisation of the railway companies.

For too long, British Rail was a music hall joke in this country—something that would not have changed if the Labour party had been in power for the past few years. The Government are making progress and we shall continue to do so.

5.8 pm

Mr. Henry McLeish (Fife, Central): I welcome the new Secretary of State for Transport to his challenging position, and in his absence might I suggest that his first main challenge is to dump privatisation of the railways? It is alleged that he is on the centre left of the Conservative party and that he is interested in transport. He could do nothing better for the nation than to scrap what is now becoming a farce and a fiasco throughout the length and breadth of Britain. I suspect that his predecessor, who has moved on to the chairmanship of the party, will have the profound disappointment of being chairman for two years with the party in government and then for five years with it in opposition. What an ordeal for anyone to have to suffer for the next seven years.

Crucially, the Government will not accept that they are tearing the heart out of the railways. In the past 18 months, issue after issue has shown that they are not achieving any of their privatisation objectives but are destroying much of the morale, the network and initiative that have been built up in the past 30 or 40 years. It seems ludicrous that the Conservative party will not accept that policy, not personalities, lies at the heart of their deep unpopularity.

The Prime Minister involved himself in a vote of confidence and started off by saying that there were a few nutters in his party of whom he had to take care. After 12 days, he had managed to firm them up to 30 per cent. of the parliamentary Conservative party opposing him—a real achievement. [HON. MEMBERS: "What has this to do with the railways?"] It is relevant to the policy issues that are facing the country. If the Opposition have some patience, the relevance will sink in even with them—

Mr. Simon Burns (Lord Commissioner to the Treasury): We are the Government, not the Opposition.

Mr. McLeish: If I want to practise for the future, it is not incumbent on the Whip to intervene.

In the reshuffle, the new Secretary of State for Transport was brought in and we welcome that change, but the nation is not interested in shuffling heads on the deck of the Tory Titanic. The problem is the crucial policy issues in which it is immersed. Conservative Members may laugh, as the Government Whip is, but we will have the final laugh within 22 months.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: My constituents are already laughing at the pleasure and comfort of travelling in the brand new Networker rolling stock with which the Government have provided British Rail.

Mr. McLeish: I admire the bravery of the hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold). Anyone who voted for the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) deserves some credit. His intervention was not predicated on the fact that he is a consultant for Thomas Cook Group Ltd.

Mr. Arnold: I am not.

Mr. McLeish: According to the Register of Members' Interests, the hon. Gentleman is a consultant to Thomas Cook Group Ltd. If my hon. Friends can be challenged on their contributions, it is right for the House to appreciate that an interest may be involved.

Mr. Arnold: For the hon. Gentleman's information, I am not a consultant to Thomas Cook. I worked for the company for a number of years and carried out a consultancy for it not so long ago, but I am not at present a consultant.

Mr. McLeish: You may want to give us some guidance, Madam Deputy Speaker. In the Register of Members' Interests dated 31 January 1995, it states Thomas Cook—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. As I have explained to the House before, it is incumbent on a Member to declare an interest, if there is one, but matters change. My recollection is that an interest must be recorded in the register within a month. Clearly there will be changes whenever the book is published.

Mr. McLeish: I am grateful for that clarification, Madam Deputy Speaker. Until about six months ago, the hon. Member for Gravesham was a consultant to Thomas Cook Ltd., but I will move on.

It is important to identify the key issues. Despite the contributions of Conservative Members, they will not accept that privatisation is deeply damaging to the fabric of the rail network. We constantly hear this nonsense about rail privatisation being the same as any other privatisation. Was British Airways chopped into 95 pieces and sold off? Of course not. Even if one were prejudiced and ideologically committed enough to privatise British Rail, one could not have picked a more monumentally stupid way to undertake the process.

That is the essential difference between the Government's arguments about this privatisation as compared to previous privatisations. They talk about integration but what a sick joke that is as regards the 95 pieces that the Government are trying to pretend would be a comprehensive and integrated national rail network.

On the timetable for privatisation, as the legislation was enacted in November 1993, why has not one of the 25 franchises been sold off? Who is dragging their feet? Is it the Front-Bench conspirators who are against what the Government are doing? Does the hon. Member for Gravesham want to intervene now? The Government have a target of selling off 51 per cent. by April 1996. Does any Conservative Member think that that can be achieved? I would like to be persuaded. Clearly, the timetable is in disarray, and it is creating tremendous problems for the railways.

The second issue is cost. My hon. Friends have mentioned the serious costs involved. The amount has been estimated at £500 million, £1 billion or more, but the real point is the opportunity that we are losing by squandering taxpayers' money on this futile exercise. Of course, no one mentions the fact that the public service obligation grant was virtually doubled in a year, not to provide extra services or any extra investment but simply to fatten up Railtrack and the rolling stock leasing companies for sale.

My hon. Friends are right to point out that, if privatisation goes ahead, in 1997-98 a privatised Railtrack will be £600 million to £700 million more expensive every year as far as one can see into the future. Will any Conservative Member defend that—a privatisation that costs the taxpayers an extra £600 million to £700 million? I do not see Conservative Members queuing up to intervene. Why not? This is a taxpayers' issue. Are we not always being lectured by the Government that we must be prudent with the nation's taxes and finances? I do not think we will get any volunteers to argue for the sheer lunacy of that policy.

Investment is the basis for this debate. Why is 30 per cent. of rolling stock more than 30 years old? Is that not a criterion on which one would base an investment decision? Not at all. Conservative Back Benchers are now quiet. The argument has hit home. Of course we need investment. Why should people have to endure 30-year-old coaches in the south-east and throughout the network? Modern coaches do not prevent accidents, but one's chances of survival and the chances of minimising threats to passengers will be that much better in a coach that was constructed last year than in one constructed 30 years ago. Investment is crucial for safety, and the Government are running away from their responsibilities.

We have also heard much about the west coast main line. A tragedy is unfolding because the Government promised that that would be a prestigious flagship project costing £1 billion. What are we getting now? We are getting apologies, because all that they are going to spend is £18 million on restructuring the signalling system. Words escape me, but the word "scandal" comes to mind. Are the Government merely breaking their promises, or is a link that would take people from the north of Scotland through the centre of England and on to Europe being abandoned? That is what is happening. Despite the protestations and the fine words from Railtrack chairman Bob Horton and from Ministers, the fact is that £18 million is becoming a substitute for a £1 billion project that is disappearing into the mists of time.

Why are everyone's energies tied up in this most useless of privatisation exercises? Constituencies on the west coast main line want improved passenger safety and quality in our train network. What they cannot stomach is the fact that the Tories are reneging on a promise to reconstruct the line, and the taxpayer is paying hand over fist towards this monumentally stupid exercise. It is difficult to understand how the Government could get it so wrong. Is it because they are dominated by prejudice and ideological extremism, or did they genuinely think that smashing a railway into 95 pieces and starving it of investment was the way forward? Those points must be on the consciences of Conservative Members.

The final point about the state of disarray of the railways concerns freight. The battle for freight is about the survival of the rail freight industry. It is not about building on an industry which is doing spectacularly well—it would be wrong to suggest that—but about working on an industry that has potential. What did the Government do? They created an artificial internal market and turned the rail freight industry into three companies. When will Ministers appreciate that the battle for freight is not within the railways but between rail and road? [Interruption.]

I hear an hon. Gentleman say, "Of course it is," from a sedentary position. I should like that constructive comment to be passed on to Ministers. The capacity of Ministers to pursue dogma through internal market competition is nothing to do with the real battle. They should think again about the three companies. [HON. MEMBERS: "That has nothing to do with it."] It has everything to do with it.

The situation is clear. The Government, like us, are surely committed to creating a better environment beyond the year 2000. One small way in which they can contribute to that is to shift road freight on to the railways.

The key issue should be the competition that we should be generating between rail and road. The Government are not doing that. [Interruption.] Whether the hon. Member for Gravesham likes it or not, he might like to take a more active interest in the issue by persuading Ministers that the real struggle concerns the environment and competition between road and rail, not internal competition within the railways, which is absolute nonsense and merely reinforces the prejudices of Conservative Members and does nothing for the industrial economy in Britain.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Why does the hon. Gentleman think that, through all the years of nationalised railways, there has been a steady shift—not least by the Post Office—from rail to road freight? Why could not British Rail compete effectively under nationalisation? Surely a number of British Rail franchisees competing to pick up business are highly likely to get it, because they will have the private enterprise ethic to guide them to be successful, to get business and thereby to profit from it.

Mr. McLeish: The realities of the railway do not reinforce the hon. Gentleman's points. It is clear that there has been a decline in respect of both passengers and freight in the usage of rail. No one disputes that.

The Government's answer to problems always involves prejudice and ideological extremism. Their every utterance is about nationalisation and bad management of the national rail network. That is indicative of one of the reasons why the country is in the state that it is. For 16 years, it has been public bad, private good. The hon. Member for Gravesham can sit back in his seat and relax but when confronted with reality at the next general election the smile will be wiped off his face.

Mr. Hawkins: The hon. Gentleman talked of the state that the country is in. This country is now the leading economy in Europe, with profitable and successful businesses; it is not the sick man of Europe that the Labour party left in 1979.

Mr. McLeish: I am encouraged by the hon. Gentleman's anger. His intervention bears no relationship to the reality in Britain or to reality for our European Union partners. His comment was important. I hope that it will be well circulated to his constituents.

It is clear that this whole process is in a state of disarray. I welcomed the new Secretary of State for Transport. His main challenge is to persuade a number of his colleagues in the Cabinet that the whole process should be dumped.

I want to finish on two points that sum up this fiasco. I am sure that the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) will deal with the issue of sleeper services to Scotland. The Government and the British Railways Board were dragged into the courts in Scotland to be exposed for what they had shown to Scots—utter contempt for their rail network. They thought that, through stealth and the incompetence of the director of franchising, Mr. Roger Salmon, they could close services under the guise of consultation on a draft passenger service requirement. They were found out. Is it not a disgrace that railway policy is now going to be partly dictated in the courts of England and Scotland? That is a fiasco and the Government know it.

The second issue is trans-European networks. It is an important issue for Britain because it involves integrating the major routes in Britain with those in Europe. It is absolutely right that that should be done. What did Ministers do when they went to Brussels? They sabotaged the proposals. We find that the European Union is giving no priority to schemes. It has thrown out environmental impact assessments and of course no cash is being provided by the European Union for such developments.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: That is appalling rubbish.

Mr. McLeish: The hon. Gentleman says that that is appalling rubbish, but I put that comment on record. The hon. Gentleman, as part of his education and to gain the knowledge that he clearly lacks, should read the Council of Ministers, report from the Cannes summit, from which he will clearly see that I am correct.

Mr. Tyler: I understood the hon. Gentleman to say that he proposed to conclude in a minute. Before he does so, could he comment on this statement by the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair):

"I am not going to spray around commitments as to what we are going to do when the Government carries through its proposals, if it carries them through. I am not going to get into a situation where I am declaring that the Labour Government is going to commit sums of money to renationalisation".

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not sit down without telling us precisely how his party stands and whether he is prepared to give a commitment, alongside ours, to retain Railtrack in the public interest.

Mr. McLeish: The essential difference between us and the Liberal Democrats is that we will form the next Government. As a consequence, we have to take the issues seriously. There is a great contradiction in the hon. Gentleman's contribution. In one breath he says that we do not know what the nature of the sale will be or even whether it will be sold. Will it be 51 per cent. that is sold? What will be the nature of the Government's involvement? It is wise and prudent of my right hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) to say that. There is no point in a party that will take over Government in less than 20 months making specific financial commitments on any issue that affects every Department.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: The hon. Gentleman said earlier that the Government have been going across to Brussels and somehow obstructing environmental statements on European infrastructure projects. Surely he knows that an environmental statement was produced and published on the channel tunnel rail link last November. Has he not read it?

Mr. McLeish: I can dismiss that comment by pointing out that anybody who voted for the right hon. Member for Wokingham is not in a position to speak about Europe in a positive manner.

The Minister for Transport in London (Mr. Steve Norris): I do not want to intrude on private grief, but before the hon. Gentleman sits down I would be interested to hear his reply to the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler). I admit that it is an unlikely eventuality but it might help us to know whether the hon. Gentleman is prepared to go down the rash and extraordinary road that the hon. Member for North Cornwall is prepared to go down and announce now that he is prepared to take Railtrack back into public ownership, for there is no doubt that it will by then be in the private sector. Will Labour take back into public ownership the train operating companies which will by then be in the private sector?

It would help the House to know, given the interest of the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) in sleeper services, what subsidy the hon. Gentleman believes it is appropriate for the Government to inject into such services. A figure—some real commitment and not just waffle—on such matters would be extraordinarily helpful.

Mr. McLeish: It is invigorating from our point of view to be put in the position of a Government—we have the Liberals on the one hand and the Minister on the other. To be fair, the Minister should be congratulated because he survived a remarkable—[HON. MEMBERS: "Here we go."] I think that the Minister would like to hear what I have to say. I speak to him outside the Chamber, although I do not know whether that helps his career. However, despite his remarkable comments about the Prime Minister—[HON. MEMBERS: "They were an endorsement."] They were an endorsement, in a way. In any event, the Minister is back in the transport team—he is a survivor.

However, it would be ludicrous for me to rise to the bait and to get involved in the tension between the Conservative and Liberal parties. At the next election, two parties will be fighting for their political skins—the Conservatives and the Liberals. The natural tension and enmity between them is something to behold.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): The hon. Gentleman is like a little worm wriggling.

Mr. McLeish: I hope that Hansard caught that, as it is quite an enlightened comment from the hon. Gentleman, who is not known for such comments.

The point is that the Labour party will form the next Government and the Conservatives will be in opposition. We shall have the policies not only to put the country back on its feet but to put the railways back together.

After a series of interventions, I must conclude my remarks by dealing with the trans-European networks.

Mr. Norris rose—

Mr. McLeish: I shall not give way. The Minister will be winding up, and I have been reasonably generous in accepting interventions.

[Mr. McLeish]

The trans-European networks are hugely symbolic of the direction that a modern railway should be taking beyond the year 2000. It is a huge disappointment to people who care about the rail network and want a prosperous economy that the Government are dragging their feet on participation in and support for such an innovative venture. However, it illustrates the malaise that affects our railways and which is solely the responsibility of a Government who will not face their investment responsibilities for the next century, but who instead want to indulge in a privatisation which will not be good for Britain or any part of Britain, and which will clearly not be good for passengers who currently use the rail network.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Blackpool, South): The people whom I want to benefit from the Government's plans for the rail network are the passengers, not the rail unions which so dominate the Labour party's thinking or the apologists or second-class socialists on the Liberal Democrat Benches.

Mr. Stephen: My hon. Friend does the Liberals an injustice by calling them second-class socialists. Will he accept that they are first-class socialists? The evidence for that is that they are making a commitment to renationalise the railways, whereas the Labour party is not.

Mr. Hawkins: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his contribution. I have always been wedded to the idea that the Liberal Democrats could not be first-class anything, but perhaps my hon. Friend is right.

It was no surprise to hear the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish) defend the traditional, entrenched producer culture of the public sector unions. I notice that his office benefits from Unison, formerly the National Union of Public Employees, which funds a research officer in his department. I notice that, before entering the House, the hon. Gentleman's history included a period as a researcher for the social work department of Edinburgh university and periods as a university lecturer and planning officer. He does not understand the private sector, because he has never worked in it. Like almost all his colleagues and almost all the Liberal Democrats, he has no idea about private sector business. He and those like him do not understand customer service; they are in the pockets of the public sector unions. Labour and Liberal Democrat policies are all bought and paid for.

Let us consider Labour's position on previous privatisations and the accuracy of its predictions. The right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) claimed in 1983:

"The public telephone box could be threatened with extinction".—[Official Report, 18 July 1983; Vol. 46, c. 41.]

Would any Labour spokesman wish to go back to the days of a public sector British Telecom?

Labour's record is equally deplorable on other issues. The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) claimed that bus deregulation and privatisation

"will not improve the lot of the bus passenger".—[Official Report, 22 May 1985; Vol. 79, c. 1096.]

What has happened since deregulation and privatisation went ahead?

Mr. Charles Kennedy: Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the warning in lavatories and sleepers on British Rail trains, which states that one should not drink the water? I fear that he may not have heeded that advice, judging by his condition this afternoon. I am really intervening to give him a break so that he can catch his breath. Does he agree that the singular practical and fundamental difference—not a difference of political philosophy—between rail privatisation and all the others that he has mentioned is the difficulty caused by having an infrastructure and operators who pay an access charge to it? The hon. Gentleman is comparing apples with oranges.

Mr. Hawkins: The hon. Gentleman has failed to understand that I am going through the history of Labour's Front-Bench spokesmen and their inaccurate predictions about privatisation. I promise that I shall deal with the issue that he has raised because it is also important for my constituency.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich was proved wrong, because bus mileage outside London has increased by almost a quarter since deregulation and operating costs—crucially—have come down by a third.

Mr. Keith Hill: Will the hon. Gentleman enlighten the House as to how bus privatisation has benefited the 13 million bus passengers a year who have ceased to use the buses?

Mr. Hawkins: The hon. Gentleman's intervention does not relate to the quotation that I read out. The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich said that bus deregulation and privatisation would not improve the lot of the passenger, but bus mileage has gone up and operating costs have come down by a third.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Is not the answer to the question asked by the hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill) that passengers who no longer travel on the buses now travel in their personal cars which, thanks to the prosperity created by the Government, they can afford?

Mr. Hawkins: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. However, I must return to the catalogue of incorrect predictions made by Labour's Front-Bench spokesmen.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) described British Airways as the "pantomime horse of capitalism" in November 1979. As my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) said earlier, British Airways is now the world's favourite airline. The Opposition were wrong about buses, wrong about British Airways and wrong about British Telecom. They have been wrong about every privatisation.

Mr. Stephen: Does my hon. Friend agree that, if the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish) and his colleagues were to set up in business as clairvoyants, they would risk prosecution under the Trade Descriptions Act 1968?

Mr. Hawkins: I agree with my hon. Friend. I represent one of the towns that has rather more accurate clairvoyants, and I suggest that some could advise Labour Front-Bench spokesmen in future.

Mr. McLeish: I hate to split up the double act, but will the hon. Gentleman consider the most important difference between the various privatisations, which is that British Rail is going to be axed into 95 bits and then sold? Does not that alter slightly the frame of reference within which he might wish to evaluate his comments?

Mr. Hawkins: What my constituents want out of privatisation is an improvement in their rail services. I am interested in the lot of the passenger. Many of the hon. Gentleman's Front-Bench colleagues were claiming that privatisation would not benefit the passenger—[Interruption.] I am seeking to answer the hon. Gentleman's question. Long before privatisation, and before pre-privatisation work started, British Rail axed the direct through services between Scotland, part of which he represents, and my constituency, and between London and my constituency.

The hon. Gentleman cannot claim a link between privatisation and the cutting of services. British Rail axed those services at the beginning of a Labour party conference some three years ago. I said then that, when the private sector had the opportunity to be involved in the railways, we should get back those through services. I can tell the hon. Gentleman that a private sector operator is proposing to reintroduce direct through services, which will benefit the passenger.

The result of the Government's policy, and the method that they have used, is bringing back to passengers services that the nationalised system got rid of. That is the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question. In part, it is also the answer to the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy).

The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) spoke about the £200 million—a mere bagatelle—that it would cost to take part of Railtrack back into the public sector, as is suggested by the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown). The Liberal Democrats propose imposing that cost on the British taxpayer for up to six years. If the hon. Member for North Cornwall believes that the pursuit of that Liberal Democratic dogma represents good value for the taxpayer, I beg to differ. The problem with the Liberal Democrats, as I think Winston Churchill previously said about another Liberal, is that "he has sat on the fence so long the iron has entered his soul."

Mr. Charles Kennedy: I think that the hon. Gentleman is getting his historic allusions mixed up. At the next general election, the public will obviously have a political choice to make, based on what we have to offer and our list of spending priorities. No one in the House should take any lecture from any Conservative, when a Conservative Government have presided over the billions of lost public money which was the poll tax—its invention, destruction and replacement. We will take no lectures about the Conservatives' prudential fiscal approach, given that track record.

Mr. Hawkins: The most important current factor about the rail network, and what is best for its customers and passengers, is the damaging proposals of the Associated Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen to disrupt rail services yet again. That will cost the taxpayer even more money and damage services to passengers, just as last year's signal workers' dispute led to the loss of £173 million.

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): I was not in the Chamber for the early part of the debate, so can my hon. Friend please remind me whether any member of the Labour Front-Bench team took the opportunity to condemn the proposed rail strike?

Mr. Hawkins: No such opportunity was taken, but that is not surprising, because the Labour party has always been an apologist for the rail unions, which dominate it. Every member of the shadow Cabinet receives research help or sponsorship from a trade union, so it is hardly surprising that they simply support their union paymasters.

Mr. Keith Hill: Can the hon. Gentleman explain why the Conservative party always defends the right of workers to strike in a free society yet invariably condemns them when they make the effort to do so?

Mr. Hawkins: The point about the proposed strike is that many of the train drivers and ASLEF members either did not vote, or voted against a strike. Well under half of those entitled to vote supported the strike. The proposed dispute is damaging not only to passengers' interests but to those of the taxpayer. The hon. Gentleman's friends in the rail unions support that strike call, as they have others on many occasions, because they see it an opportunity to fight a political, ideological battle. It has nothing to do with anyone needing any more money.

The train drivers are being offered a 3 per cent. pay increase while many of my constituents, who are struggling in the private and the public sectors, have been offered nothing like that. Many people have taken a pay cut to keep their businesses going. If the hon. Gentleman believes that the 3 per cent. offer is inadequate, I invite him to stand up as an apologist for the train drivers. I note that he does not want to accept that invitation.

We have sensible rail workers, including many who learned lessons from last year's dispute involving the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers. When the leader of that union recently called on his members to support the proposed strike, 9,503 staff voted against industrial action and just 8,980 voted in favour. I am sure that all the passengers who were delighted with that result are disappointed that ASLEF drivers, despite being offered a 3 per cent. pay increase, are calling for an unrealistic increase of 6 per cent. That is double the rate of inflation. They plan to damage passenger interests and to bring the rail network to a halt.

We need to provide continuing opportunities to attract private sector companies to the rail network because they would offer good services to passengers by introducing competition and investing in the rail infrastructure and new rolling stock. That is in the interests of the customers and the passengers, and that is why I support the Government's policy of privatising the rail network.

5.44 pm

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): As this is a Liberal Democrat Supply day, and reference has been made already to a by-election in another constituency, it is worth recalling what happened during the 1986 Ryedale by-election. The then successful Liberal candidate—in the old days of the Alliance—made it clear during the campaign that the privatisation of the buses would be a complete and utter disaster. What has happened since? The bus service in the Greater York area is now recognised, even by Labour-controlled York city council, as the best it has been for years. That is the consequence of that successful privatisation.

People may say, "Oh well, there are few rural bus services," but that was always so, and just a few passengers use them. At least people are aware of the commitment to continue the public subsidy of those socially desirable rural bus services. Those same principles underpin what the Government are seeking to achieve with the railways.

I am a strong supporter of privatisation generally, but it must be recognised that it is difficult to accommodate and accomplish it in some industries. Without doubt, privatisation has been a success in the transport sector. One need only consider long distance coaches, the road haulage business, buses, the British Airports Authority, National Freight and British Airways—an undoubted success—to recognise that. Those companies have done considerably better in the private sector than in the public sector, to the point where they have become world leaders, which is undoubtedly true of British Airways. We must ask whether that same success could be achieved for the railways. What benefits would privatisation bring to the railways? Is it even reasonable to compare the success of those other transport operators with the railways?

Even the most avid enthusiasts of British Rail would acknowledge that the railways do not work as well as they should. That was even truer before the Government announced their privatisation policy five years ago. It is a paradox, but, if anything, the most notable improvements in railway performance have occurred in the past four years, since the Government's commitment to privatise the railways was established.

Many of those improvements were achieved after significant increases in investment, especially in new rolling stock. My part of the world, Yorkshire, has benefited from the successful completion of the electrification of the east coast main line, which now provides far better services than those to which we were used. Sadly, that does not mean that the trains always run on time, but the service has improved and it is recognised as an international leader.

If there is a link between investment and improvement in railway performance, it suggests, as many hon. Members, particularly those from the Opposition, have sought to do today, that if we could only attract more investment, all the problems would be solved. I am sorry that the hon. Member for North Cornwall is not in his place, but I am sure that his colleagues will recount my following remarks. He referred to the annual report of British Railways Board, published just a few days ago, in which Mr. John Welsby, the chief executive, said that the current level of investment was not satisfactory.

Mr. Welsby is in a good position to know that as he is the chief executive of the British Railways Board. He has told us that there is a need for more investment. Yet in January, as recently as six months ago, as the House heard earlier from the hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley), the British Railways Board said that there was no commercial case for replacing old rolling stock on South Eastern Railways, especially in Kent, despite the fact that some of the trains are more than 30 years old.

I believe that part of the reason why there was no commercial case was the constraint of trying to meet Treasury rules, in order to make out a case for leasing new trains, even by a private finance initiative. The House knows from previous debates that the decision by the British Railways Board, on one hand saying that there is not enough investment but on the other effectively rejecting a privately funded opportunity to acquire new trains, has had devastating consequences for the people of greater Yorkshire, in the form of the announcement in May that the ABB carriage works in York is to close.

I remind the House that, even though the chief executive of the British Railways Board said that there was no commercial case for new rolling stock, as recently as December 1994 the head of South Eastern Railways told Conservative Members who represent Kent constituencies that new trains could be expected to be ordered fairly soon.

As you are probably aware, Madam Deputy Speaker, I have taken a great interest in that matter because the carriage works has been local to many of my constituents, and I have tried, as has the hon. Member for York, to save the carriage works in his constituency from closure. We have considered carefully the possibilities of using private finance to get new trains on the railway by means of the private finance initiative, but, sadly, it has not come to pass. I am left with the overall conclusion that, the railway remaining in the public sector, the rules of public finance by the Treasury are too stringent.

The British Rail chief executive, Mr. Welsby, said in his annual report that the current demand and emphasis should be on infrastructure. Despite the fact that I would much prefer more new rolling stock to have been built and ordered from the York carriage works, I believe that he is right about that. Indeed, the success of the electrification of the east coast main line is an example of what can be done when we are bold and when the funds are available to bring our railways up to date and make them the modern infrastructure that they need to be. The news that the west coast main line is to be re-electrified and modernised is very welcome.

I was an avid train spotter as a young lad, and I remember when the first electrification took place. It is staggering to consider that it is probably the best part of 35 or 40 years ago. All the steam trains disappeared, and we did not believe that there was much fun in watching the electrics go by; they were not the same.

I say to my hon. Friend the Minister, when we speak about infrastructure, please do not neglect the need to repair and renovate some of the rural lines, because they provide an extremely important service to local people. A privatised railway will continue to require a subsidy for those services from Government.

That argument for more capital investment—the debate has partly been characterised by that—always appears to be based on the assumption that only more public money can succeed in achieving that. The Government are blamed for not having invested enough money in the railway, but, as my hon. Friend the Minister of State said in his opening remarks, the Government's record on rail investment in recent years is very good. We should do more, but I fail to understand where in the public purse that new money will come from.

The fact that the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish) could not, in answer to my hon. Friend the Minister, answer directly what a Labour Government.

God forbid, might do if they were in office about, for example, renationalising Railtrack or making a further commitment to capital investment in the railway as a public sector operation—the fact that no amounts can be pledged—is a clear recognition that the Labour party knows that money does not grow on trees for that type of investment.

The House must face up to the reality that, if we want a truly modern railway, the amount of moneys that we need to make that a reality will come only from the private sector, not the public sector.

Any successful business reinvests out of retained profits or it seeks capital, whether by borrowing or in the form of share capital on which it expects a proper return. That is the basic economic fact of life. However, the key to the problem that we have with our railway is that, in the past 40 years, there has been a steady, gradual decline in rail passenger numbers. That has come in parallel with a dramatic increase in the use of the motor car and of road freight.

Mr. Stephen: They are more prosperous.

Mr. Greenway: That has been accompanied, as my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen) said from a sedentary position, by many people having greater prosperity and the opportunity to buy their own cars and exercise their freedom. As my hon. Friend the Minister said recently, they can exercise their freedom to get into their own car and go where they want to in their own transport.

There is, however, the opportunity for a dramatic change of public attitude and public behaviour, an opportunity to reverse that trend—to have more rail passengers, not fewer, and to get some of those cars off the road, especially for long journeys.

I shall always regard this period in the House as one of great sadness, because that opportunity to reverse passenger numbers must mean more railway trains, more carriages on our railway and more newly built modern trains, such as the Networkers, which are now being built in York for the Kent coast, and it is tragic, and sad for ABB York, that all that will happen too late.

I invite any Member of the House who is in the York region in the next few months to go and watch the gleaming new trains in the sidings being finished off—they will be running on lines in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) before too long—and to realise that, by Christmas, the carriage works will be silent and, just as we are about to embark on a period when we need more new trains, that modernised carriage works will be closed.

I mentioned earlier the need for more infrastructure investment and the fact that, in my eyes, that can come only from the private sector rather than the public sector. There is a parallel with what has happened in other privatisations in the past 10 years.

The water industry is perhaps the best example to draw attention to because, undoubtedly, for 25 to 30 years there was chronic under-investment in the water industry by successive Governments. That has not meant that putting that right has been popular with customers, who now must pay greater water charges for the improvement in infrastructure that must take place. However, had we left the water industry in the public sector, we should not have had the investment programme currently in place through the private sector, which is now so necessary. Those hon. Members who scream and shout about the extra charges to customers must recognise that there is a public demand for higher standards in water and in sewerage.

The same argument applies to the railways. The public want a better rail system—of that I am in no doubt. But the funding for it will not come out of the Treasury, whichever party is in Government.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones (Cardiff, Central): The hon. Gentleman is making an interesting comparison between British Rail privatisation and the water industry. Does he agree that a more accurate comparison would be with the deregulation of buses? During the deregulation of buses, there has been little evidence of huge investment in better and improved buses, and no evidence of extra passengers on those buses.

Mr. Greenway: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman was in the Chamber when I began my remarks, and I am not sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, were listening at that time. I was saying that, in the Greater York area, the privatisation or deregulation of buses has led to the best bus service that York has had for years. There has been an increase in the number of passengers and there have been new buses—big, medium and small. The Labour-controlled York city council is now proud of the service that is being provided. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman's argument stands up.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: I was at one with the comments on the Treasury made by the hon. Gentleman before the intervention of the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones). There is no doubt that, whichever political persuasion holds power in this country, the Treasury sees its remit as being to release as few funds as humanly possible, and it always will do.

I do not understand another aspect of the approach of the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues. By all means we can give the management of the railways more commercial freedom and flexibility to raise money and invest—I see no difficulty with that and it is not an ideological issue. The problem is that hiving the railways off into a multitude of individual companies and separating them from Railtrack goes way beyond the rational realisation of the policy that I think the hon. Gentleman, as a constituency Member, would want to see, and on which I agree with him.

Mr. Greenway: I am not totally out of sympathy with what the hon. Gentleman says. If he waits until the end of my remarks, which I am coming to shortly, he may hear me say what he has been saying, but in a different way.

We have a structure which has been agreed upon, whether or not it is the right one or could have been better. I am not an expert in such matters and am not in a position to make a judgment. However, the hon. Member for York and I set up the York Railway Forum. In the early stages of that forum, it was clear to us, certainly to me, that a great deal of work and effort by British Rail employees, from board level to shop floor workers, had been put into creating the new structure. To stop it now and tear it up would create an even bigger hiatus than the hon. Gentleman alleges has resulted from privatisation.

Many of the present problems, such as the closure of the ABB carriage works, have occurred because the process has taken far too long. It is six years since we privatised the British Rail engineering carriage works. There is no question—even ABB itself says—that, three to five years down the line, there will undoubtedly be a huge increase in demand for new trains in the private sector. I should like to have seen the process speeded up, which is why I feel that the situation at ABB is so sad.

I have taken up quite enough time, but I want to make one more point. In essence, far from blaming the current difficulties on the privatisation process on which the Government have embarked, the House and Parliament as a whole should now, as they should have done before, recognise the inevitability of what is happening and embrace it with far more enthusiasm. Even in this debate, the House cannot obtain a clear message from the Opposition about what they would do with the railways were they in Government. That is a clear recognition that they know that, were they to form the next Government, there is no blank cheque for the railways or for any other public sector industry.

To conclude and to put the final cherry on the cake of my argument, I referred a minute or so ago to the York Railway Forum, which we established three years or so ago to talk about York's future as a railway centre. York city council commissioned a report from railway consultants Steer, Davies and Gleave. The report's chief recommendation was that York—the city council, the chambers of commerce and all the industries represented in that great city—should embrace privatisation with enthusiasm. The report suggested that York should be promoted as a railway centre, but we are not doing that.

I can only commend that philosophy to the House, because I fervently believe that if we want a railway in the future of which we can be proud, we can achieve that only through private sector finance. I simply say to my hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London, "For goodness, sake, let's get on with it."

6.5 pm

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): This afternoon's debate has been interesting for at least two reasons. First, I thought that it was a Liberal debate, but Government Members have made all the constructive contributions—indeed, virtually all the contributions. One Back-Bench Labour Member has spoken and no Back-Bench Liberals—there have been only three of them in the House throughout the debate. It must be a Government debate after all.

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. Had he been longer in the House, he would know that, in a three-hour debate such as today's, we are not entitled to more than one speech at the beginning and one at the end. We could not intervene even if we wished to do so.

Mr. Luff: At least the Liberal Democrats could have come to listen to the hon. Gentleman, but they did not even do that.

The other interesting feature about this debate was the disappointing speech of the Labour Front-Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish). It was long on waffle and short on facts. His speech consisted largely of a series of assertions in which he suggested that the reason for the debate was the Government's ideology. I should remind him that the reason for the debate is not the Government's ideology, but an attempt to correct the failures of the Labour party's ideology.

As I said in the House in April last year, it was the Labour party whose approach to the nationalisation of the railways created all the difficulties in the first place. The Labour party created that ugly monster, the British Transport Commission, on 1 January 1948. Under Labour's Transport Act 1947, it had a duty to provide an integrated system of transport in Britain. But, as "The Great Western Railway History"—the official history, published in 1984—reveals:

> "Sir Cyril Hurcomb, Chairman of the BTC . . . made the mistake of organising rail, road and water in five separate Executives and . . . selected incompatible people for the Railway Executive, which left him with no hope of integrating road with rail, and no chance of integrating the four railways."

Nationalisation destroyed the hope of an integrated transport system in this country. The Government are setting about trying to correct that, which I welcome.

Declaring interests seems to have been the flavour of this debate. My interest is rather modest: I am a shareholder in two private railways, in which I take pride. The first is the Severn valley railway, in which I am a founder shareholder and where I recently took my first course in learning to drive a steam locomotive. The second is Eurotunnel, which is the most dramatic example of the contribution that can be made by private capital towards providing transport infrastructure for the next century.

I am a reasonably regular rail user and have benefited from the investment made in the Worcester to London services, which has transformed the use and quality of that line. I also look forward to benefiting from the upgrading of the west coast main line, which will be brought about by this Government's policies, using the private sector in imaginative ways. I believe that the railways should be allowed to benefit from privatisation in just the same way as all the other privatised utilities have benefited.

I recently gleaned intelligence from a journalist that the Labour party intends to target me because of my support for rail privatisation. I look forward to deriving some benefit from that in my constituency. I welcome anything that the Labour party can do to stimulate debate about rail privatisation in my constituency. We will win that debate, because the services will improve while Labour Members continue their foolish policy of support for industrial action that will only undermine the railway's long-term future.

My real concern is the interests of my constituents—particularly those who do not have access to private transport. The interests of the passengers are at the forefront of my mind when I offer the Government my unqualified support on rail privatisation. We have heard the figures about the declining usage of the railways, but they are worth repeating. In 1953, 17 per cent. of all passenger journeys were by rail; in 1963, the figure was 12 per cent.; in 1973, 8 per cent; and in 1995, 5 per cent. Something is going wrong, and the problem must be corrected. We need a new policy approach; not more of the same tried, tested and failed policies of the Labour party.

The same decline has occurred in the transport of goods by rail. The percentage of goods carried by rail has declined from 28 per cent. in 1953 to only 5 per cent. in 1995. That is not good enough, and we must do something to correct the imbalance.

I am not one who believes that everything is wrong with our railways; I believe that we have many reasons to rejoice in the way that our railways are functioning at present. The railways have an excellent record of coping with the needs of disabled passengers. There is no legislation in place, but ours is probably the best railway in the world in terms of the accessibility of its rolling stock to the disabled. All InterCity coaches are now accessible to people in wheelchairs, and I am told that there are more toilets for disabled people on British Rail trains than on all the trains in Europe combined. We should recognise that good things are happening on our railways.

There is much talk about trains in this country running late. If I could arrive as reliably at my destination by car as I can by train, I should be a happy man. We think nothing of adding half an hour or three quarters of an hour to our estimated journey times by car, but the same thing is viewed as an abject failure when it occurs on the railways. The Eurostar receives appalling treatment whenever its service fails. It does not happen often, but it receives an incredible amount of press coverage when it does. How often do those who travel to Paris by air—I do not do it often, Mr. Deputy Speaker—face an hour or two-hour delay from air traffic control? There is no coverage by the tabloid press in those circumstances, but it is a scandal whenever a train breaks down. We do not serve our railways well, and they deserve better treatment.

InterCity is the only main-line railway in Europe that makes a profit and I think that it still has more trains running at more than 100 mph than any other railway in Europe. I concede that there is a lot to be done if we are to build on existing strengths. Labour Members referred extensively to through ticketing. I do not think that the marketing of our railways is adequate. The ticketing structure is extremely complex—it is so complex that Labour Members obviously do not understand that through ticketing does not exist at present—and interoperability is a real problem.

There is a complex framework of savers, supersavers and awayday tickets. One can see the notices at Paddington which say that a certain ticket is not allowed on this or that train; it is a complex issue. I do not believe that the railways are getting their marketing right, and that is one of the central reasons why I strongly support privatisation.

We have heard about the track record of other privatised industries, each of which has improved the quality of the service that it offers to customers. The same thing will happen with the railways. On 23 January 1994, the Financial Times wisely said:

> "If the railways were working well, there would be an argument for leaving them alone. As it is, even with some of the highest fares in Europe they are under invested; passengers are still too often made to feel as though they are an incumbrance to the running of the railway, rather than the reason for it; and the trains do not run on time."

I think that the Financial Times is being a little hard on British Rail with that last remark. The railways need the injection of enterprise, flair, marketing expertise, management skill and new sources of capital that privatisation will bring.

In his opening remarks, the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) talked about accountability. The accountability that matters for the railways is its accountability to its passengers. That accountability is sadly lacking at present. I believe that privatisation will make the train-operating companies accountable to their passengers.

I believe that the passenger service requirements and brand-new contractual conditions on operators will also play a vital part in improving accountability. At present, British Rail can run down its services on a line without being accountable to anyone. Now we have guarantees of service—I know what the hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill) said, but I still see them that way—never before enjoyed by the people of Worcester.

When the PSRs were initially put out to consultation, scare stories were circulated by people who claimed to be friends of the railways but who only undermined them. They said that the service would be reduced from three to two InterCity trains per day. That is nonsense; for the first time, we will have a guaranteed InterCity service. Someone living in Worcester who wants to travel to London reasonably regularly will now know that a rush-hour train will travel in each direction. That is guaranteed under the PSR, and it is a huge step forward.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: I am fascinated by the hon. Gentleman's logic. Is he saying, as a Member of Parliament and a rail commuter, that he is happier knowing that there will definitely be one fewer train per day than having one more train per day? He seems to be applying some bizarre logic.

Mr. Luff: There they go again. Two trains are guaranteed, the existing trains will still run and the Great Western managing director has said that he plans to run more services, not fewer. I will quote from the press release. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman asked a question, so he should at least have the decency to listen to the answer. The Great Western Trains press release of 31 January this year states:

> "The timetable plan for May 1995 maintains the current level of services and consideration is being given to the introduction of additional ones".

It may come as a surprise to the hon. Gentleman, but these things must be planned. I know that Labour Members do not understand the private sector, but it is a little embarrassing when they reveal their ignorance so spectacularly.

Levels of service are important, but the small things matter as well—they show that the railways care about their passengers. The standard of service is improving locally as the rail network prepares for privatisation. The new Thames timetable for the service operating between Worcester and London is a radical improvement on everything that went before it. It lists the stations and states what facilities are available at each. It sets out the route very clearly and, most interestingly—Labour Members would do well to listen to this—it lists the times of buses connecting with the rail service. The so-called fragmented railway has produced an integrated timetable which bears testimony to the success of the Government's plans.

There have been other improvements, such as better on-board service on the 125s—all first-class passengers are treated as though they are actually wanted on the train, and receive newspapers and a free drinks trolley service. The new timetables that are on display at my local stations enable people who do not understand how the railways operate to learn what trains go where. Those improvements are a direct result of the Government's plans.

[Mr. Luff]

Things will only get better. Some problems need to be addressed, but the Government have fostered a creative tension in the railways, rather than a complacent, monolithic bureaucracy. It means that individual companies are fighting for market share and for customers—and hopefully they will fight Railtrack from time to time. Railtrack still has a lot to answer for locally. The weeds at Shrub Hill station are a disgrace.

Mr. Keith Hill: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Luff: No, I will not give way again. I am winding down my remarks and I wish to allow my hon. Friends time to speak in the debate.

Visitors to Worcester would not know that Shrub Hill is a railway station because there is no sign outside it. That will not be good enough for the new train-operating companies, and they will demand improvements to Worcester Shrub Hill station. That is one of the reasons why I welcome rail privatisation.

Investment and the alleged failure of investment has been discussed. I believe that the Labour and Liberal parties must bear a heavy share of the responsibility for that problem. Their attacks on the privatisation process are creating uncertainty and frightening passengers, and they should cease. We have the policies necessary to revive the railways, and those policies have my unqualified support.

6.18 pm

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): The debate is fascinating because the enthusiasm for the future of the railways among Conservative Members is conspicuously absent among the Opposition, even in getting Back-Bench Members to speak. The other fascinating aspect of the debate is the fact that the Liberal party has at last managed to crawl to the left of the Labour party. We heard a diatribe against privatisation from the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler), while the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish) sat on the fence, giving no commitment and no policy. There is not even a Labour amendment to the motion on the Order Paper. Almost all Labour Back Benchers appear to have fled the field of battle during the debate, and we have heard nothing from them.

We should put the privatisation of the railways into context and the best way to do that is to compare it with the last great transport privatisation—that of British Airways. I went to the Library and looked up the Second Reading debate on the Civil Aviation Bill on 19 November 1979. It was the first step towards privatising British Airways. On that occasion, the Labour spokesman had something positive to say. Mr. Stanley Clinton Davis wound up the debate and it is instructive to examine what he said on that occasion:

"The Bill is yet another example of the Government's doctrinal spasms. It is an ill-conceived scheme. It does nothing to engender confidence in the airline, it provokes great anxiety and puts a question mark over the future of British Airways. It does not ensure that the investment programme of British Airways can be satisfactorily completed, which should be a condition precedent to any sensible aviation policy."—[Official Report, 19 November 1979; Vol.974 , c. 153-54.]

What has happened to British Airways in the 16 years since then? It has expanded its network and its services, and it has gained the accolade of being the world's favourite airline. It has carried out a vast multi-billion-pound investment programme. One has only to look at the dozens of Boeing 747s and brand new airbuses that it has taken on to provide improved services to its customers. It is now the first European airline to have taken delivery of the new Boeing 777. So much for Labour's predictions. It is not surprising that the hon. Member for Fife, Central did not dare make any predictions today.

Mr. McLeish: Will the hon. Gentleman address the fundamental point about how British Rail is being privatised? Does he agree that, if an organisation is privatised as a single entity, it will differ in a number of ways from an organisation that is chopped into 95 pieces and then flogged off to the highest bidder? Let us have a specific answer on that point.

Mr. Arnold: I shall turn to precisely that point, having first commented on the great Liberal speeches in the debate in 1979. I searched through Hansard for that date, and what did I find from the Liberal party, as it then was? I found no speech, and no vote. Not one Liberal Member spoke or voted. The Liberal Democrats are absent from the Chamber this afternoon. Then, as now, they were part-time Members of Parliament, with not too much to say about privatisation.

Mr. Tyler: Even the hon. Gentleman should be able to calculate that a far larger proportion of the Liberal Democrat parliamentary party than of the Conservative party has been here throughout the debate.

Mr. Arnold: That does not say much for the number of Liberal Democrats who are elected—which is not surprising, in view of what we have just heard.

In 1979, the Labour party went flat out against privatisation and the Liberals sat on the fence. Today, the Liberals are flat out against privatisation and the Labour party has not much to say of any significance.

As for the point raised by the hon. Member for Fife, Central, British Rail is being carved up into more sensible chunks, so that it can be managed better and deliver a better service in the private sector. To draw the analogy with British Airways once again, more than 100 airlines come into Heathrow and Gatwick. Each one is a separate company. When the railways are privatised, a multiplicity of franchisees will provide a service, some of them on exactly the same lines and passing through exactly the same stations.

All the airlines land at airports which represent yet another successful privatisation. British airports are managed not only by the British Airports Authority, which also manages other airports, but by other private companies. Railtrack will operate the railway stations and the signalling and lease them to appropriate operators. The same has occurred in air transport, where air traffic control is another separate agency.

What about ticketing? Only a few months ago, the Labour party put out the most magnificent scare stories about ticketing. Almost immediately after privatisation, British Airways set up Galileo, the computerised ticketing service, so that outlets for information and the purchase of tickets on different airlines increased in multiples by hundreds and thousands. The idea that private railway operators would not make the greatest effort to increase the outlets for tickets shows how much a part-time lecturer understands about private enterprise.

Mr. McLeish: As the hon. Gentleman is developing that argument, he should address the fundamental flaw in its foundations. When he talked about British Airways, did he mean the British Airports Authority? The simple premise of the argument that must be addressed is that British Railways is being broken up into 95 parts, whereas British Airways was not.

Mr. Arnold: That is the whole point. I was comparing the rail industry in Britain, which is traditionally one vast monolith, with the civil aviation industry, part of which was nationalised in British Airways and BAA.

In civil aviation, equipment is owned or leased. Likewise, the franchise operations for rolling stock will either get rolling stock from the rolling stock leasing companies or they will buy it.

A singularly important aspect is the prospect for the transfer of traffic from road to rail. I have always thought it extremely odd that we have a wide and integrated network of railways managed by one entity, but it has been unable to provide an infrastructure of freight farms for moving freight around the country. Despite all the advantages of the wide scale of the network, the nationalised British Rail has completely failed to get its act together to move freight around the country, and it failed to do that during a period in which the Government have put £54 billion into the railways since nationalisation.

Why has that not been achieved? British Rail argues that it is impossible to achieve it in such a small country as Britain, because the distances are so short that there is no point in loading freight on and off the railways. However, the channel tunnel makes that excuse no longer valid. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, freight can be carried from Glasgow to Milan by rail through the channel tunnel within 36 hours whereas it would take 72 hours by road. I believe that there will be a massive switch from road to rail, particularly for international traffic, harnessing the channel tunnel. However, any suggestion that that could be achieved by the nationalised monolith that is so fondly considered by the heart of the Labour party is absolutely hopeless. We need the flexibility of the private sector.

Another aspect worthy of rapid consideration is the channel tunnel rail link. My constituency has suffered from this ghastly business for the past eight years, but recently the rail link has passed from being a figment of the imagination of rail enthusiasts to a viable proposition. At the moment, we have rail capacity across Kent, but early in the next century we shall not. It is therefore sensible to build a brand new railway line which can carry high-speed traffic. If that is done, it should remain a passenger-only service and not extend to freight, which should stick to the lines that travel through southern Kent, which the Government rightly invested more than £1 billion in upgrading in recent years.

One Opposition Member mentioned a rumour that he was glad to put about, that Ebbsfleet station and the channel tunnel rail link onwards into London St. Pancras is not to be built. I have quizzed my hon. Friend the Minister, and I shall be grateful if, when he winds up, he will confirm yet again that the Government view Ebbsfleet station and the line onwards into St. Pancras as absolutely vital and will not be cut. Ebbsfleet station would be most welcome. It would cut commuting time from 50 minutes to 19 minutes. It would mean new developments which will create thousands of jobs in the area and new roads—if only Kent county council will get on with them. Scaremongering by Labour about Ebbsfleet station is extremely unhelpful and damaging.

6.30 pm

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): The other day, a constituent of mine stopped me in the street and said, "I've got a bone to pick with you. I travelled on the railway to London recently. The train was slow, the carriages were dirty, the service arrived late and the staff were rude. You should never have privatised the railways." I had to remind him that the railway of which he was so critical was the good old nationalised railway that we all know and love. If it worked as well as it could and delivered the service that our constituents expect, there would be no need for the House to consider the matter—but clearly that is not the case.

I was not surprised to hear the usual negative speeches from Opposition Members, who have criticised every one of our privatisations—British Airways, the British Airports Authority, British Steel, British Telecom and British Gas. They were all wonderful industries, but they were costing the taxpayer £60 million a week before we started to privatise them. Today they deliver the same amount of money to the Exchequer every week.

The trouble with Labour is that it always sees things from the side of the producer, not the consumer—particularly if the producer happens to be a unionised worker. Labour Members criticise shareholders but do not seem to realise that most shareholders in today's privatised or nationalised industries are the pension funds of their own constituents. They complain about the family silver being sold off, but they were put up to that by a mischievous old gentleman from the Conservative side of the House: in fact, the family silver is still there and working for us better than ever before.

One is surprised to note that this is a Liberal Supply day, as two Liberal Members are all that can be mustered.

Mr. Tyler: Three.

Mr. Stephen: I apologise, but the Liberal leader has not been in the Chamber during the debate. No doubt he has been off studying the railways in Bosnia, and we shall have a full report from him when he returns. The Liberals have come out in their true colours as a first-class socialist party. It is they and not Labour who are threatening to renationalise the railway.

I had the privilege to spend a year as an Industry and Parliament Trust fellow with British Rail, so I can tell the House that we have a very good railway. I do not agree with the constituent who criticised that nationalised industry, but we can make it better. None of the managers I met is afraid of the private sector techniques and capital that will come to the industry—they want them. Managers told me that, in a nationalised industry, one can never manage or plan ahead, because one has to wait for the man from the Ministry to make up his mind: he does not often say no—the trouble is that he will not make up his mind at all. One cannot manage a business with such restraints. The managers said that, when they went to the Department for money to invest in new trains, track and stations, they were told to get in the queue behind the national health service, the schools and everyone else.

[Mr. Stephen]

Strikes are another reason that the railway has not delivered as a nationalised industry. The latest shenanigan by the rail unions that is about to disrupt the lives of the travelling public is a good example of the unrestrained and irresponsible use of national union power, which must be broken in the public interest. That is a good reason, if there were no other, for privatising the railway and breaking it up into the 92 parts of which the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish) constantly reminds the House.

As for subsidy, Opposition Members are trying to scare our constituents by suggesting that uneconomic lines will be closed. In fact, the opposite is true: the uneconomic lines are most likely to be attractive to private sector operators because they will be paid for operating them, whereas they will have to pay for the privilege of running economic lines. Opposition Members claim that we are pursuing privatisation out of pure political dogma, but it is they who are being dogmatic in refusing to put privatisation to the test. They refuse to give our constituents the opportunity to ascertain whether private sector capital and management techniques can improve Britain's railway.

The Opposition regale us with silly ideas of private sector operators cramming our constituents into cattle trucks and sending ticket prices through the roof. Do the Opposition not realise that private sector operators will want the public to ride the railway and pay for the privilege of using their trains? That is all I have to say.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): It has been an interesting debate. The hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen) said it all, in a prophetic statement. He was referring to this debate, but his remark could apply equally well to the Government. He said that we were running out of time.

That is very much the case, because the Government are running out of time in terms of both the parliamentary calendar as the next general election approaches, and their leadership options, which the Conservatives semi-resolved last week with the "least worst option"—as the Minister who will be winding up described the Prime Minister in ringing tones. The Government's privatisation policy, which a number of Conservative Back Benchers have endorsed to various extents, will prove an increasing nightmare for the Government as the next general election approaches.

I will begin with a friendly sideways comment on the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish). He and I have been happy to share a number of public platforms in Scotland on rail anti-privatisation issues. I have also shared platforms with the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), and we have had some political effect in the broad-based campaign that we have fought.

I was a little disappointed at the paucity of contributions from Labour's Back Benches. It is a sad reflection on the procedures and customs of the House that a Liberal debate on the important issue of rail privatisation is considered a lower-grade affair. If the issue is important, Labour Members should be campaigning on it, and not leave so much of the debate to Conservative Back Benchers.

It is also a shame that the problem for Labour is not north of the border, where our positions have been clear and robust. I suspect that the difficulties or constraints confronting the hon. Member for Fife, Central emphatically arise south of the border. I have no doubt that mainstream Labour opinion would endorse the Liberal Democrat motion. If there was an unambiguous political signal from the Opposition parties that a golden share or a controlling public interest would be secured if and when Railtrack disappears completely into the private sector, that would have an important business as well as political effect on Railtrack's saleability.

Although Labour was unable to be unequivocal in its support for us tonight, I hope that the fact that Labour was not wholly dismissive of our arguments is an encouraging sign for the future, and that we may yet see Labour's leader being rather more emphatic than he has felt able to be hitherto. I believe that that is one case that we could win.

It is not the fault of the hon. Member for Fife, Central, because it is not his remit, and I know that he will be relieved by that, but the one transport issue—that of London taxis—into which the Labour party has ventured and boldly gone, proved to be an unambiguous fiasco. The leader of the Labour party intervened, and the entire policy had to be turned upside down. I think that the Labour Front-Bench team are endorsing that view.

Mr. McLeish indicated assent.

Mr. Kennedy: I say in a friendly way to the Labour party that we live in hope. Clause IV still lives in the hearts of some people, and perhaps the Front-Bench members of the Labour party should remember that.

I comment on where, as usual, most of the entertainment came from this afternoon: the Conservative Back Benches. The most friendly thing that I can say to the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins) is that there seemed to be some philosophical confusion in his arguments about the merits of privatisation. He seemed to argue that, because direct services to his constituency had been withdrawn and there was no guarantee that they would be restored, the uncertainty that at least one day they could be restored was in itself an emphatic endorsement of rail privatisation.

Mr. Hawkins rose—

Mr. Kennedy: I shall give way, but I am terribly tight for time.

Mr. Hawkins: The matter that I raised was that—already—a private sector company plans to reintroduce direct through services from Scotland to my constituency and from London to my constituency as soon as it is able to do so. That would replace a withdrawal of service from the old nationalised British Rail.

Mr. Kennedy: We will watch that space with interest—as, I am sure, will the hon. Gentleman's constituents. They may be looking to fill a space with a different personage at the next general election. There might be a triumph of hope over experience.

The hon. Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) has accepted lock, stock and barrel all the assurances issued by the Regional Railways managers, but he does not seem to appreciate how the system works. The one prediction that I shall risk is this: as this Parliament goes on, we shall see at Prime Minister's Question Time, Transport questions and other occasions such as this debate, more and more Conservative Back Benchers getting to their feet to protest about the fact that effective local consultation has been short-circuited by the rail passenger franchising director, and that they, as local Members, do not have the opportunity to put the case vigorously and rigorously, as their constituents will want them to, for the retention of rail services. The penny is just beginning to drop with some Conservative Members, but clearly, judging from the speeches, not with as many as it will do in due course.

I commend the hon. Member the Worcester (Mr. Luff) for his practical support for the railways, both private and public. He speaks with great enthusiasm and passion. I agree with him about the need for better marketing and promotion. There is an attitude problem in this country towards our railways, and a debate such as this provides an important opportunity to underscore it.

The hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) spoke with great, burning support and enthusiasm for the Government. I can only assume that that is why he resigned as a member of it last week. So enthusiastic is he that he voted for the person who stood against the present leader of his party.

We now have a ray of hope, because the hard man who was in charge of the Department of Transport has been moved to the hard place of Conservative central office and been replaced by the bicycling baronet himself. I regret that we did not hear from the Secretary of State for Transport this evening, but he is present.

The right hon. Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) has commendable independent spirit, which is why he got himself sacked under his previous leader and then reappointed. All of us interested in the future of our railways hope that he will follow what appear to be the discussions that he was having with the Secretary of State for Scotland earlier this afternoon, not least because the consultation on the passenger service requirement for Scotland ends tomorrow.

The franchising director, Roger Salmon, and Ministers must be impressed by the quality and the quantity of the submissions—which include one from the likes of Highlands and Islands Enterprise, which is, after all, a Government agency—that the threatened services should be reprieved. It is healthier at the end of day for such strategic, political decisions to be taken by politicians and Ministers. They should not be farmed off and taken by bureaucrats.

Although we have had to resort to the Scottish courts, it is scarcely ideal either that such decisions are taken by judges on the bench. As somebody with a sense of the constitution, I think that the Secretary of State for Transport will share that view privately. I hope that he and his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland can therefore come to a sensible arrangement as a result of discussions which have already taken place.

At the centre is the question of responsibility. There is no doubt that the Government, as in some other areas—the health service being an obvious example—have sought to move the stigma of rail rundowns or closures away from Transport Ministers and, indeed, the Scottish Office or territorial Ministers generally.

It is now farcical when one wants to complain about a threatened reduction or withdrawal of service. One raises a question in the House and asks the Minister concerned, who says that it is an operational matter for British Rail or ScotRail management. When one talks to them, they say that it is a question of subsidy, which is decided by the franchising director. When one talks to Roger Salmon, he says that the budget is decided by the Ministry of Transport.

It is chaotic, circular nonsense, in place of what used to be something approximating coherent decision making and a sense of ministerial accountability, for what is, after all, something still emphatically in the public domain. That is the great contradiction and weakness at the centre of the entire privatisation process.

In the course of this short debate, we have not learnt a lot more about what the Labour party stands for, we have learnt a little more about the Liberal Democrats' view, and we know that there is a variety of opinion on the Conservative Back Benches. I shall end on an optimistic note, because inevitably in such a debate the focus is on the negative.

The channel link is a marvellous engineering achievement. Any hon. Member who has recently used either the Paris or the Brussels link for business or parliamentary activity could not have failed to be impressed by it. The days of being stacked above Charles de Gaulle airport or stuck on the M4 going out to Heathrow are behind us because of the convenience and the quality of travel that the rail link affords. It is therefore something to celebrate, and it is an important signal for the vibrant future of this country's railways, especially as we are plugged into the continent of Europe.

There is also an awful metaphor at the centre of that achievement, as any hon. Member who has travelled on the service will know. It is galling to trundle through the south of England's green and pleasant land at a certain rate, only to cross the channel and accelerate to a fantastically greater rate as one passes through France, Belgium or wherever.

In the words of our motion, that is surely the central point. On this side of the channel, under this Government's policy, there has been a fundamental lack of investment in a rail infrastructure. That will not be improved by privatisation, and I hope that wiser counsels may yet prevail, given the change in ministerial personnel.

The Minister for Transport in London (Mr. Steve Norris): I want to start where the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) has just left off. His last statement demonstrated the patent absurdity of the motion. He seems to have forgotten that the channel tunnel rail link is being constructed by private sector finance, and that a Labour Government cancelled a channel tunnel project which was to have been taken forward by the taxpayer. It is precisely the inadequacy of the state in such circumstances that leads Conservative Members to their fundamental belief in the advantages of privatisation.

I congratulate all my hon. Friends, who followed the excellent lead of my hon. Friend the Minister for Railways and Roads, on making this an interesting debate. My hon. Friends the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff), for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins), for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold), for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen) and for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) all made valuable contributions to the debate. I shall comment on them later, but first I want to deal with a few detailed points.

The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye referred to Anglo-Scottish sleeper services. As he knows, the consultation period ends tomorrow. All the representations which have been made will be carefully considered by the franchising director. I know that he is aware—I want to make it clear, as the House should also be aware—that, in the intervening period, those services will continue. I should also make it clear that—beyond sleeper services—the PSR for ScotRail as a whole essentially protects the entire May 1995 timetable. That is a new guarantee of services for the next seven years.

Mr. Tyler: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Norris: The hon. Gentleman is intruding on his own time—which may be why he wants to intervene.

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to the Minister. I think that this point is important.

The Minister just said that all sleeper services to Scotland would continue. Does he include the sleeper service from Plymouth, which has already been withdrawn?

Mr. Norris: I understand that services that are not in being will not continue. My statement was straightforward: I made it clear that, while the franchising director is considering the representations that he has received in relation to Anglo-Scottish sleeper services, existing services would continue.

The hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill) is a great transport buff, and always makes an interesting and, indeed, emotional speech; but he really must not let hyperbole run away with him in support of an already thin argument. He presented an extraordinary notion of fees and the cost of privatisation. That is one of the great fairy tales of British political life: the hon. Gentleman decides on a figure, and then doubles it.

Mr. Keith Hill: What figure?

Mr. Norris: I will tell the hon. Gentleman the exact figure: indeed, that was my purpose in referring to his remarks. The hon. Gentleman should not worry about doubling the figure, however; the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) multiplied it by four. Whatever the figure advanced as the cost of this extraordinarily complex exercise, the Opposition parties generally add a nought and know that they will be on the safe side.

In fact, the figure is neither £240 million nor £700 million. Between April 1991 and May 1995, Department of Transport consultancy fees amounted to £29.9 million, costs of the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising to £16.9 million and the rail regulator's costs to £4.4 million. That gives us a total of £51.2 million.

It is fair to include the costs borne by British Rail and Railtrack, which will probably account for some £72 million. My maths tells me that the figure is around £123.2 million, not the £240 million mentioned by the hon. Member for Streatham or the £700 million that the hon. Member for North Cornwall implied would be spent by the end of the year.

Opposition Members, however, roll into the extraordinary figures that they present every part of the restructuring of an industry that is desperately trying to drag itself from the nationalised mess of the last half century into the modern world. Conservative Members, who made that point themselves, were perfectly clear about the value of the exercise.

The hon. Member for Streatham mentioned the travelcard. He really should know better. He is aware of the value that Conservative Members have consistently placed on the card, but he has allowed me to say just one more time that we remain entirely committed to its value and to the millions who benefit from it in London. He knows that, during the time—more than three years—that I have been Minister for Transport in London, I have made it clear that that commitment will continue. We have no hidden designs on the travelcard.

The hon. Gentleman also knows perfectly well that there can be no change to the PSR without the franchising director's approval, and that any proposal for a significant alteration in the level of service would have to be subjected to consultation with the rail users consultative committee and local authorities.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham mentioned Ebbsfleet in connection with the channel tunnel rail link. I can confirm that the Government's position has not changed; they continue to regard Ebbsfleet as an important part of the rail link project. My hon. Friend also raised an important point, provoking the hon. Member for Fife, Central to his feet several times: he spoke of the great socialist belief in the monolith—the idea that, universally, bigger must somehow be better.

In some businesses—aviation is arguably one—size is indeed a virtue, but I believe that my hon. Friend was entirely right. In British Rail, the monolith has too often proved inflexible, unmanageable and unresponsive to customer demand. We must deliver the system into manageable units that offer a specific, focused, user-friendly service, maximising value for money and seeking out new markets and investment opportunities and more effective management.

Mr. McLeish: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Norris: No, I do not have time.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall presented an extraordinary sight. As several of my hon. Friends have pointed out, we are now faced with the remarkable prospect of the Liberal party rushing far to the left of new Labour—as I believe we are now entitled to call it. The Liberal party is now the only party that calls for renationalisation. I noted, as the House will have noted, that the hon. Member for Fife, Central squirmed to avoid the very commitment that Liberal Members invited him to make. What an extraordinary proposition.

Just when we thought that a Conservative might be speaking, however, the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) intervened in his own pithy way: "But you lot were in favour of it a few years ago, weren't yer?" I can assist the hon. Gentleman. Earlier today, I turned to a speech made in 1990 by the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), in the aptly named Empress ballroom in Blackpool. He was extolling the virtues not of nationalisation, but, on this occasion—for goodness knows which way the weathervane of Liberal opinion was swinging on the afternoon in question—of privatisation.

The right hon. Gentleman said:

"In some parts of the US, citizens who use, for instance, solar panels to generate electricity have the right to put any excess they generate back into the grid, reversing their meters"— and odd phrase, that, but we will not dwell on it—

"cutting their bills and providing power for industry.

So free competition there makes each citizen a power generator"— my, there is a Liberal phrase to conjure with—

"saving costs, capitalising on the potential of alternative energy and protecting the environment—all at the same time.

And if we bring competition to the utilities, why not to British Rail?"

I have the words before me. They are in a Liberal press release, so I suppose the party was proud of them at the time.

In the words of my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State, however, there is more. The right hon. Member for Yeovil went on to say:

"Nothing would increase the volume of rail freight more than allowing private industry to compete on the same basis as road freight."

Mr. Tyler: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Norris: No.

The right hon. Member for Yeovil went on:

"Competition . . . is not an ideological talisman, still less an economic gimmick. It is simply a way of ensuring that the customer—the citizen—comes first."

Amen to that, say Conservative Members.

As we all know, however—I suspect that Labour Members know it too—the Liberals will say whatever they consider appropriate and convenient at the time. We are now confronted by the extraordinary spectacle of a Liberal leader—a man who has, on occasion, suggested that he might actually take a rein or two of office—saying that Liberal Democrats will buy back 51 per cent. of shares in Railtrack at the issue price, or the market price. How much will it cost? Half the value of Railtrack: a little more than £1 billion, or probably a good deal less.

Given that the Government's total spending bill is £300,000 million a year £200 million is perfectly affordable, according to the right hon. Gentleman. It is cheap, he says. The right hon. Gentleman reminds me of the noble Lord Healey, who once said, "A billion here, a billion there, and soon you are talking about quite serious money."

The reality is that the leader of a party which seriously pretends to office is so cavalier with public funds as to produce such an extraordinary statement. That is the leader of the Liberal Democrats' commitment, which he believes to be is clear, costed and responsible. The right hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I quibble with that last description.

The Government support the privatisation of the railways because we know the benefits that privatisation has brought, particularly to transport. Several of my hon. Friends have referred to the historic change which has been brought about in the fortunes of British Airways, a company which was a basket case but which has been transformed into a world leader. What is more, BA is operating in the harshest environment of all—that of free international competition—and still manages to out-perform its rivals, who often receive literally billions of pounds of state handouts.

BA's performance owes considerably to its privatisation, as does the performance of the British Airports Authority. The BAA is wreaking a huge change in the environment of airports, and is now winning contracts in the United States.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: Mr. Deputy Speaker, I beg to move that the question be now put.

Mr. Norris: That was an interesting intervention from the hon. Gentleman, and seems to suggest that the Liberal Democrats have decided that perhaps this debate was not a good idea after all. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman hoped that we might glide smoothly into the area of health policy, so that the Liberal Democrats could then grab every shroud and follow every ambulance they can as they think up yet another farrago of nonsense which they can dress up as some commitment to policy.

The truth may hurt, but the reality is clear. Whether we are referring to BA, BAA, National Express, the privatisation of ports or—as my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale properly said—bus privatisation, the reality is that, in every case, privatisation and deregulation have brought substantial advantages.

It is extraordinary that we are debating this issue tonight. No serious economy anywhere in the world would move the kind of motion that we have seen from the Liberal Democrats tonight. The Russians are now perfectly clear that they believe in privatisation. In Nicaragua and El Salvador, one can hear the virtues of the free market expounded. But in Yeovil and in Ross, Cromarty and Skye, it is back to nationalisation and all its evils. One of my right hon and noble Friend Baroness Thatcher's greatest achievements was to set in motion a move towards the liberation of state industry which has been followed the world over, and with good reason.

We will go on to deliver the privatisation of rail services because that will liberate investment opportunities in a way unfettered by the public sector borrowing requirement. Privatisation will liberate management and will allow it, as my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South suggested, to offer rail services that have been removed by the nationalised railway. Private operators are keen—not just in Blackpool, but in many other areas of the country—to restore such services, and they know how to run them profitably.

A change is already happening in terms of the way in which the train operating companies are showing concern for customers—which is, of course, at the heart of the private sector. They are building a modern railway that is efficient and responds to customers' demands, and is not dominated, as the nationalised railway has been, by the producers rather than by the consumers. If hon. Members from both sides of this House want to see the development of a railway fit for the 21st century, they must reject the motion and support the Government amendment.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House believes that privatisation offers the best opportunity for reversing the historic decline suffered by the railway system under nationalisation; and further believes that the privatisation of Railtrack offers the best future for Railtrack, and for passengers and freight users, by making greater use of private sector skills in managing the network and in providing greater scope for private capital investment in the upgrading of the railway system.

General Practitioners (Night Service)

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): I beg to move,

That this House shares general practitioners' concerns as to the continuing provision of a high quality service by night as well as day, given increasing demands; seeks to facilitate improved methods of work so that general practitioners can provide a more flexible, clinically appropriate and more modern way of providing emergency care outside normal hours which is right for patients, fair on the taxpayer and manageable by family doctors; believes there should be a right for general practitioners to transfer responsibility for out of hours care to another general practitioner without unnecessary interference by the Family Health Service Authority; supports the need for substantial, ongoing patient education campaigns on the appropriate use of the out of hours emergency service; and calls on the Government to take all reasonable steps to avoid industrial action by general practitioners.

It is a matter for regret that I have neither the attention—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. Can we have some quiet on the Front Bench, please?

Mr. Carlile: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

It is a matter for regret that we do not have the benefit of the presence of the new Secretary of State for Health on the Government Front Bench. The right hon. Gentleman would not be coming fresh to the situation, because he was once a junior Minister in the Department of Health, and should have a ready understanding of the issues that we shall discuss.

If the Secretary of State had come here, we might have been reassured that he had reviewed the stubborn attitude of the Minister of State, who as usual is grinning from his position on the Front Bench. Had he been born in Cheshire, he would not have needed transmogrification. Of course, it is still open to the Secretary of State to wind up the debate, but I think that we shall find that he does not like working out of hours, and so has decided to send his junior partner out on this call.

It is worrying that we should have a dispute of the kind that now exists on out-of-hours provision between Ministers, representing the Government, and general practitioners. It is extraordinary how the Government have managed to make fervent opponents out of a traditionally moderate profession. It is perhaps a pity that the Minister of State, who is present tonight, did not follow the slogans of his own patient education campaign in relation to this issue. One of those slogans, which one sees on surgery walls, reads, pithily, "Be nice, think twice." I realise that, for this Minister, that would have presented a formidable triple challenge.

Perhaps the Minister might take advantage of another of the slogans of the Government's rather weak patient education campaign: "Help us to help you." That is a bit bland but, if he repeated it when he got up each morning, he might find it easier to review this desperate issue between general practitioners and the Government. The leaders of GP professional groups could not be considered, even in the wildest of imaginations, to be revolutionaries set in a political cause against a Conservative Government.

I doubt whether Dr. Sandy Macara has a poster of Che Guevara on his wall; or that Dr. Ian Bogle has a poster of Danny Cohn-Bendit—or that they did even in their student days. Knowing those two gentlemen, I suspect that they were more likely to have been inspired by the likes of Winston Churchill and R. A. Butler, yet we find them challenging the Government because of their attitude towards the most basic part of the national health service—primary medical care.

For more than two years, the Government, led by the right hon. Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley), the Minister of State and their colleagues in the Department of Health, have managed to reduce morale among GPs to a new low, to the very brink of industrial action. I and my Liberal Democrat colleagues want to avoid that, as do the majority of GPs, but there is a real danger that, unless the Government change their attitude now, the dispute will escalate. If it escalates, it will be to the disadvantage of patients. If it is to the disadvantage of patients, let it be known that, although the Government might try to blame the doctors, the Government will be to blame, not the medical profession; for it is plain that it is within the Government's capability to end this dispute successfully, if reluctantly.

If the Minister of State goes contrary to form and displays a change of mind tonight, we will hail that change. One always hails a good premiere. What one is rather bored by is a tedious repetition of past poor form.

Let us consider the problem, for there is a problem, that faces GPs. I have to confess—if it is a confession—to being a GP's son. I remember when we lived in Burnley in Lancashire, in the old house that contained the surgery, that, occasionally, the telephone used to ring at night and my father would go out to make a call. He had a big practice, but night calls were a rare occurrence in those days. Times have changed and demands have increased. By the time my father retired, the number of night calls had increased significantly, and the partners who succeeded him in his practice have been subjected to a burgeoning demand for night services.

By 1989-90, some 936,148 night visits were made by GPs. By 1993-94—albeit the statistics cover a two-hour longer period than in the year I have just mentioned—some 1.832 million night visits were made by GPs. The latest estimate that we have been able to obtain from the British Medical Association is that, in the past year, 2.3 million night visits were made. These are visits demanded of doctors by patients. A doctor turns down a night visit at his peril—if he does not attend and something goes wrong, he is in trouble. Doctors—or at least the health service—have to be able to meet that demand. The number of night visits has increased more than six times in 25 years, and it has doubled since the introduction of the new GP contract.

I should say that I am delighted to see that the new Secretary of State has joined the debate for a short time. I congratulate him on his appointment. As I said earlier, he comes to the Department of Health for a second time, I believe, and therefore with some experience. I shall repeat the hope that he might decide to wind up the debate himself rather than leave the out-of-hours provision to his junior partner, the Minister of State. It would certainly be helpful—I repeat this in his presence—to hear that the Secretary of State has immediately reviewed this very worrying dispute, which must have been taking up significant space on his desk when he arrived in his new office.

I shall now return to the problems faced by doctors. An average of six night visits a month are made by doctors, and an average of 36 patient consultations per month are made out of hours. Many of those consultations, of course, are not night visits. There is much anecdotal evidence of greater weekend demand than many people think exists. It is clear that weekend demand has risen as quickly as night visits. Patient expectation, but not always patient responsibility, has risen. It is right in a debate such as this—I hope that hon. Members on both Front Benches share this view—to be quite robust about the attitude of patients and to ask them to be far more considerate than they sometimes are towards their GPs and out-of-hours provision.

In our consumerist society, legitimised by the patients charter, patients are expecting more at all hours from their doctors. For what should be an emergency service, the anecdotal evidence of misuse is striking. One doctor tells of a call for a home visit only to find when he got there that the family he was called to had gone out for a walk. Another tells of a man who complained that his hands had gone blue and that he feared a serious circulatory problem, only to be told, when the doctor arrived on the emergency call, that he had received some blue dye from the overalls that he had washed earlier that evening. One woman even woke a doctor in the middle of the night to ask him to deliver sleeping tablets because she could not sleep.

Doctors are at times victims of the inconsiderateness of their patients, but they also find themselves picking up the pieces of a society broken by Government policy. They constantly have to deal with misplaced, often seriously psychiatrically ill, community care patients. They are often the only people to whom chronic schizophrenic patients, who have been dumped in loneliness in society, can go. They often have to deal with the drug and violence problems of inner cities and are at physical risk when they go out on night calls. In rural areas, doctors have to provide almost all the emergency medical cover. Indeed, they are often called out to do what turns out to be emergency dentistry, which they are not able to complete.

The situation is fraught with problems for GPs. In May of last year, after many months of negotiation, the BMA and the Government agreed on changes to GPs' terms of service. It had taken months to clarify whether GPs could use their own judgment to decide whether a patient required a home visit, which seems an extraordinary issue for the Government to argue about for so long, and it took many more months to decide how to implement a very small amount of flexibility in how out-of-hours care was provided.

Now, negotiations on the payment scheme have run into the sand, but it is not principally an issue about money. Doctors are not simply holding out for more money. The real issue that concerns the BMA is the form of the out-of-hours system. Doctors want to move away from a scheme that positively encouraged—perversely encouraged—GPs to undertake out-of-hours provision themselves, whatever the effect on their work, rather than use other people to do it for them, because they were paid more for doing it themselves, which seems irrational.

An offer of £2,000, plus £9 for each visit, was rejected as, for many doctors, it would be a direct pay cut. It is extraordinary how the Government believed that they could offer doctors a pay cut as an incentive to accept a new contract. The offer was increased to a lump sum of £2,000 and a £20 fee for each night visit. That offer was also rejected, not on money grounds, but as a crude approach to the far more complex problems of the structure of and demand for out-of-hours care.

The Minister groans audibly when I say that the dispute is not mainly about money, which shows that he has not begun to understand the issues that the British Medical Association is trying to put to him. I suggest that he or, preferably, the Secretary of State, should meet Dr. Bogle and Dr. Macara shortly—I believe that the Secretary of State might well be intending to do so—so that a new view can be taken of what the dispute is really about.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Gerald Malone): It is not the British Medical Association that I have some difficulty understanding, but the hon. and learned Gentleman. In one voice he says that he is against what he says are the perverse incentives in the scheme. If I paraphrase him correctly, they are perverse incentives that mean that doctors are encouraged to do their own visits. What has happened is that, in the new fee structure, a different incentive reduces the perverse incentive that he criticised, yet he is criticising what we have proposed as well. Which does he prefer?

Mr. Carlile: I am afraid that I find that intervention totally incomprehensible. I suggest that the Secretary of State reads the submissions—if he will listen for a moment—presented to him by the BMA, start with a clean sheet and ignore the prejudices of his Minister of State, which have become the major obstruction to resolving the dispute. Sometimes it helps to take a new look. Perhaps the Secretary of State will do that.

Of course, money is part of the question. Indeed, Dr. Brian Hope of Salford suggested that not many Conservative Members would leave their lovers' beds for that sort of money unless it was to ask a parliamentary question. That was a rather unfair gloss on the real issue. It is not simply a pay dispute between a profession and its paymasters, but a dispute about realistic provision of high-quality patient care. The Minister can put his finger in the dyke, but the hole will grow unless the Government are prepared to study the structure of out-of-hours provision and produce a resolution for the future.

There is a way forward on six issues. The Government are right to support the development of GP co-operatives. They offer a good solution to out-of-hours care. Such co-operatives, however, cover only 17 per cent. of patients, and the National Association of GP Co-operatives would, I think, recognise that it will take a considerable time for them to be suitable for all types of area, particularly some inner-city practices and rural areas.

The whole profession, including the co-operatives, is united in the belief that the Government's £45 million offer has been made in a way that provides no equity between practices and areas of different types. My first suggestion to Ministers, therefore, is that they consider the way in which the £45 million has been offered and find out whether they can re-tailor it into a more equitable offer for general practices throughout the country.

In due course, I should like to hear from the Minister that the Government's door is open on the issue of distribution at least. It would be interesting to hear from him where that £45 million is to come from, however. Is it new money? That is a simple question and the Minister can answer yes or no. Is it new money? Perhaps the Minister would like a couple of hours to think about that question before winding up—so that he can give the sort of obfuscatory answer to which we are accustomed to hearing from him.

It is my suspicion, and that of many connected with the medical profession, that the £45 million is about to be lopped off other health service budgets, which will suffer as a consequence. That cannot be tolerated. If it is to be lopped off other budgets, the Minister should tell us where it is being taken from. We look forward to hearing an answer to those questions at the end of the debate.

My second suggestion for Ministers is that payment for out-of-hours calls should be available to all doctors who are qualified to practise as general practitioners. The present system is ludicrous. Only general practice principals can receive the £20 fee for a consultation, which means that, if a principal arranges for an on-call service to do his out-of-hours calls, the £20 fee is not payable. That seems manifestly unjust and militates against the provision of efficient out-of-hours care that does not put too much pressure on doctors.

Despite the amusement with which the Minister evidently regards this debate, my third suggestion is that the Government should set about redefining the contract. It is unclear to GPs how much of their contract covers in-hours work and how much covers out-of-hours work other than night calls. There is separate provision for night calls, but doctors deserve, and are entitled, to be told what proportion of the payment that they receive is intended to cover working during the evening, on Saturdays after lunchtime and on Sundays, all of which are out of hours.

How much of the capitation fee and the other allowances notionally covers evenings, Saturday afternoons and Sundays? The importance of having that information separately is that there is absolutely no reason why doctors should not be given the flexibility to arrange their practices and their activities by taking into account the answer to that question. It would enable some of them to manage their practices differently. It would enable some to hive off all their out-of-hours work and it might lead to the burgeoning development and rapid acceleration of GP co-operatives to cover more than merely the night calls that they cover at the moment.

Just as doctors are told what part of their earnings comes from night calls, so they should be able to negotiate their working arrangements to take into account other out-of-hours provision. That would also enable doctors who are inclined and able to do sessions in hospital to broaden their experience and provide more specialist services, to do so in a more manageable way.

My fourth suggestion for the Minister is that technology could be improved. Obviously one cannot use distance technology to deal with night calls. Computer facilities are not yet in every home. Technology can help the management of practices, however, and many general practitioners' practices now have significantly improved computer systems. The use of telecommunications technology, and its being made available to doctors in a cost-effective way through the national health service and the family health services authorities and their successors, would mean that they could work more efficiently, especially in rural areas and heavily populated inner cities.

My fifth suggestion relates to rural areas. I represent a rural area in which the population is widely spread, the largest town has about 11,000 inhabitants and there are many small settlements. In such areas, the provision of out-of-hours services is very different from that in a suburban environment. I invite Ministers to take the view that a special settlement is needed to ensure that facilities can be provided properly in rural areas.

My sixth suggestion concerns the efforts that have been made in patient education. They are commendable so far as they have gone, but they have footled around the edges of the matter. There is prime time advertising for all sorts of Government-sponsored campaigns. In my view, patient education should be such a campaign. The message is a simple one: caring doctors need caring patients. Getting that message across requires a fairly hard sell. We have yet to see that hard sell from the Government.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): The hon. Gentleman suggests that there should be television advertising and a big campaign to support the Government's plans for GPs. He may or may not be right, but is not that rather at odds with what has been said by his colleagues in the Liberal party who have criticised every advertising campaign the Government have carried out, whether successful or not, and used bogus figures to say that money is being wasted? He cannot have it both ways. Perhaps he can; he is a Liberal.

Mr. Carlile: The hon. Gentleman is factually wrong. The Liberal Democrats have always been happy to support campaigns that have not trailed the Government's party politics. Of course, we now know how the Government behave. We have a Cabinet of 24 in which two Ministers are there to serve not the country but the Conservative party. That is the political world in which we live.

We are prepared to give the Government the credit of our support if they are prepared to go in for non-partisan campaigns of patient education. The sort of campaign that has been run on drink-driving might well be effective in educating patients to be considerate towards their doctors.

I make a further suggestion to the Government. It would be worth looking, on a pilot project basis, at some different models for certain aspects of primary care provision. For example, provision of health care for the elderly chronically sick can make great demands both on GPs and on hospitals. Many hospitals have experience of, and excellent departments that specialise in, care for and diseases of the elderly. In some of the more populous areas, it might be worth considering modelling primary care so that it is provided using the hospital as a base rather than via GPs or in the hospital. I have received representations, not from the BMA but from individual doctors, suggesting that such an approach might help to take some of the strain from them.

The danger is that doctors will take the view that there is no point in co-operating with the Government and that the Government will have to solve the problem themselves. We could get a system in which some doctors just shut up shop at 5 pm and do not want the payment because it is not worth the effort. As a result, as in some continental countries, we might make patients reluctant to approach their doctors even when they need them. We have to try to find a balance. I believe that what the Government have offered falls far short of a balanced system. Indeed, the demoralisation of the medical profession is surely evidence enough that the Government have failed to find that balance.

There is a shortage of new doctors. One in eight places on general practice training courses is vacant. The shortage of new doctors is especially evident in practices that do their own out-of-hours cover. The recent vote by the BMA surely demonstrated the extent of demoralisation. There was a turnout of 77 per cent. of doctors—which would do many constituencies credit in a general election—and 82.6 per cent. of those who voted said no to the Government's offer; only 17.4 per cent. said yes.

The Government's response has been extremely poor. Thus far, they seem to have chosen to challenge the GPs. It might have been better for the profession and for the public if the Minister of State, who seems to have made the running on this issue, had joined the right hon. Member for Surrey, South-West, now the Secretary of State for National Heritage, in that attack of fugue, in the psychiatric sense, that sent her off deluded to another job which has put her in charge of fugue in the musical sense. I am not sure how the Minister of State would have done as a Minister of Music, but at least we might have had other new Ministers at the Department of Health singing in harmony rather than in the discord with which the Government are approaching doctors.

If we are to avoid a disaster for out-of-hours provision, the Minister must become a fugitive from his usual intransigence. It is perhaps a vain hope, but nevertheless it is a hope, that we might at last, at the end of tonight's debate, hear something positive from the Government.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Gerald Malone): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"notes that the Government has continued to meet the recommendations of the independent pay review body for general practitioners' pay, which is for a 24 hour commitment to their patients; welcomes the Government's constructive approach to addressing the profession's concerns, which includes an extra £45 million to support general practitioners' out of hours services, makes it possible for general practitioners to transfer responsibility for providing out of hours cover to another doctor and restructures payments so that the average general practitioner will receive an extra £800 per year for night visits; supports the approach of the Patient's Charter, which stresses to patients that with rights come responsibilities; and believes there is absolutely no case for general practitioners to take industrial action which would inevitably harm patient care."

If that is the sort of the stuff that the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) comes out with on behalf of his clients in court, I hope that he does not have the nerve to charge them anything for it. It was a mixture of relatively pompous and personal points, which I did not mind.

I think it is good that a Minister should sit on the Front Bench happy with his lot and that he should grin occasionally—with his supporters firmly behind him, backing the Government's cause—moving onwards to destroy the hon. and learned Gentleman's arguments. Of course I am happy with my lot; the hon. and learned Gentleman will have to put up with that. He will see that I smile from time to time as he makes the odd bon mot, with which I intend to deal in my remarks.

The hon. and learned Gentleman offered a poor agenda for change and failed to acknowledge the substantial way in which the Government have moved on the issue and have listened to GPs and to the arguments advanced by the British Medical Association over a considerable period, not least since I joined the Department last July. In my own defence, I must say that it is entirely wrong to say that we have not listened; we have. We have responded a great deal and in detail to the concerns, many of which were set out by the hon. and learned Gentleman and some of which I will be able to respond to fairly positively this evening.

Perhaps it would be helpful to the House if I put firmly on record the Government's current offer. Our offer is designed to meet the concerns about work load and about pay for out-of-hours work. The two go together. I notice that the hon. and learned Gentleman fell into the trap of saying that, of course, it was not about money and then in the next breath that it was something to do with money. The truth of the matter is that it has to do with both. That is why the Government's offer has been constructed carefully to meet both the work load argument and the out-of-hours pay argument.

Let me go through the essentials of the offer currently on the table. An extra £45 million has been provided for GPs within the overall health budget. Its purpose is to support alternative out-of-hours arrangements and to give GPs more flexibility and choice in managing their work load. As I said, that money comes from the total national health service budget, which in England is more than £30 billion per annum. It is not from—and this must be the concern of GPs—funds that would otherwise have been devoted to general practice. As far as GPs are concerned, it is new money that was intended to be brought to bear on a specific problem. The hon. and learned Gentleman is quite wrong to suggest that the Government have not been specific about that. We have been specific from the outset and I endorse what we have said on that point before.

The hon. and learned Gentleman asked how the arrangements will work. The offer was put on the table not in a prescriptive sense but in the hope that we could reach an agreement in principle with GPs and talk through the detail.

The hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned a number of schemes, including 24-hour primary care centres. Such schemes will be in our mind when spending the £45 million on the arrangements that we want to put in place to guarantee and underpin quality out-of-hours cover.

Since I was appointed, I have made a point of spending a great deal of time in general practices to see what the problems are and how out-of-hours care is provided. In particular, I have made a point of talking to GP co-operatives and to those who represent them in their national association. Anyone who takes an interest in such matters will understand that a number of basic arrangements are in place, such as GP co-ops. Some have been established in Kent, and I visited one in Reading. Interestingly, the one that I visited in Reading also dealt with rural areas.

It is important to dispel the myth that co-operative arrangements cannot by their very nature deal with the problems of rural areas; in certain circumstances, they can. The hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned rural areas specifically. I recognise that they can have special difficulties, which is why we said that we would consider special arrangements whereby some of the £45 million can be devoted to locum arrangements for GPs in rural areas if it is not possible to form a co-operative. The Government's mind is open on that point, and the Secretary of State's door is open not only on that point but on others too.

I take this opportunity to make it clear to the House and to the hon. and learned Gentleman that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be meeting GP representatives about that very issue: the date is set for Thursday this week. Of course, he will be extremely keen to listen to all that they have to say, and it is right that he should do. As I have said before, I hope that the meeting will provide an opportunity to take matters further.

The hon. and learned Gentleman referred to a fundamental issue but did not examine it in detail. Where the Government part company from those who are arguing about this issue is the separation of the 24-hour contract. It is vital for the quality of primary patient care that someone must have custody of that care. The way in which the system developed in the health service—before the 1990 contract and after the 1990 contract, which reinforced it—is that the GP principal closest to the patient must have custody of that patient's care. Of course, that GP cannot be expected to provide care 24 hours a day, seven days a week and 365 days a year. That is why there are other arrangements for cover, such as sharing within a practice, joining a GP co-operative, using deputising services or making more permanent arrangements to transfer the responsibility from one GP to another.

I reiterate the Government's determination not to undermine that element of patient care but to examine reasonable mechanisms under which doctors' work loads can be shared as long as there are permanent quality arrangements in place. We have made it clear in the negotiations that we are happy to examine the regulations, and have offered to do so, so that doctors who want to move more permanently out of out-of-hours work will be able to do so.

The original offer for night visit payments was a flat rate of £2,000, which would enable a number of doctors to employ deputising services up to that amount. In addition, there was a £9 fee if the visit was to be undertaken by a GP principal. We have moved a long way on that issue, and the fee now being offered is £20—more than double the original offer. The average general practitioner will receive an extra £800 a year for night visits compared with the arrangements currently in place. It is therefore entirely wrong for the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that, even with that specific mechanism delivering a part of the payment due to them, doctors will be worse off under the Government's proposals.

I must set out the Government's record on pay in general. The hon. and learned Gentleman told the House that morale was at an all-time low. The implication of his remarks was that the Government have behaved badly towards the profession for a long time. Since 1979-80, pay for general practitioners has increased in real terms by 40 per cent. That is a record of which the Government can be proud. It underpins the importance that we attach to general practice, and I hope that it is a record that the medical profession recognises.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Will the Minister say why increasing numbers of GPs are now retiring in their early fifties to avoid the burden that they believe is involved in working in the national health service?

Mr. Malone: If the hon. and learned Gentleman scratches the surface, he may discover that quite a few retirals are followed by a return to a temporary practice or a move to another sector of health care. It is ludicrous for the hon. and learned Gentleman to suggest that, by paying doctors an average of 40 per cent. more, we are encouraging them to leave the profession. In overall terms, doctors have been extremely well treated by the Government and well served by the independent review body system. The implication of the hon. and learned Gentleman's comments is that the work load is too great. The work load has changed, and the very structure of the way in which GPs provide services is very different from what it was even a few years ago.

One hears the stories that go around, but I must set them in their proper context. I wish to put the facts firmly on the record. There is an average of 70 night visits a year per general practitioner. That means six a month. The work load survey is the best available overall evidence about work loads and it is far more reliable than the odd individual and sometimes unsupported anecdote that we sometimes hear. The British Medical Association participated in the survey that was submitted to the independent review body.

The 1992-93 survey revealed that doctors work an average of 31.9 normal hours a week, 6.9 out of hours—including two hours on night visits—and 19.2 hours on call. The problem is that the anecdotes on which much of the general debate on out-of-hours care is based are not supported by the work load study. The study also revealed that, between 1989-90 and 1992-93, working hours increased by 2 per cent. but remuneration increased by 8 per cent. in real terms. By any national indicator and across the system as a whole, which is what the independent national review body must consider, doctors have been well supported in cash terms. They have also been well supported in terms of their work load.

Listening to the hon. and learned Gentleman and other Opposition Members, one would think that the changes in the role of the general practitioner had occurred unsupported. Let us run through the figures relating to GP support. The number of all-staff support in general practice is up from 37,000 in 1989 to 51,000—a 38 per cent. increase. The number of nursing staff has risen from 4,600 to 9,099, a virtual doubling of their number. The number of non-nursing staff is up from 32,000 to 42,000, a 30 per cent. increase, and the direct cost of providing those increases in staff has risen from £242 million to £510 million. That is not an unsupported system, which is how the hon. and learned Gentleman chose to portray it.

It is clear that there have been changes and developments in what GPs do. More care is rightly provided in the primary sector. Indeed, it is the purpose of a primary care-led national health service, but the hon. and learned Gentleman's suggestion that all this has happened with GPs picking up the burden unsupported, either in terms of those who work within practices or in terms of the Government's cash commitment to ensure that they are properly paid, is quite wrong. It is an argument that I refute absolutely.

The Government have responded to the concerns that have been expressed over some time in a variety of meetings between the British Medical Association and me and between it and my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State. Part of the difficulty has been that, as we have made progress in a number of areas, the goalposts have occasionally been shifted and new arguments put. That is what has happened now, and the hon. and learned Gentleman will be well aware of a call, on the record, to look at the total separation of the 24-hour contract into two parts.

Before that proposal is considered, we must consider its implications. It would mean, for example, that a patient would have to look to two GPs for their services through a 24-hour period. What would out of hours mean? Would it still be an option for a GP to do some out-of-hours service and merely to relinquish the responsibility for night calls? Would the split operate from 6 o'clock in the evening, or at 10 o'clock? To whom would the patient look?

That separation is a dangerous road to travel and would be against the history of the way in which primary care has developed since the NHS came into being. It would be bad for the quality of patient care and it would be a retrograde step. When the hon. and learned Gentleman starts to embark on that path, I wonder whether he has really considered all the implications.

I understand what GPs' leaders are telling us: family doctors are finding it increasingly difficult to balance the demands of their out-of-hours work and their home life. We do not underestimate that strength of feeling. We recognise that GPs work extremely hard, and we are determined to address those concerns not just for the benefit of GPs but to safeguard the quality of patient care.

The importance of underpinning that quality of care was brought home to me recently in an Adjournment debate. A difficulty had arisen in a case of out-of-hours cover. The important thing was that at least the patient knew to whom she could turn. It is important to continue to encourage the high patient satisfaction that is delivered through primary health care, which is one of its greatest assets. We must be extremely careful not to build into that system the potential for demarcation disputes and uncertainty about to whom the burden should be passed. They would cause great difficulties and would not do the profession any good in the long term.

I reiterate that, within the context of the present system, we wish to make progress and explore what has been said recently by the profession to see whether we can build further on our initiatives. The hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned one extremely important initiative: how patients address and use their GP service. I must say to him that it was slightly fanciful—I do not know whether he thought it through—to suggest that we should launch a multi-million campaign, with me, as the Minister, on television instructing patients on how they should behave. It appears that that would be compelling and would result in patients changing their practice. My hon. Friends might be rather interested to see such a demonstration, but I am not sure that it is one that I would support.

If patient practice needs to be changed, the people to lead that must be medical practitioners, because it is important for them and their professional futures that they do nothing to undermine their relationship with their patients. In many cases that lead has already been taken. I recently visited a practice in Essex where a patient education campaign was vigorously under way. Details of how it operated were contained in the patient practice brochure, which had been issued to all patients. Out-of-hours calls had reduced significantly as a result.

The Government are prepared to help and build upon that sort of initiative, and I hope that we can move forward on the issue.

Mr. Alex Carlile: I am glad that a practice has been able to achieve something with a patient education campaign. Does not the Minister agree, however, that there is a serious problem with the view that some patients have of the NHS, exemplified by the 11 million-plus hospital appointments which were not kept in the last year for which statistics were available? Does he also agree that many GPs are not as skilful in managing their practices or patient relations as the example that he gave, particularly those hard-pressed, single-handed GPs who are attempting to function in some inner-city practices? Does not he think that the Government should bear the responsibility for patient education for the great mass of patients?

Mr. Malone: I have already said that we are prepared to help and support schemes, but I would wish to talk through with the profession how one could do that in detail. We are engaged in that process. The hon. and learned Gentleman should know that evidence exists of best practice and good practice around the country. I have told the medical profession that, if we can reach common ground on the out-of-hours issue, we can then proceed with patient education. The thought that such a programme could proceed against the background of the proposed industrial action of the medical profession is somewhat fanciful. That would undermine the process from the start. To embark on such a programme now would not represent a sensible use of public funds, nor would it achieve the result that everyone is seeking.

We have heard from the hon. and learned Gentleman many of the arguments that have surrounded the issue over time, but not much that illuminates the initiatives that he and his party would take and that would go much beyond what the Government are doing.

Mr. Alex Carlile: I offered six new ideas.

Mr. Malone: I listened to those six ideas, and quite a few of them happen to be precisely what the Government are already doing. The hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned rural areas, and I have set out precisely what we are doing in that respect. He mentioned patient education, and I said that the Government are prepared to respond to that proposal. He mentioned a range of novel ideas about providing out-of-hours care. I have explained that we prepared to look at such care and innovate and have set aside £45 million for that purpose. Much to my regret, as long as the problem with out-of-hours work continues, that £45 million lies unused either for the benefit of GPs or their patients. It could be used to improve the services from which patients would benefit.

The hon. and learned Gentleman spoke about increased use of technology. I do not know what he meant by remote technology in the home. I suppose that even the Liberal party has caught up with the introduction of the telephone around the country. In extremely good practices, especially in 24-hour primary care centres, a lot of consultation can be carried out by telephone to reduce the burden on GPs. I am on all fours with the hon. and learned Gentleman on that practice.

The only point on which I disagreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman related to the separation of the contract. Were he to follow a route towards a double structure of primary care, he would be wrong.

We have moved some distance in the past few months in response to what doctors have said to us about two key areas. First, we must not compromise the quality of patient care in reaching a new arrangement for out-of-hours work and, secondly, we must strive to reduce the worst of the work load burden, and I am happy to consider whatever arrangements could be introduced by GPs to assist.

Substantial progress on the new arrangements has been made, which must be recognised by the House, not just on its own merits but especially in the context of the way in which the Government have underpinned their commitment to general practice in words of encouragement and in deeds, cash and commitment over a lengthy period.

I hope that we can put the current problems behind us soon. I hope that, when my right hon. Friend meets the profession later this week he will be able to make further progress, because it is in the interests of patients that we resolve that matter quickly.

8.9 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): This is the first parliamentary occasion that I have had to congratulate the right hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Dorrell) on his appointment as Secretary of State for Health, and I congratulate him on my own behalf and on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), unreservedly. I welcome him to his appointment and congratulate him on his merited promotion.

I also take careful note of the fact that the Minister of State is still with us. He said that he was happy with his lot, and if he is happy with his lot we are all happy for him.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile)—rather churlishly, I thought—regretted the absence of the Secretary of State for the opening minute and a half of the debate. That was rather to overlook the much more welcome, and I hope permanent, absence of the previous Secretary of State.

The Liberal Democrats in their motion tell us, among other things, that we should aspire to a pattern of out of hours services and appropriate for 21st century health care. Opposition Members would certainly aspire to that, and I congratulate the Liberal Democrats on phrasing their motion in that way.

"which is right for patients, fair on the taxpayer and manageable by family doctors"

The words were not original; I guess that that will not come as a surprise to the House. They were lifted from something that the right hon. Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney) said in 1993 when he was Minister for Health. So that is a part of the Liberal motion that can unite both sides of the House.

The case for debating the increased demand for out-of-hours service is well made. Demands have increased by five times in the past 25 years and doubled in the past three years. The hours worked by general practitioners during the out-of-hours period—as was at least implicitly conceded by the Minister of State—have increased. They have increased by 49 per cent. since 1985-86, the middle of the last decade.

[Mr. Nicholas Brown]

GPs undertake twice as many night visits now as they did before the new contract was introduced. The number now is 2.3 million visits per year, and that compares with 1.1 million in 1989-90. Twenty-three per cent. of doctors spend 80 hours or more a week providing services to patients and being on call, and the cost of out-of-hours service to the national health service has quadrupled in recent years to £82 million a year. That follows the renegotiation of the general practitioner's contract in 1990.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer can hardly fairly complain about that quadrupling of the cost, because the present Chancellor of the Exchequer was the Secretary of State for Health who renegotiated the contract.

It is right for the House to pause and ask itself why demand for out-of-hours services from general practitioners is growing, and appears to be growing disproportionately. There are several possible reasons.

The research on that subject is quite thin, so, although the Minister of State rightly deplored relying on anecdotes, to some extent we have to, because his Department either has not done the research or is not sharing the research with the rest of the House. I suspect that the latter, rather than the former, is more likely.

There is a growing consumer culture—a culture that is encouraged by the patients charter, which has brought the language of consumerism into the health service. People are told of their entitlement or right to be seen by a GP at any hour of the day or night, and I notice that, in the Government's amendment to the Liberal Democrat motion, they refer to supporting "the approach of the Patient's Charter, which stresses to patients that with rights come responsibilities".

You would expect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that the rights and responsibilities would be expressed even-handedly in the patients charter, so I thought I should check that that was so, because that was not the impression that I received on first reading the document. I decided to thumb through my copy, looking, not for the rights—the document is full of what it describes as "rights" and "expectations"—but for the word "responsibilities", to note where responsibilities were mentioned.

A paragraph on page 10, right at the bottom, says:

"You can help the NHS by only calling out your GP at night if it cannot wait until the next day", which is a perfectly fair thing to say. Later in the document, at page 24, there is another duty as opposed to entitlement, where the document says:

"Warning—don't keep old medicines around the house. Please return them to your pharmacist for safe disposal."

The rest of the document is full of, "you can expect this, you can expect that; you are entitled to this, you are entitled to that". I read on, in search of the section that mentioned responsibilities, which the amendment to the motion suggests that I might find. It is not until one reaches page 28 that the word "responsibility" appears at all. It does say that if you must use the services,

"you can help the NHS by using its services responsibly" and it suggests that patients

"return equipment such as wheelchairs"

and

"crutches . . . when you no longer need them" and become a blood donor and always carry an organ donor card and so on.

Right at the bottom of page 28, the last page of the document, it says:

"remember that you benefit if your GP has a good night's sleep, so please only call your doctor out at night if it cannot wait until the next day."

I believe that the Government are pushing it somewhat to describe the construction of the document as stressing "that with rights come responsibilities".

The patients charter does no such thing.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): I too have a copy of "The Patient's Charter and You", and I have been looking through it. In fact, the mentions of out-of-hours treatment are all on page 10, and there are two statements. One is:

"when it is and is not appropriate to call on your GP for out-of-hours treatment" and the other is the line that the hon. Gentleman read:

"You can help the NHS by only calling out your GP at night if it cannot wait until the next day."

That seems to me to be an especially balanced approach to out-of-hours visiting. It is all very well for the hon. Gentleman to play games with his computer or count through manually when responsibility is and is not mentioned, but it is not fair to say that that is a reflection of what the charter is all about.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman suggests that I exercised enormous skill and spent an enormous amount of time checking how many times the word "responsibility" is used in the patients charter. As the word occurs only once, it did not take me long.

Mr. Fabricant: You had to read it.

Mr. Brown: As the hon. Gentleman fairly says from a sedentary position, it put me to the obligation of reading the patients charter, but, as I am the shadow Minister of State and therefore required to take an interest in such things, that is perhaps no bad thing.

As I have diligently done my bit to prove my point, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will do me the courtesy of now going through the document and telling me how many times the word "expect" occurs. He will no doubt have completed his research before 10 o'clock, and can perhaps intervene on another speaker to tell me what he has discovered.

Mr. Matthew Banks (Southport): So this is what you use Short money for, is it?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman, as he intervened from a sedentary position, appears to suppose that I am using his hon. Friend as an unofficial deputising service. I am sure that he can serve in that capacity as long as he starts counting now.

It is obviously also the case that, in a society in which people are used to consuming services late at night—taxis, chemists, late night shopping, fast food delivery—it will occur to them to try to consume medical services late at night. Indeed, the universal availability of the telephone, which the Minister mentioned, has meant that people are now used to telephoning for things that they certainly were not used to telephoning for when the original terms and conditions of the general practitioner's contract were set, because people did not have telephones when the service was first structured as it now is. There is an expectation that general practitioner services will be available at night, that they can be summoned up as of right and that an entitlement exists. The Government's patients charter has done much to underpin that way of viewing the service. I also believe, although it is difficult to find hard evidence to make the point precisely, that, to some extent, emergency services—there is a parallel with the ambulance service—are used as a substitute for the more conventional provision of primary care.

Having said all that, it would be wrong for the House to overlook the fact that much of the out-of-hours work performed by general practitioners is genuinely needed. It would also be wrong of us to overlook the fact that most of our fellow citizens consume the national health service in a responsible way. There can be no doubt—there is no quarrel over the issue between myself and the Minister—that pressure on the service has increased. I am certain that it has an effect on general practitioners' work load and morale.

There has been a drop in the number of people coming forward to train as GPs—a 15 per cent. drop since 1990. There has been a similar drop in the number of more senior doctors coming to general practice having been hospital doctors, having worked abroad or even having left the service temporarily for family reasons. There is also an increasing trend towards early retirement, as we discussed earlier. That is facilitated by the early retirement package for GPs, which allows general practitioners to quit at 50 with a lower pension. General practitioners still find that attractive and avail themselves of the package. The issue will not go away, and it clearly has to be addressed.

I am certain that the solution is not to be found in ending negotiations. I am equally certain that the solution will not be found in industrial action in the national health service, which I oppose. The issue is not primarily about money, although money is involved. It is a little rich for the Government amendment to refer to "payments so that the average general practitioner will receive an extra £800 per year".

The figure is arrived at through the complexities of the GP contract and the complexities of the way in which general practitioners are paid.

I believe—I stand to be corrected if I am wrong—that within the figure of £800 the Government include money that would be carried forward from last year's underspend. The money would be paid to general practitioners in any event and is not new money specifically to be paid to general practitioners for the out-of-hours service. If I have misunderstood that or have misrepresented the Government's position, I shall happily give way to the Minister. I think that I am broadly right in saying that the figure of £800 is as high as it could be and includes money that would fall to GPs anyway.

Mr. Malone: The hon. Gentleman will understand that the mechanisms in place do not always deliver the money to GPs. The point about the change in the fee structure mechanism now proposed is that it will deliver money. When compared with the present structure, GPs will be, on average, £800 better off.

Mr. Brown: I rather thought that I had got it right. If I ever get into terrible trouble and if the Minister of State is in private practice I shall almost certainly employ him to represent me in the courts—I certainly would not employ him as a doctor. The Government are clearly inflating their £800 figure to get it as high as they can. It does not represent new money given to general practitioners that they would not otherwise receive. That is what the Government seem to be trying to imply, but it is not true.

Mr. Malone: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way again, because it is a fairly abstruse point.

It is of course the case that the global pool of money that the independent review body recommends is delivered in a number of different ways through different fee mechanisms. What the hon. Gentleman says is right: the money is part of that funding. But it is funding that may not have been drawn down, and will now be delivered. What the review body will recommend in succeeding years will depend upon what is paid this year. It is important to draw the money down at an earlier stage rather than leave it there untouched. The hon. Gentleman's suggestion that it does not matter because the GPs would have got the money anyway is wrong. It is a figure that they will receive, on average, in addition to what they would otherwise have received this year.

Mr. Brown: If the Minister is now saying that there was some prospect that the element that stood to be carried over would not have been carried over, he should say that to the GPs rather than to me. He would be announcing a new concept. I do not think that it is for the Minister to withhold the money—the Minister shakes his head and confirms that the position is as I understand it.

If the solutions are not to be found in industrial action, which the Minister and I oppose, it logically follows that negotiations must continue. That is clearly the right way to proceed. The solutions will not be found in simplistic statements. I was slightly surprised to hear a leading Conservative intellectual, the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes), say on the "Today" programme in early June, when stating the position on behalf of the Government:

"If someone rings up a GP and says I've got a sore throat come and see me, you tell them to get lost, don't you."

Such simplistic solutions will not help, and I do not think that the solution lies in that approach.

There is merit in a public education campaign. Although the Minister clearly disqualified himself from playing a leading role in it, I do not think it would do any harm if the Minister went on television and explained what the out-of-hours service was for and what it was not for. Those are not points about which the major political parties are quarrelling, so why not spell out how the service should be used responsibly and, perhaps, give some examples of irresponsible or inappropriate use of the service? I do not believe that a public education programme will solve the problem, but it has a part to play.

The solutions lie in a co-operative way of working in general practice. The internal market exacerbates the problems. The Labour party's policies, with the emphasis on public service rather than the internal market, go a long way to resolving the problems. In our new policy document, we advocate closer co-operation between GP practices and local health authorities, both in the commissioning of hospital services and in the planning and development of primary care.

A successful solution to the problems faced by general practitioners providing out-of-hours service has been the formation of local GP out-of-hours co-operatives. One such example is the out-of-hours co-operative in the Kensington, Chelsea and Westminster health authority. Under that scheme, local GPs can sign up with the co-operative and divert all out-of-hours calls to the co-operative switchboard. In return, the GP agrees to participate in a duty rota for taking calls and making home visits organised by the co-operative.

[Mr. Brown]

As well as that excellent example of co-operation, the co-operative goes further and employs drivers to take the general practitioners to the patients' homes. That relieves the GP of the stress of navigating and driving alone to different parts of London. The scheme fosters a welcome team spirit among GPs on night duty and reduces the likelihood of GPs being attacked while making home visits—the more so as they have the driver with them. It is a more efficient way of dealing with out-of-hours calls and it significantly reduces the burden on individual GPs.

Another example—again, wholly in line with the health policies recently launched by the Labour party—is the one-stop shop such as the one in Norwich, which provides advice and information to local people. The scheme is intended to change the pattern of primary care delivery to meet the needs of today's population. Out-of-hours services are certainly among the range of services that the Labour party is keen to see improved in order to benefit patients and to relieve the pressure on GPs which, it seems, will remorselessly increase as they have to carry out their out-of-hours services.

Our proposals for co-operative working between GPs in the commissioning and planning process lend themselves to the possibility of locality groups of general practitioners setting up out-of-hours co-operatives and one-stop health shops. That is in complete contrast to the Government's approaches, which are underpinned by the national health service reforms. In many instances, fundholding has forced GPs into competitive relationships with their professional colleagues.

We want to replace competition in the health service with co-operation. We believe that all health care professionals will want to co-operate with each other, with the aim of delivering ever-higher standards of patient care. The competitive requirements of the internal market work against co-operation and hinder the development of innovation which brings with it efficiency in the health service and, dare I say it, greater benefits to the patients.

8.30 pm

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): I had intended to welcome the Secretary of State to his new post and to wish him well within his new terms of reference. However, as he is not in the Chamber, I shall not do so.

When the Liberals hold their weekly meeting and examine the success of the two half-day debates, I think that they will conclude that they have been an utter waste of time. In the last debate, the Minister for Transport in London successfully duffed up the Liberal party on its proposals for the railways, and I think that we are about to see a repeat performance in this debate, as I have heard nothing so far to convince me that the Government have got it wrong with regard to out-of-hours patient care. In fact, my support for the Government is reinforced by what I have heard from the Liberal Benches today.

I am sorry that the Liberal Democrat spokesman, the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), and his parliamentary minder the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) are the only Liberals present, as it would have been of benefit to all their colleagues to listen to the debate and understand why the basis on which they applied for it is wholly misguided.

Mr. Matthew Banks: If the parliamentary minder,the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), had not been present, the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) would not have realised that the words of the motion that we are debating this evening were those of our parliamentary colleague, the right hon. Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney). That was clear from the exchange that took place when the matter was referred to earlier. [Interruption.]

Mr. Dunn: I will try to speak above the outbreak of frustration from the Liberal Benches. I am happy to respond to my hon. Friend's point. He is entirely correct: it is a very strange debate on a very strange day.

When I was much younger, I remember reading the history of the Liberal party—it is always wise to read about the history of one's opponents. The Liberal Democrats were once a great party. In our constituencies we probably have—as you do, Mr. Deputy Speaker—a Grenville street, a Gladstone road and a Rosebery gardens, but will we find an Ashdown street on the new housing developments in our constituencies?

Mr. Alex Carlile: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dunn: No, but I shall give way shortly. I want to finish this important point.

I suspect that we shall not see an Ashdown street, a Carlile road or a Beith gardens in the new housing developments in our communities. It is more likely that we shall find an Ashdown tip or an Ashdown recycling plant, because that would be appropriate to the once great party that is now reduced to a parliamentary sect.

The Liberal Democrats are no longer a party because, according to my definition, a political party has to be based on a philosophy; it must have principles. The one thing that the Liberal party has shown itself to be to date is a wholly unprincipled party without a philosophy. It is no longer motivated by philosophy, but by opportunism—as we can see at all levels of government, from parish to Parliament.

I wish to make an important announcement to the House, if I may, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Earlier this week, we heard that a Mr. Steven Stenton, who was until the weekend a Liberal Democrat member of Kent county council, decided that his future no longer lay with the Liberal Democrats, and on Monday he applied to become a member of the Conservative party.

Mr. Carlile: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dunn: I am in full flow. I will give way in a moment. That now increases—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. I am not sure whether the gentleman referred to is a patient or whether he attended out of hours. Either way, perhaps the hon. Gentleman will assist the Chair by returning to the motion.

Mr. Dunn: I mentioned the incident because the defection took place out of hours, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It took place at the weekend.

Mr. Carlile: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that his "full flow" simply confirms what a dry summer it has been? Does he accept that all political parties, including the Conservative party, have their loonies and that we are happy to see the odd loony go to the Conservative party rather than somewhere more sensible? Will the hon. Gentleman explain why he is prepared to vote today against the very deliberately chosen words of the right hon. Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney)?

Mr. Dunn: I will certainly pass on the hon. and learned Gentleman's comments to Mr. Stenton. I am sure that Mr. Stenton's decision will be reinforced by what has been said today.

I shall vote for the Government amendment because the Government are doing exactly what I want them to do. I am here to support the Government and to advise, caution and warn them on those occasions when they get things wrong. So far, I have heard nothing from hon. Members on either side to cause me to change my mind. I came to the debate with an open mind; I wanted to listen and to learn from the debate. I am a genuine parliamentarian of the old school.

I welcome the Minister's announcement that talks will continue between the British Medical Association and the Government. That is right and proper. No one in the House wants to see general practitioners take industrial action. There was a perceived loss of professionalism on the part of teachers when they went on strike. I hope that the doctors have learnt from that incident and I am sure that they do not want to go down the same route. There has been a diminution of the perceived professionalism of the Royal College of Nursing since it decided recently to abandon its 80-year-old strike ban. Clearly, the Royal College of Nursing no longer deserves the description "royal"—and it is no longer a college, but a nursing trade union.

Mr. Carlile: Disgraceful.

Mr. Dunn: It may be disgraceful, but it also happens to be true—it is amazing how I can throw my voice and speak twice. The hon. Gentleman must enter the real world. If he spent more time in the House, he would understand the genuine concerns of our constituents. The Royal College of Nursing is no longer royal and it is no longer a college; it is simply a trade union. The BMA, to which hon Members opposite have referred, is probably the same thing.

Dr. Macara may not have posters on his wall of Daniel Cohn-Bendit—I am probably one of the few people present who remembers Danny the Red—or Che Guevara, another hero of the pot-smoking left, but Dr. Macara is no Conservative.

Mr. Carlile: He was.

Mr. Dunn: Well, he is not now.

Mr. Carlile: You have driven him away.

Mr. Dunn: Am I to be protected from such outbursts, Mr. Deputy Speaker? Dr. Macara is not a Conservative; he might have been a Conservative once for the wrong reasons, but he is not a Conservative now—and that is all that matters.

I have received only one letter about the subject of out-of-hours patient care, and that worries me. Some 80 per cent. of my constituents in Dartford are covered by fundholding general practices. It may well be that the people I represent are satisfied with that arrangement and with the provision and dispatch of services to them and to their families. If there were a tremendous groundswell of concern, as reported by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery, I suspect that I might have heard more about it from my local GPs, who often write to me about their concerns. However, they have no concerns about this issue.

I wonder, therefore, why the Liberal party chose to debate the subject today. I read the Liberal motion with great interest. The motion about out-of-hours patient care in the name of the leader of the Liberal party refers to the need for a method of work that is manageable by family doctors. The proposals by the Minister of State on 20 April confirm that that is also the Government's view. They want a manageable system and they hope that the public who use GPs' services will differentiate between genuine and non-genuine calls. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery mentioned some examples earlier.

Anyone who has been a parent knows the anxiety and stress that parents face when a small child is ill. Sometimes it a balance of judgment between being concerned and frightened about the health of one's child and ringing the doctor, or waiting until the next day, hoping that it will not matter too much. There will always be a balance between wasting the doctor's time and asking the doctor to come round because one is frightened out of one's wits because one's child is so ill.

The motion

"believes there should be a right for general practitioners to transfer responsibility for out of hours care to another general practitioner".

That was also proposed in the offer on 20 April 1995, so what is the problem? The motion also "supports the need for substantial, ongoing patient education campaigns on the appropriate use of the out of hours emergency service".

No one in the Chamber has disagreed with that so far. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) said as much a few moments ago, but that was also in the offer.

There is a need to make patients aware of the stress that they can put on doctors and, more importantly, doctors' families. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery gave an account of his own family, with a father who was a GP in my native Lancashire.

Inevitably, there will be occasions when the implications will not get through to those who waste time. We have heard nothing about what should be done about irritant patients who continue to waste time because there is something wrong with a little finger, the plasters have run out or they cannot get headache tablets. We must also be aware that the stress on GPs is huge and when they become tired because of out-of-hours work, their judgment may be affected. As society is increasingly litigious, it is necessary to protect doctors from what may be called the American syndrome, and that concerns every Member of Parliament.

I firmly believe that everything that the Government have done to date is right. I have no doubt that the Minister will listen to what has been said by hon. Members in all parts of the House before replying to the debate. I am sure that the BMA will also listen carefully to the words of hon. Members. One can wave the wand of disruption only once or twice before it becomes devalued and the BMA must be concerned about its long-term image in the community.

[Mr. Dunn]

We all know that society makes many more demands on public servants, whether they be Members of Parliament, local councillors, therapists, social workers, doctors or anyone in the public eye. There must be a balance and GPs must be protected. That is why I am wholly in favour of the Government amendment.

8.42 pm

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): It is indeed an honour to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) who is a parliamentarian of the old school, as he said and I am now happy to endorse. He said that he had received just one letter from a constituent. I, too, have received only one letter regarding this matter and that was from my own general practitioner. He is my personal general practitioner, Dr. Barry Jones, a fundholder at the Minster practice in Lichfield. Not only did we discuss the matter in his surgery, but we also discussed it in the Eastern Eye Indian restaurant in Lichfield, where from time to time I hold my surgeries.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dartford spoke about plasters running out. My general practitioner was telling me that one patient phoned him up saying that his cotton wool had run out and he needed another prescription. He had cotton wool on prescription for a number of years following a prostate operation. When my doctor asked why he still needed cotton wool, the patient said that he required it because of the prostate operation. My doctor asked why he still needed it after four years. It transpired that he was using the cotton wool to stuff soft toys and he was doing it on the national health service. That gives some idea of people's expectations when dealing with the national health service.

I listened to the advocacy from the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). He was certainly no advocate in respect of general practitioners. When he began his speech, seven Liberal Democrat Members were in the Chamber. He made some puns about fugues and one Member left halfway through. He then proceeded to contradict himself as to whether or not it was an issue of money and I noted that another Liberal Democrat Member had walked out. He then made a joke as to whether the Secretary of State was present. His supporters went down to three and at one point there was only one. I see that now there is only himself and the ever-present Liberal Chief Whip, the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), sitting silently and noting the lack of support from his own side.

Mr. Dunn: The minder.

Mr. Fabricant: As my hon. Friend says, he is the minder, the silent and ominous one noting what has been said.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery said that out-of-hours care should not be an issue of money. He went on to talk about the redistribution of wealth, but he made absolutely no practical suggestions, except for the one about advertising, to which I will return later. At that point there was absolutely no one else from the Liberal Democrat party in the Chamber.

He said that there should be remote control diagnosis and I wondered what he envisaged. Perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman will intervene and tell me whether there should be remote control diagnosis by means of the latest technology. Is he suggesting that the Government should provide everybody in the country with remote-control ECG and EEG machines or other paramedic technology that we should all have in our homes so that we could hook up should a diagnosis be required? That is an example of Liberal Democrat muddled thinking.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State rightly pointed out that some £45 million in additional funds will be made available for out-of-hours patient care. He spoke about 24-hour primary care centres and GP co-operatives. Incidentally, it was interesting that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) said that the Labour party supported co-operatives and one-stop shops. In his typically amiable way, he advocated everything that already exists and has been introduced by the Conservative Government, but he chose not to mention what the Labour party would do to fundholders or trusts because there is no clear Labour policy on that.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The hon. Gentleman is being uncharacteristically unfair. I said that I felt that the Government fundholding structures set neighbouring general practices against one another and that such a competitive way of working was not the best way to solve the out-of-hours problems. I said that our co-operative model was a better way to proceed, so I dealt with the points to which the hon. Gentleman has just referred.

Mr. Fabricant: The hon. Gentleman is reiterating the points that he made in his speech, but he did not say whether he would abolish fundholding overnight if Labour came to power.

Mr. Brown: Yes, it is our intention to phase out individual practice fundholding as currently structured over a period which may be as long as three years, but hopefully will be shorter and certainly in the first period of a Labour Government.

Mr. Fabricant: The hon. Gentleman is being untypically mealy-mouthed. He spoke about phasing out, he then said it would be abolished over three years and then he said that abolition would happen in any event, possibly within the five years of a Labour Government, should one come to power.

Mr. Malone: I would not like my hon. Friend to be under any misapprehension that Labour would do other than offer a fatal threat to GP fundholding. It is not mealy-mouthed—Labour is planning to abolish fundholding and to do away with all the benefits that it brings patients.

Mr. Fabricant: If that is the case—although one would not think so listening to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East, who presents a confused picture about the amount of time that phasing would last—there would be a problem. Every general practitioner in Lichfield is a fundholder, including many who told me that they always vote Labour. Hearing the hon. Gentleman, I wonder whether they would ever vote Labour again.

Mr. Brown: I must correct the hon. Gentleman. I did not say that fundholding would probably go but that it would go. The Minister and I disagree on whether or not that policy is right but there is no disagreement between us, for once, as to Labour party policy. GP fundholding will go.

Mr. Fabricant: That is sad news. I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman has any policy on trusts. He shrugs.

It appears that members of Labour's Front Bench are now conferring and making policy on the hoof. I await a further intervention, to learn what would happen to trusts. There seems to be some confusion. In fact, there seems to be an argument between Labour Front-Bench members.

Ms Estelle Morris (Birmingham, Yardley) indicated dissent.

Mr. Fabricant: Nevertheless, we await Labour's suggestions with interest.

The offer is clear—an extra £45 million within the overall health budget to support alternative out-of-hours arrangements. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, that extra funding would not otherwise be available to general practitioners. There would also be additional help for rural doctors within that £45 million.

Mention has been made of studies of GPs' work load, and it is worth reiterating the hours that they work. I take my hon. Friend the Minister slightly to task, in the sense that there is no such thing as an average practitioner. Nevertheless, the average GP works a normal 31.9 hours per week and 6.9 hours per out-of-hours, making a total of 38.8 hours—plus 19.2 hours on call.

There is a requirement for a re-education programme. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East talked about the patients charter, which is an excellent publication. The hon. Gentleman, or perhaps one of his assistants, has spent the last few days counting the number times that "expect" and "right" appear in the charter. That is rather amusing, because one can well imagine that if the charter included no expectations or rights, the hon. Gentleman would be the first to complain. The existence of the patients charter provides patients with a clear guide to what is expected of them and of practices, which cannot be a bad thing.

Difficulties have, however, arisen—primarily because of patients' expectations. It is not just the relationship between patients and doctors that demands re-education. I well recall my first surgery after I entered Parliament. One gentleman talked to me for five or six minutes, leaving me wondering what point he was trying to make. It eventually transpired that he was concerned that his wife was, to use his words, playing around. I wondered whether he expected me to raise that matter in a parliamentary question. Clearly, he had come to see me simply to express his worries and to talk them over with someone. That sort of thing is becoming increasingly common in the relationship that the public have with Members of Parliament and general practitioners. Perhaps the accessibility of politicians and of general practitioners on television creates an image that is not always helpful.

My discussions with my own GP included one this afternoon, after I decided to take part in this debate. He told me about some of the problems that have confronted him out of hours. This evidence may be anecdotal and, as I said, there is no such thing as the average GP.

A few weeks ago, Dr. Barry Jones was telephoned at 3 in the morning by someone who had toothache, wanting to know whether it would be all right to take aspirin or paracetamol. On another occasion, he was telephoned at 1 in the morning by a very drunk lady who asked whether he could provide a morning-after pill because she had committed an indiscretion some hours earlier—whether drunk or sober, we do not know. In another incident, Dr. Jones was telephoned at 3 in the morning by the parents of a child with a runny nose, who were concerned that their child might have meningitis.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): The hon. Gentleman has described some of the frivolous reasons for which GPs are telephoned in the middle of the night, but how will the Government's proposal to throw money at the problem reduce the number of such calls? Should not the Government consider instead ways of reducing pressures on general practitioners, possibly by involving people other than GPs in the provision of out-of-hours medical services?

Mr. Fabricant: The hon. Gentleman is not necessarily right in suggesting that people other than GPs should be brought in. That would not solve the problem. I am flabbergasted—and I am rarely flabbergasted in the Chamber—to hear a Labour Member say that the Government are throwing money at the health service. If throw money at the health service we must, then we must—because the Government have a commitment to the NHS. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for reminding the House of that commitment. He asked whether something else could be done. Earlier, I mentioned re-education, and I will develop that point shortly.

I will cite a few more examples of calls to my doctor because they are not just frivolous problems; they are educational, too. If anyone is listening to this debate, such examples might even strike a chord and hold them back from telephoning their doctor unnecessarily.

Another patient who telephoned my doctor was suffering from diarrhoea and vomiting—apparently such calls occur frequently—following a two-week holiday. The illness had lasted for a whole week; yet nothing was done about it while on holiday. Instead, the patient rang at 2 am for the doctor's advice. That is not only frivolous but an especially selfish use of the national health service. On another occasion, my GP was telephoned at 4 am and asked whether he could produce a sick note to say that an individual, who had been arrested earlier that evening for breach of the peace, was not fit to attend court. The list of such calls goes on and on.

My general practitioner—who is clearly not average judging from the figures quoted by my hon. Friend the Minister—says that in the past five years his out-of-hours work has quadrupled and he reckons that at weekends the work out of hours has increased some tenfold.

I do not think that there is an easy answer to the problem. If there are answers, they will vary depending on whether they apply to rural, urban or inner-city practices. Of course primary care centres can help and the Government are already supporting them. The situation is particularly difficult in rural areas, but again my hon. Friend the Minister is throwing money—to quote the hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley)—at the problem. Throwing money at it might be appropriate occasionally.

My doctor reckons that he generally works a 47.5 hour week and, on average, he is on call for nine hours each working week—not including disturbed sleep. As he said rather wryly, since Members of Parliament work long hours but have begun to introduce Jopling reforms, perhaps there needs to be a similar reform of the hours of GPs. Without weakening the services and, indeed, the Hippocratic oath taken by general practitioners, implementing such reforms would not be easy.

[Mr. Fabricant]

There is no question but that the patients charter benefits patients. However, it has also increased patients' expectations and we should address that problem. I mentioned the pastoral role of Members of Parliament when I described someone coming to my surgery to talk about his wife playing around. Too many GPs are also expected to play such a role. One wonders whether the church could play a greater pastoral role rather than its being expected of GPs.

There is a clear role for re-educating patients in what they should expect of GPs—and what should be expected of Members of Parliament. In Staffordshire, we have a very good commercial radio station called Signal Radio. The local family health services authority put out a commercial which, to me, stated the obvious. Clearly, however, it needed to be done. It explained that every time someone does not turn up for an appointment at a hospital, it costs the NHS money and it could mean a longer waiting list for an appointment next time. I would have thought that people would realise that if they could not attend an appointment they should telephone beforehand to allow others to fill the slot. It is a sad indictment that a commercial needs to be put out asking people to think of someone else and to "love thy neighbour as thyself".

The Government have introduced the excellent "Help Us To Help You" campaign, yet it could go a little further and need not involve great expense. Television advertising is expensive and I agree with my hon. Friend the Minister that the money could be better spent. However, I think that a radio campaign, which is on average about a tenth of the price of a television campaign, could be very effective, especially compared with other forms of advertising and promotion.

My hon. Friend the Minister is absolutely right when he says that GPs have a role to play too. I quoted from the patients charter, as did the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East. The line on page 10 referring to should be included in the practice's own charter. So far, well over 50 per cent. of GPs and their practices have produced such charters, but the roles of both doctor and patient in out-of-hours treatment need to be more clearly stated in them.

"when it is and is not appropriate to call on your GP for out-of-hours treatment"

We must provide better patient care. One of the great aspects of medical provision in Lichfield, and in mid-Staffordshire in general, is the ability of fundholders such as Dr. Barry Jones to send their patients to hospitals: the money follows the patient rather than the patient following the money. That is one of the most important changes that we have made over the past few years.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East laughs, because he thinks that I am merely quoting a slogan. For the first time, however, the Victoria hospital in Lichfield has a dermatology centre, a new paediatric centre, physiotherapy, an ophthalmic centre and a new surgical wing. That is all due to money following the patient: fundholders such as Dr. Barry Jones can direct their patients to the Lichfield hospital and consultants from Wolverhampton, Birmingham and Sutton Coldfield must now come to Lichfield. Previously, patients from Lichfield had to go to those cities.

What would the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East do? He said that perhaps in a year—or three years, or five years; he was not sure of the time involved—Labour would phase out fundholders. My only criticism of fundholding is that we have not introduced it universally; although it is universal in Lichfield, and virtually no GP in mid-Staffordshire is not a fundholder, unfortunately not every GP has become a fundholder nationally. It is through fundholding, however, that GPs are empowered to provide funds for patients as and when they are needed.

The NHS is safe in Conservative hands. It would clearly be in a very rocky state if it were in the hands of the Labour party—I would mention the Liberals, but as they are an irrelevance it hardly seems worth while. There should be more fundholders. GPs are a family practice, and they too will be safe in our hands. I have no doubt that, with a Minister of State like ours—caring, sharing, listening and co-operative; GP co-operatives were introduced by a Conservative Government, not by the Liberals and certainly not by the Labour party, which advocates them—the NHS will survive and continue to go from strength to strength.

9.8 pm

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): Some GPs complain that they work long hours, that they are on call at all hours and that their social life is often in danger of being disrupted. As my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant) said, they will find no more sympathetic audience than those of us who are present now. Being a doctor is rather like being a Member of Parliament: it is not simply a job, but a way of life, subject to the vicissitudes that I have just described.

Whether some of us are at our best after a late-night sitting is an open question. Some of us occasionally are, but I suspect that some are not. Certainly, if I were unwell, I would not wish to be attended by a GP who had had only two or three hours of interrupted sleep. Accident, illness and disease are no respecters of the clock. Patients expect and need the 24-hour availability of GP services, and the Government should ensure that such services are available. The question is, of course, how that can be done.

The British Medical Association has stated that the issues are not about pay but about restructuring. The structure suggested by the Government, of a lump sum for each GP, payment for calls and substantial development funds for out-of-hours arrangements, seems to be entirely reasonable. My hon. Friend the Minister has deployed the Government's case, while the BMA has deployed its case. The differences are not great, and it should be possible for men and women of good will to sit around a table and agree.

The BMA states that it believes that, the differences between them could be settled. That may well be right, but only if there is also willingness on the BMA side. I am bound to say that threats of industrial action such as the BMA is making do not help the atmosphere for such discussions, and the BMA does itself and a respected profession no credit by waving that particular stick.

"With willingness on the Government side,"

The BMA has listed various requirements which would need to be met for the differences to be resolved. Having listened to my hon. Friend the Minister earlier in the debate, I think that very nearly all the requirements are being met, although one or two seem a little unreasonable. The BMA says:

"The Government's recent offer tied up the so-called right to transfer responsibility in so much red tape—by requiring FHSA approval—as to render the proposal impractical. It should be sufficient for GPs to make proper arrangements for the transfer and simply inform the FHSA."

The FHSA is responsible locally for ensuring proper provision of GP services. It would not be good enough for GPs just to make arrangements that they thought were in order and then tell the FHSA. It is entirely proper that the Minister should require the FHSA to approve any arrangements for the responsibility of the right to transfer.

The BMA also pleads that the Government should commit themselves to a public education campaign, a point that was made by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) and reiterated strongly by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant). I must say that it is a plea with which I have considerable sympathy.

I am very much in favour of the patients charter, but I can also understand why some doctors have asked "What about a doctors charter?" The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) referred to specific incidents in which doctors had been called upon unreasonably, and my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire has just quoted similar examples. That is a real dilemma, and every GP could cite similar cases, because I am afraid that some people make unreasonable demands on their doctors.

Such treatment is not confined to doctors. As a member of the Health Select Committee, I was involved in the inquiry and report on the London ambulance service. One feature that emerged from the evidence before us was the fact that people will telephone for an ambulance for the most trivial complaints. That means that an ambulance is often out on the street dealing with such calls when a genuine emergency call comes through.

Doctors are faced with similar calls. It is one thing to take a telephone call in which somebody asks about something rather trivial that can be dealt with by telephone, but it is a good deal worse if a doctor receives a somewhat garbled message, a few comments and a plea for him to go out and answer the call, only to find when he gets there that the problem is something that could easily have waited until the morning—if, indeed, his services were required at all.

Like the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery, I am a member of the General Medical Council, so I see what sometimes happens if doctors do not respond to calls which prove to be genuine. The consequences of a failure to respond can be serious, so one understands the dilemma of doctors who find themselves obliged to respond to almost every call, just in case. There is a real case for some sort of public education campaign to help people to realise in what circumstances it is right and proper to send for a doctor, but also to know what other steps they could take when the case is not so urgent.

As I have said, the differences between the Government and the BMA are capable of resolution around the table—but surely not across the Floor of the Chamber. The Liberal Democrats have not put their valuable parliamentary time to the best use tonight.

9.17 pm

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): It is a bit much if the Liberal Democrat spokesman who opened the debate, the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), cannot be bothered to stay for three hours to listen to his own debate—but I guess that the Liberal party never had much staying power.

I could describe the reaction in the Chamber to his speech as "general satisfaction" with what he said. That may surprise some hon. Members, but I say it because he had so much self-satisfaction that that made enough satisfaction to go round for everybody. We were treated to the stuff that he no doubt dishes out by the yard in the courts, and for which he is well paid. Frankly, it did not cut much ice here.

Once again, the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery showed us that there is nothing that the Liberals think too important to play party politics with. His was a trivial approach to the issue, trying to pretend that the complex issues did not exist or that we could wish them away. That was in stark contrast to the serious speeches from the Minister and from the Labour Front-Bench spokesman. Naturally, I agreed much more with the Minister than with the Labour spokesman, but they both made serious speeches about a serious subject that should not be trivialised.

I noticed several other features of the speech by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery, the first of which was his patent dishonesty about money. The cry went up, "Is it new money?" Lots of new money has gone into the health service, we all know that. But of course it sounds good to ask the question, and that is all the Liberals care about. It sounds good to ask, "Is this new money?" and then to say that it is not, because it is not new since the beginning of the year. "Will it be taken from other services?" It sounds good, makes people attracted to what the Liberals say, but does not add up to anything substantial.

Once again, when the Liberals say that they want more money to be spent on something, they will tell us, "Well, this was in our proposals at the last election. We were the only people honest enough to say that there should be an increase in income tax." They did say that there should be an increase in income tax—of one penny. But they seemed to have forgotten how much one penny in income tax raises. It is less than £2 billion. When one adds up the sort of things that they say would be paid for from that one penny of income tax, one will see that it comes to about £8 billion or £9 billion. It is a patently dishonest approach.

The Liberals have the absolute cheek to say that there should be a large-scale advertising campaign about the responsibility that patients have in using GPs. Of course more responsibility should be shown. I shall come to that in a minute. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant) pointed out some of the examples of abuse of the system. It was my experience last summer of having to answer attacks from the Liberals about the advertising campaigns that the Government are carrying out. The Liberals tell us, "It is only the Government trying to use them to their own advantage."

One area that the Liberals attacked was the newspaper campaign for people to carry the form—I believe it is the E1011—that one takes to European Community countries to claim medical services. The Liberal spokesman at the time told us that it was a complete waste of money, because of the number of clippings that were sent back from the newspapers. That was a deliberate misrepresentation of what that campaign was about. I have taken my family abroad, and it was seeing the Government's advertising campaign that made me think that I must go and get the form and ensure that I had it with me.

The Liberals have the cheek to suggest that they want more advertising, because they could then attack us in next year's fanciful parade. I shall make one prediction: this year, another Minister will have to answer more attacks from the Liberals on Government advertising. They did last year and the year before. Liberals are creatures of habit. Doubtless they will try it again.

Mr. Fabricant: Ironically, is it not the case that the Liberals enjoy an almost enviable position? They can make commitments to spending. They can attack Government policy one moment and then advocate it the next, simply because they know—not even deep in their heart of hearts, but quite openly—that there is no chance of them ever becoming a party of government, so they can take that irresponsible stance.

Mr. Hughes: Indeed. I shall come to some of the inadequacies of the Liberals in government—as we see in local authorities—in a minute.

Those of us who use the NHS, who are customers of the NHS, know how important this part of the health service is. I ask doctors to reflect on what they are threatening. They are not low-paid workers. They are paid 50 per cent. more than Members of Parliament. I am not complaining in any way about what GPs are paid—of course it is right that they are paid well—but they have to clarify in their own minds whether they are talking about money.

There have even been suggestions that the BMA has taken the stance it has because of the BMA elections that are going on at the moment. I hope that that is not true. We are dealing with people's lives. We are talking about people who use the out-of-hours service because they are frightened. Anyone who has had a child screaming and being sick in the middle of the night—as a parent, one is worried about what will happen, and one cannot take the child to a casualty department, and that is not the right use of a casualty department, anyway—knows how important that service is.

I cannot believe that the very good GPs it has been my experience to come across—our own family GP, GPs in my constituency, and those mentioned by my hon. Friends—those responsible and caring people, would have any truck with industrial action that would inevitably hurt patients. However it was dressed up and however people pretended that it was merely an administrative matter, it would hurt patients, and they have to understand that.

I must comment on a couple of the things that the Liberal Democrat spokesman, the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery said on the subject. He made two statements that I would regard as a threat. First, he suggested that we should charge for out-of-hours service calls that turn out to be hoaxes. I do not understand how that is supposed to work, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire pointed out, Liberal Democrat suggestions are not supposed to work, but merely to sound good.

How would one collect the money? What is it supposed to mean? He is suggesting that the Liberal Democrats are not in favour of a service that is free at the point of use.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Nonsense.

Mr. Hughes: It is all very well for the hon. and learned Gentleman, who has just wandered back into the Chamber, to say that that is nonsense, but I am reading what he said. He has suggested a charge, and it is no good him sitting there with a puzzled frown on his face. He must face up to what he has said. He suggested that there should be a charge, and perhaps he will now tell us what he meant by that.

Mr. Carlile: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the fact that 11 million appointments are broken in national health service hospitals is a problem? Does he agree that, to ensure a national health service that is free at the point of delivery to the patients who use it properly, we must consider ways in which we can ensure that patients attend meetings? It may not be feasible to charge patients 50p for a broken appointment, but if that is not feasible, would he like to suggest how he would ensure that patients do not miss 11 million hospital appointments? Has he anything constructive to say?

Mr. Hughes: I am glad that the hon. and learned Gentleman now has the figure right, because he mentioned 5.5 million appointments in The Independent of 6 July. At least he has got it right this time.

Mr. Carlile: Now answer the question.

Mr. Hughes: The hon. and learned Gentleman made a point, and suggested that there should be a charge, but in his intervention he recognised that that was nonsense. I expect him to speak nonsense—he has been doing it all evening.

Mr. Carlile: What is your answer?

Mr. Hughes: This is a serious problem, but hectoring from a sedentary position does not provide an answer. I accept that I do not have an answer, but I do not make the sort of stupid suggestions that we hear from the hon. and learned Gentleman.

I will continue with the cutting from which I was quoting. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery also suggested that he would take away the right of elderly people to have their GP as their first point of call. Again he is looking pained, but that is what he said, and it is more proof that the Liberal Democrats simply do not have a proper policy. They say one thing, but when one questions them, they say, "Oh, no. Goodness me. That's not what I meant. Are you talking about that policy document? We are talking about now."

He said:

"Perhaps also, the elderly could be treated primarily in hospitals and not by GPs."

He would be prepared to deny the elderly the right to use their GP in the first instance. If that is not what he meant, he should apologise to the House.

Mr. Carlile: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: If the hon. and learned Gentleman is going to apologise, I will. If it is going to be the same rubbish that we heard earlier, I will not. But I do not think that I will take time from his hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood).

I have one final point about fundholding GPs and the ability of those GPs in particular to run new services. I want to praise the Elliott Hall medical centre in my constituency, and in particular its patients' association. This is a wonderful GP service, providing a range of new services, which have not been thought of by others—so much so that people want to leave other GPs to join their books.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East was wrong to say that he wants to take away that ability to experiment, run new services, compete and enable others to do see they are doing. To do so would take away many of the improvements in the health service, and that is not a move that my constituents would welcome.

9.29 pm

Mr. Matthew Banks (Southport): I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to catch your eye briefly in this debate, which has, at times, bordered on the bizarre. However, I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) made an excellent and powerful speech. So did my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims), who has momentarily had to leave the Chamber. I particularly enjoyed the remarks of that great parliamentarian, my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn), who I know will be returning in a few moments.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) referred, rather more flexibly than the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), if I may say so, to the possibility of GP fundholding ending under any future Labour Government. I detected something of a discrepancy between what he said and what his right hon. Friend said, when she made it clear not long ago that GP fundholding as it currently stands is unacceptable, to use her word, and that she would put a stop to it in the first year of a Labour Government. [Interruption.] I notice that the hon. Gentleman seems to be saying something else. In my characteristic fashion, I give way to him.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The Minister and I uncharacteristically agreed that I was not saying something else. For once there is no disagreement between my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) and the Minister of State.

Mr. Banks: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. No doubt we will be able to compare what the hon. Gentleman said with what his right hon. Friend said on 29 June on the BBC's "Newsnight" programme, because there is a discrepancy. No doubt we will return to it on a future occasion.

Of course, this is a Liberal Democrat debate and I should point out to some of my hon. Friends that they are Liberal Democrats, not Liberals. There is a Liberal party in this country, which did not throw in its lot with the Social Democratic party. Its national headquarters is in Southport, and long may it remain so. They are a splendid lot. They did not renege on everything they believe and on their principles to join the SDP in a sort of mark 2 Labour party. At least with the Labour party, we know where we are—

Mr. Brown: A minute before, the hon. Gentleman said the opposite.

Mr. Banks: The hon. Gentleman suggests that we do not know where we are with the Labour party. I was drawing a fast veil over the hon. Gentleman's discrepancy with the right hon. Member for Derby, South.

Due to the shortage of time, I would like to make only a couple of quick points in relation to this Liberal Democrat-inspired—if that is the right word—debate. I am aware that Liberal Democrats say one thing at one end of a constituency and another thing at the other end. On the one hand, they propose retention of a modified GP fundholding scheme—having, of course, changed their minds twice—and on the other hand they support a system in which GPs could choose to manage funds themselves, or as part of a locally-based consortium, or could ask the local authority to manage funds on their behalf. That would create the sort of politicised system within a local authority which the British Medical Association totally opposes.

I do not know whether the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) appreciates that but we should bear in mind that he did not seem to know that some of the words of his party's motion were the words of my right hon. Friend the Minister without Portfolio. It is clear that the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) had to tell him that. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery has had little support from his side in this debate.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): The hon. Gentleman has not had any.

Mr. Banks: The hon. Member for Cornwall, North (Mr. Tyler) helpfully makes a sedentary intervention. Nowhere among the Opposition is there a better example of someone who says one thing at one end of his constituency and another thing at the other—one thing to one person and another thing to another. He has been absent for most of the debate, but the least said about that the better.

This has been a poor debate. My colleagues have drawn attention time and time again—and had longer than I in which to do so—to the shortcomings of the policies advocated by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery. The debate has been a waste of good parliamentary time. It is a great pity that the hon. and learned Gentleman was not supported by a few more of his colleagues, but I have no hesitation in supporting the Government amendment.

9.35 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I am grateful for the opportunity to reply to the debate, which I want to bring back to reality. In the time available, I want to make a number of points to which it is important that the Minister has the opportunity to reply.

I want to refocus the House's attention on the words of the motion that occasioned this debate. The motion states that the House "shares general practitioners' concerns" and refers to the need to "facilitate improved methods of work so that general practitioners can provide a more flexible, clinically appropriate and more modern way of providing emergency care".

[Mr. Archy Kirkwood]

Those words were carefully chosen, and we knew exactly where they came from—they are the words of the right hon. Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney), but I suggest that they are none the worse for that.

The motion goes on to talk about

"a right for general practitioners to transfer responsibility for out of hours care".

I carefully took note of the fact that the Minister gave some support to that notion. The motion then talks about the need for "ongoing patient education campaigns" and ends with an exhortation to the Government to "take all reasonable steps to avoid industrial action by general practitioners."

It is a very measured motion. If Conservatives vote against it, they will be voting against not only the sentiments expressed some years ago by the right hon. Member for Peterborough when he was responsible for health matters in a previous incarnation, but almost everything else that every Tory Member who has contributed to this evening's debate said about the need for education and for changes such as the transfer of responsibility for out-of-hours care. Far from being wild or irresponsible, the motion is very measured.

We are in a serious position. It is very unusual for the Government of the day, after two years of negotiation, to be confronted with potential industrial action by doctors. In fact, it is quite unprecedented—a point ably made by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). Something is seriously wrong.

It is no use Conservative Members saying that the British Medical Association is out of control or that it comprises a bunch of radical or irresponsible people; it is the BMA's members who are driving forward its policy on this issue. They are frustrated and dismayed, and wholly out of sympathy with the way in which the Government have handled the matter. That is certainly the message they have put to me loud and clear.

I shall refer to some of the contributions to today's debate and then—I hereby give notice to the Minister—deal specifically with rural problems. It will come as no surprise to the House to learn that my colleagues and I were very mindful of the particular problems confronting rural areas when we chose this important subject for debate.

Will the Minister answer the question asked by my hon. and learned Friend about the £45 million? Can it be better targeted? Where has it come from, and what services in the NHS will suffer as a result of its being redeployed? Will the Minister also deal specifically with the matter that arises in relation to one of the six constructive points made by my hon. and learned Friend about the transfer of responsibility and education? Those issues in particular are important ones, where there is a real prospect of progress.

The Government claim to have listened, and that was the main thrust of the Minister's argument, but he offered no succour to practitioners in rural areas. He talked about the £45 million provision. I understand that capital investment is needed for certain new services and facilities when developing co-operative or depute doctor services.

The Minister went on to argue, however, that some of the £45 million could be deployed in the payment of locum services. If one spread the £45 million throughout the GP population, it would be equivalent to £1,500 a head. It costs £175 a head for one night's locum cover in my constituency, so that £1,500 would provide 10 nights' locum cover in a year. If the Minister has founded his argument on that possibility, he has forgotten that there have been many losers under the new flat rate scheme, which provides £2,000 plus a £20 payment.

GPs in my area are currently paid £48.45 per night visit, but of course they have other out-of-hours responsibilities as well. People generally do not understand that there is a difference between night visits and the other burdensome responsibilities that GPs must face during the rest of the early evening and at weekends from, Saturday morning through to Monday.

Throughout the debate, I have had the sense that the Government do not understand the strength of feeling among individual doctors and their organisations about the problems from which they are suffering. The BMA has suggested to me that the average GP's working week is 62 hours, despite talk in the debate about a week of 47.5 hours. The BMA has also calculated that 23 per cent. of GPs spend 80 hours or more a week on call and providing services to patients, while just 8 per cent. work less than 40 hours a week—many of whom are part-time doctors.

Doctors face many problems, not just because of out-of-hours work but as a result of the 1990 contract. They have seen their independent contractor status eroded. They have had to bear the extra duties placed upon them because of screening and health care checks, as well the additional bureaucracy that the Government have loaded on their backs, which they greatly resent. Evidence suggests that those changes have led to much disillusion, to which my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Montgomery adverted.

On education, I noted that the Minister said that he did not think that there was much between us. That may be true. Leaving aside the rather trite remarks of the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) about our previous attacks on the Government, I want to make it clear that we would support a nationally sponsored organised education campaign. It would not need to cost an absolute fortune, but it could provide a framework within which local practitioners could conduct their own campaigns.

That campaign could get across to folk that it is in no one's interest to have a tired GP, who has had no sleep the night before, attending to people's needs and diagnosing their illnesses. The hon. Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) made a good speech about that. I am sure that the House could agree on that. Were we to get some assistance at the right level from the Government towards such an education campaign, it would send an important signal to doctors and suggest to them that the Government were taking their concerns seriously.

Mr. Fabricant: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kirkwood: I am sorry, but I do not have time.

It is important to underscore the pressure that doctors feel they are under. An article in The Independent last month reported that an independent survey carried out by Alcohol Concern between 1979 and 1990 ranked doctors with sailors and publicans as the people most likely to develop alcohol-related liver disease. That is a measure of the desperation to which doctors are being driven.

Secondly, there is evidence, which was adverted to by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Montgomery, that early retirement is increasing. In 1987, early retirement accounted for 16.6 per cent. of the total retired doctor population; it now accounts for 22.8 per cent. Forty per cent. of women doctors and 10 per cent. of newly qualified male doctors leave the service within five years of qualifying. Those are all signs of the increasing bureaucracy, the increasing expectation of patients and the increasing work load. The Government ignore that at their peril.

When I checked with a practice in Hawick, in my constituency, I was told that a vacancy in the Hawick practice had recently been advertised, and that, five years ago when a vacancy in the same practice was advertised, there were 75 applicants; this year, there were 11. That is a measure of the difficulty of encouraging people to work in rural areas against the background of the out-of-hours commitment.

Ministers simply have not recognised that times have changed, and that it is now impossible to provide the proper level of service that GPs need to provide to meet the requirements of the moment.

I am surprised that there was not a greater input by Labour Members. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) made a sensible speech—sensible because of the emphasis he placed on the need for education. It was interesting that he supported that idea, although I notice that his new document did not come up with any great solution.

Mr. Brown: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kirkwood: I honestly do not have time.

Mr. Brown rose—

Mr. Kirkwood: I do not have time. [Interruption.] I was trying to be nice to the hon. Gentleman.

All the Conservative Members who spoke were from relatively built-up areas. We heard from the hon. Members for Winchester (Mr. Malone), for Newcastle upon Tyne, East, for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) and for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant). The latter is a bit of a rural area, but the vast majority of the speeches came from people who had no appreciation of the problems that confront practitioners in rural areas.

We must acknowledge that the demands have increased by five times in the past 25 years, and doubled in the past three years, as has been said. In 1993-94, a GP was paid on average 2.8p per patient per week to provide that service. The service is an emergency service, and the Government have not succeeded in communicating that message to the general public. Increasingly, patients expect to be able to call on GPs to provide non-urgent care at any time of the evening, night or weekend. That forces local GPs to work night and day in a way that might impair their professional judgment. That position is not healthy, as I have said, or in anyone's interests.

Rural practitioners are at a much greater disadvantage than their colleagues who live in communities with deputising services or co-operative practices. There are no options available to them, nor will there be after the Government's package is introduced. They are determined, in rural areas, to try to provide a high-quality service over a wide and sparsely populated area, and I urge the Government to try to ensure that special consideration is given to those problems in rural areas in their current negotiations with the BMA.

The Government must be more flexible. Much is at stake in those negotiations. Something must be sorted out in the next nine days. I hope that the new ministerial team at the Department of Health will take advantage of that new opportunity to have a completely fresh look at the position, so that we can have more flexible, clinically appropriate, modern ways of delivering care outside normal hours that, as the motion says, are "right for patients, fair on the taxpayer and manageable" for GPs.

9.48 pm

Mr. Malone: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I am sad to tell the House that I believe that the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) has about as much knowledge of the subject as he revealed he had about my constituency, when he described a large tract of rural Hampshire as a built-up area. My constituents will be astonished, as will those of several of my hon. Friends.

I do not know where the hon. Gentleman was when I followed his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) at the beginning of the debate. I specifically went through each of the six points, and I do not intend to use the short time available to me to do so again.

Yes, of course we are prepared to look flexibly on arrangements which we have said we shall be happy to put in place, especially for rural practices. It is obtuse of the hon. Gentleman to say that one simply divides the sum of money and spends it entirely on locums. I was making the point that we can make it available as a support system in rural areas—I would not expect to see it used exclusively.

I shall now address a number of important points raised in the debate. The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) asked an important question about research. Research is important, and there has probably not been enough into the subject. I am pleased to be able to tell the House that the National Primary Care Research Centre in Manchester—which is sponsored by the Government to the tune of £15 million over 10 years and which I had the great pleasure of opening a few weeks ago—will be studying the issue, and will be holding a conference in the autumn on the subject of 24-hour primary care.

The subject will include considering innovative ways of providing out-of-hours care through GPs and others. It will inform us and help to formulate the future research programme.

The hon. Members for Roxburgh and Berwickshire and for Newcastle upon Tyne, East mentioned the problems of recruitment for general practitioners. I do not think that it is a sign of a shortage if, in Hawick, there are 11 applications for one practice place. The hon. Gentleman has a way of turning the arguments to suit his party. If there were 75 applications, he would say that there were not enough places, and that there was an unemployment problem among doctors. As usual with the Liberals, they want it both ways.

Although recruitment is often raised as a current difficulty, there is no firm evidence that it is a substantial problem. The average number of applications for advertised vacancies in GP partnerships ranges from three to 34 and, in most cases, the figure is, oddly enough, 11—the same figure as that in Hawick. Perhaps the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire can take some consolation from the fact that, on this occasion, Hawick appears, unusually, to have the same figure as the national average.

It is also true that the number of GP principals has been increasing steadily under this Government. The number is currently increasing at the rate of 1 per cent. per annum. The last survey of GP training places showed that, overall, vocational training schemes were still being filled with good-quality candidates, notwithstanding a fall in the overall number of applicants.

We keep a careful eye on that issue. It is important for the long-term benefit of primary care that excellent people continue to come forward for recruitment, are retained in general practice and take up posts in general practice when they are advertised. There is no suggestion that the Government are complacent about that.

There are still sufficient numbers of people coming forward to apply for single-handed practices, which are often highlighted as a particular area of difficulty. The last figures I can give the House show that, for the year ending 30 September 1994, the figure was 19.

A number of points were raised by my hon. Friends, who sustained the debate. It is astonishing that, in a debate in the Liberal party's time on what they clearly consider to be an important subject, that party chose to put up two speakers. [Interruption.] The Greek chorus that has now arrived certainly was not present for the debate. The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) is usually good at getting his points across from a sedentary position, even when he is not recognised by the Chair. I should have thought that he could have made a bit more effort to do so during the debate.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Malone: Now that the hon. Gentleman has arrived, I shall give way so that he can make an original point

Mr. Wallace: The Minister is descending to unusual depths. He usually knows better than to try to make cheap points. If he had ever attended debates initiated by the Liberal Democrats—it is probably stretching things too far to suppose that he has—he would have known that it was rare for more than two of us to have the chance to speak. That is something that is wrong with this place and the way it operates.

Mr. Malone: I dare not criticise the Chair, as you well know, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am delighted that at least the hon. Gentleman has agreed to turn up for the final moments of the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant) made a speech peppered with personal anecdotes and tales of his constituents who had consulted GPs. I advise the House that those tales would have made hon. Members' hair stand on end. There are clearly a number of problems in my hon. Friend's constituency.

However, both he and my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) pointed to the fact that they had had few letters about the issue in their constituency mailbags. Perhaps that is because there are thriving co-operatives in their constituencies, with excellent innovative arrangements in place. That may go some way towards explaining why my hon. Friends have heard little about the subject.

A theme of the debate was general practitioners' concern about the burdens they bear. I hope there can be a meeting of minds on the issue when the medical profession meets my right hon. Friend. I received a letter today from the local Hampshire medical committee—I must inform the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire that it is a rural committee—which expresses dissatisfaction and makes the point:

"GPs want changes in their out-of-hours arrangements to provide emergency night care more effectively and efficiently, while ensuring that all patients continue to get the best quality care".

I quibble with none of those words. We are talking about a method of delivering that care and making sure that firm arrangements are in place to secure the interests of patients. We share common objectives, and I hope that I can agree with the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire—

Mr. Bayley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Malone: No, I will not give way. I hope to agree with the hon. Gentleman that those matters can be resolved.

There have been a number of rather spectacular suggestions about how to deal with the problems that GPs face today. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) mentioned the great plan of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) for dealing with problems of patient abuse in the national health service. I had read it earlier, and it is an interesting plan.

The hon. and learned Gentleman plans to charge patients 50p each time they break an appointment. I would be interested to see the collection framework that would be put in place. I have no doubt that the threat of 50p each time would strike terror in people's hearts. I have no doubt that the collection system would not be bureaucratic. I wonder whether the hon. and learned Gentleman considered allowing the right of appeal, and whether one would receive legal aid for appealing against a 50p fine. I thought that Liberal Democrat policies were invented on the Benches opposite and not in Montgomery's local libraries, which would probably have to collect those small amounts.

There are many ways of effectively ensuring that there is no abuse of the health service. When it comes to cancelled appointments, the hon. and learned Gentleman should visit hospitals which have robust pre-admission arrangements in place, and where cancellations have been reduced to zero. I did not see many 50p pieces in those hospitals when I visited them.

It has been a typical debate from the Liberal Democrats; they change their tune all the time, don't they? On this issue, it is important to remind the House what Liberal Members have said in the past. On fundholding, in 1992 they said:

"There is no case for GP fundholding".

In 1994 it was a case of, "Hang on a minute, it might be popular." They agreed that GP fundholding

"does seem to have brought benefits".

On 3 July 1995, the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery gave us the simple answer when he said:

"We would encourage the development of joint commissioning groups. One has to be realistic, and it is not realistic to abolish all fundholding at a stroke. I do not believe that the Labour party would regard that as realistic either.

The development of joint commissioning groups . . . would ensure that fundholding would wither on the vine. Indeed, fundholding has always been a kamikaze policy . . . The Liberal Democrat view on fundholding is absolutely clear."—[Official Report, 3 July 1995; Vol. 263, c. 48.]

That view has changed on a number of occasions.

I do not think that what was said from the Liberal Democrat Benches today has enlightened us about how to solve the problem of out-of-hours practice. It is important that we do, and it is in the interests of the patients. While guaranteeing the quality of their care, we must also lessen the burdens on the medical profession. That is the purpose of our policy, and I believe that, with good will, it will succeed.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 30 (Questions on amendments) and agreed to.

MADAM SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House notes that the Government has continued to meet the recommendations of the independent pay review body for general practitioners' pay, which is for a 24 hour commitment to their patients; welcomes the Government's constructive approach to addressing the profession's concerns, which includes an extra £45 million to support general practitioners' out of hours services, makes it possible for general practitioners to transfer responsibility for providing out of hours cover to another doctor and restructures payments so that the average general practitioner will receive an extra £800 per year for night visits; supports the approach of the Patient's Charter, which stresses to patients that with rights come responsibilities; and believes there is absolutely no case for general practitioners to take industrial action which would inevitably harm patient care.

Orders of the Day

Church of England (General Synod) (Measures)

10.13 pm

The Second Church Estates Commissioner, representing the Church Commissioners (Mr. Michael Alison): I beg to move,

That the Church of England (Miscellaneous Provisions) Measure, passed by the General Synod of the Church of England, be presented to Her Majesty for Her Royal Assent in the form in which the said Measure was laid before Parliament.

As the short title of the Measure indicates, it contains a miscellaneous collection of provisions relating to the Church of England. Their effect is described in the comments and explanations of the General Synod's legislative committee, which are annexed to the report of our own Ecclesiastical Committee. Hon. Members will have ready access to that report, if they do not have it before them now.

Two provisions in the Measure were the subject of special scrutiny in the Ecclesiastical Committee. Clause 2 permits Christ Church college, Oxford—which contains the cathedral of the Oxford diocese—through its constitution and statutes, to depart from earlier practice by acquiring the power to appoint up to two lay canons. The regius professorship of ecclesiastical history in the university of Oxford is annexed to a canonry in the cathedral, and the holder of that professorship must currently be a clerk in holy orders of the Church of England.

After discussion, the university and cathedral were both of the opinion that the present rules unduly restricted the range of candidates eligible for appointment as regius professor, requested the inclusion of clause 2 in the Measure. The Crown appoints the regius professor, but, obviously, only after taking soundings at Oxford. It has been consulted about the clause, and is content with it. The amendment had to be embodied in a clause in the Measure, because the changes have a bearing on the function to be performed by the regius professor and the residentiary canon of the cathedral.

Clause 6 amends the Church Commissioners Measure 1947, concerning the composition of the commission's assets committee. When the Measure was considered by the Ecclesiastical Committee, it became clear that the provision was regarded as premature by a majority of the Committee, in view of the recent report of the Select Committee on Social Security—under the chairmanship of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who is also Opposition spokesman on Church of England and Church Commission affairs—on Church Commission and Church of England pensions, and the impending report of the Archbishops' commission on the organisation of the Church of England, the so-called Turnbull commission.

In view of the misgivings expressed in the Committee, the Archbishops of Canterbury and York have said that they do not intend to exercise their power under clause 16 of the Measure to bring clause 6 into effect—clause 15 being an "appointed day" clause—pending consideration of the Social Security Select Committee's report, which has been studied closely, and the Turnbull report when it is available.

Against that background, the Ecclesiastical Committee has reported that the Measure is expedient, with—I am glad to say—the support, tacit or otherwise, of my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell). When the draft Measure was finally approved by the General Synod itself in November 1994, it was approved by 229 votes to one.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): This is a miscellaneous Measure, which contains issues of considerable importance. I hope that what we say tonight will prove to be relevant to the members of the Turnbull commission who, while they are at a late stage of their considerations, have not yet reported.

Is it proper for Parliament to be presented with this miscellaneous Measure when clause 6 makes such fundamental reforms to the assets of the Church Commissioners that the archbishops have promised that, if it is passed, they will not implement its provisions? That is hardly a sensible state of affairs, and it arises for the simple reason that, under the Church of England Assembly (Powers) Act 1919, the Ecclesiastical Committee and this House can only accept or reject—it cannot amend—Measures that come over from Synod.

Many members of Synod are hooked on the idea that, if the House begins to amend Measures, cries of Erastianism will be abroad. That is a total misreading of history, as there was an interlock between Church and state during the period in which the Church of England as we know it today was formed. There is surely a role for this place to say that, on reflection, part of the Measure might be withdrawn, but that we find the rest of it expedient. We are not allowed to do that at present. Either we reject the whole Measure, or we accept the whole Measure.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): The hon. Gentleman is making an enormously important point. My right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) said yesterday that a quarter of the population went to church on Christmas day. That must be a larger minority than almost any other minority whose affairs the House feels free to discuss.

Mr. Field: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I am hesitant to make these points, because they are read differently by members of Synod who look at our debates. They somehow manage to conjure up all sorts of conspiracies that they think are going on here. They cannot accept the most obvious point—that a large number of Members of this House are interested in what happens to the Church of England, are concerned about its future and want to contribute to that future. They consider that all sorts of plots are abroad.

Newman once made a marvellous point about the school of history which interpreted Lord Burleigh's nods. Instead of recording Lord Burleigh's nods, those involved would go into a rigmarole about why he nodded, why he nodded at that particular time and what was the significance of each nod. Newman dismissed that school of history by saying that it was irrelevant and that one had to judge people by other criteria. I hope that members of Synod judge the House of Commons' contribution by the spirit of our debates. Hon Members want to contribute to the well-being of the Church of England, either because they are members of the Church or because they believe that the prosperity of the country will be helped by its survival.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Could the hon. Gentleman share with the House why he feels that Synod has put the Measure before us as it is? Why has it not put forward only that part of the Measure that clearly has overwhelming support, and not the part about which there are rightly considerable reservations and upon which the Archbishops of Canterbury and York have stated that they have no intention of acting now?

Mr. Field: The answer to my hon. Friend, as I shall call him tonight, stems from the nature of the Measure and from the procedure that governs Synod. The deliberations of Synod were ambushed at a late stage. The wishes of the standing committee—the equivalent of a Government's Cabinet—and the archbishops were deliberately disregarded by a minority of Synod who wrote in this part of the Measure.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) was kind enough to say that, in a sense, Synod was holding back while others considered the impact of the Social Security Select Committee's report on the Church Commissioners' assets and pensions, but the big report for which the Church is waiting is that of the Turnbull commission, which is trying to consider carefully the structure of the Church and the changes that should be made, including changes to the structure of the Church Commissioners' organisation.

Anyone with an ounce of sense knows that one does not try to pass piecemeal reforms affecting the Church Commissioners while waiting for a major commission to report on the structure of all Church organisations, including the Church Commissioners.

Given the present procedure of Synod and the other clauses that should be implemented quickly, the only alternatives were either to do what my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby explained tonight—he told us that, if we passed the whole Measure, clause 6 would not be implemented—or to lose the rest of the Measure, many aspects of which contain necessary reforms that people want to be implemented quickly.

I hope, therefore, that we shall pass the Measure without a Division, but that the Turnbull commissioners will examine our procedures carefully. It is important that they make recommendations for changing the procedures of the 1919 Act because, for reasons that I explained earlier, our suggestions for reform would be misinterpreted.

I hope that the Turnbull commissioners will come to the conclusion that business could be expedited more effectively if the House had the chance, on occasion, to reject aspects of a Measure without endangering the rest of it. We should not then find the archbishops in the slightly absurd position, which has been explained tonight, of having to say, "Please pass the Measure, but like boy scouts we give you our promise not to implement clause 6." That is not a satisfactory way in which to undertake legislation.

I hope that the Turnbull commission is considering the sense behind grouping often major reforms under the guise of "miscellaneous Measures". Synod reads the House wrongly if it thinks that we shall not provide sufficient time to consider Measures. They do not have to be grouped. My right hon. Friend the Member for Selby, who always steers Church business through the House well, is never refused time to debate a Measure that he wants to put before the House, and the issues could be broken up into separate subject matter. I hope that the commission will consider that idea.

I hope that the commission will also consider the advisability of giving the House the right of veto, not according to our own wishes, but when the standing committee and the archbishops have said, "That amendment was carried against our wishes. We should like you to strike that aspect down, but to maintain the integrity of the rest of the Measure." That would improve our procedure and the way in which we look after and safeguard Church interests in the House.

As I have said, I hope that nobody will oppose the Measure simply because clause 6 is so unsatisfactory. There are other clauses that represent long overdue reforms—I believe that my right hon. Friend drew our attention to clause 2 in particular. I hope that we shall agree the Measure without a Division, but I also hope that the members of the Turnbull commission will prove themselves eminently more sensible than some members of Synod, who dislike our having a say over Church matters as we are doing tonight, and resent our having the power to approve or not to approve Measures.

I hope that we will be seen by the commission as friends who can improve Measures and who do not want in any way to overturn the enabling Act of 1919 or to put ourselves in the driving seat. We should be seen as a group of friends anxious for the well-being of the Church of England, either because we are members of it or because it is impossible to understand English history without understanding the role that the Church of England has played in our affairs. We know that, although there is increasing secularisation, many people look to the Church as being on their side and as their Church. That being so, they expect Parliament to be involved.

10.29 pm

Mr. William Powell (Corby): Not for the first time, it gives me real pleasure to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) on the way in which he introduced the Measure. I shall put him out of his misery: I do not propose to divide the House tonight.

I wish, however, to take this opportunity to protest about the Measure and some of its provisions. I do so because I feel that it is completely unnecessary. It is symptomatic of the way in which the Synod feels it has a duty to legislate, whether or not legislation is necessary or, indeed, urgent.

We were told during the Measure's consideration in the Ecclesiastical Committee that there is some urgency about it. The fact is, however, as the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) so clearly made plain, that one of the consequences of our passing the Measure would be to enact, after it has received Royal Assent, some thoroughly bad law that neither the majority of the Synod, during the early passage of the Measure, nor the archbishops of Canterbury and York regard as necessary or desirable.

The House, alas, has become all too used to passing bad law. I can certainly recall one occasion during the past decade on which the Government felt it necessary to make a similar announcement to that which the archbishops of Canterbury and York have made. The Government said that they would not bring into operation a particular section of a statute, which was then before the House and was going through its last stages, because they felt that it was easier not to do so than to ask the House to reject it altogether.

I want to take this opportunity to protest also about clause 2(3). The hon. Member for Birkenhead says that it is necessary and overdue, but I could not disagree more. Its effect would be to provide in future that the regius professor of ecclesiastical history of Oxford need no longer be an ordained clergyman of the Church of England—as Mr. Thwackham would have said, by law established. With that position has gone a canonry in the cathedral church of Christ at Oxford—Christ Church. Christ Church is at the very heart and centre of the university of Oxford, and although I have no particular affection for that institution, I have to say that I regard the traditional ties of the ancient universities with the Crown and the Church as necessary and worth preserving.

Those of us in the Commonwealth who listen each year to the annual service of nine lessons and carols from King's college in Cambridge will recall that the bidding prayer mentions the two royal and religious foundations of King Henry VI, here and at Eton. I regard those royal and religious foundations as of lasting importance, and in no way should the traditional ties between the Crown, the Church and our ancient universities be lessened.

I also regard the position of professor of ecclesiastical history—particularly a Crown appointment, the regius professorship—as a very important chair in the university. It has been held down the years by some very distinguished men, including men who have gone on to be bishops in the Church of England—not least, of course, the great Bishop Stubbs, the famous ecclesiastical historian whose charters some of us were privileged to study when we were rather younger than we are today.

Cambridge has a chair of ecclesiastical history—the Dixie chair. The holding of that chair is not confined to ordained clergymen of the Church of England. I regard it as very important that the Church of England has within its ranks a large number of scholars, not merely of divinity and the ancient languages, but of ecclesiastical history.

To eliminate the requirement that the holder of the chair be an ordained member of the Church of England is retrograde and unnecessary. It was vaguely suggested to us that the number of candidates for any forthcoming appointments might not be sufficiently large—a contention that I reject as incorrect, but also, in principle, entirely wrong. Clergymen of the Church of England should be encouraged to be scholars of the history of our Church, which, as the hon. Member for Birkenhead suggested, has played a central part in the development of this nation over the centuries.

This morning, I was reading from a volume that I hope hon. Members will consider taking with them on their summer holidays during the long recess—"Retrospect on an unimportant life", by Bishop Hensley Henson. It is a remarkable, thoroughly readable and scholarly document of memoirs, which contain some of the most caustic comments about those with whom Bishop Hensley Henson—one of the most outstanding ecclesiastics of the 20th century—served his academic and episcopal life.

Bishop Hensley Henson was chaplain to the Speaker. He was a canon of Westminster and vicar of St. Margaret's church. When he was vicar of that church in 1908, the Prime Minister, Mr. Asquith, wrote to him offering him the regius chair of ecclesiastical history. Bishop Hensley Henson, as he became, felt that he was not up to the task and made a counter-recommendation to the Prime Minister, which, alas, was rejected.

I say that because, although I do not wish to bring blushes to his cheeks, the Speaker's Chaplain is one of the people who is qualified to occupy that chair. He is an ecclesiastical chaplain of considerable distinction and, although his tenure were he to be appointed might be more limited than some of the holders of the post, he would hold it with at least as great a distinction.

My point is important. It is vital that the Church of England is aware of, and remains deeply committed to, its history and its heritage. If we say that the holder of the most important chair in ecclesiastical history in this country should no longer be an ordained member of the Church of England, he could be a member of the Roman Catholic Church or of the nonconformist Churches.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): My hon. Friend said that the Measure provides that the holder of the chair must not be a member of the Church of England. Surely it is proposed that the range of choice be widened, but that it would be perfectly in order for the successful candidate to be a member of the Church of England and, indeed, to be the Speaker's Chaplain.

Mr. Powell: Not as Speaker's Chaplain, of course. If I said that that would no longer be in order, that would not be the correct way of formulating it. The Measure says that the regius professor need no longer be an ordained clergyman of the Church of England or an ordained member of that Church. I am protesting about the signal that that sends out.

I want ecclesiastical historians as clergymen and scholars in the Church of England, and I want them to hold prominent roles within the Church of England itself. There always used to be at least one outstanding scholar of ecclesiastical history on the Bench of Bishops. The last one to hold that post was Bishop Moorman, the Bishop of Ripon. It is now some 20 years or so since his retirement and there has been no one of anything like his scholarly distinction since, or indeed, judging from the Church of England today, is that at all likely or in prospect. I regard that as undesirable, and I believe that there should be incentives for scholarly men who are ordained to hold major professorships at the university of Oxford.

To people who say that, of course, there are those who are not members of the Church of England but who are qualified, I can but mention the Dixie professorship at Cambridge. That has been held with great distinction by Professor Rupp, who was a nonconformist. It can, of course, be held by others, but I do not see the need to break a link that goes back hundreds of years, which has been valuable and important to the history of our Church—and, therefore, to the history of our nation—and which has been held by some outstanding people. Too often, we dispose of the old links, and do so in a way that I regard as unfortunate. Often, such moves are rushed, and I take this opportunity to protest that the Measure was unnecessary.

A professor of ecclesiastical history would be able to be promoted beyond that position in due course. As I have said, it is necessary that those on the Bench of Bishops in the House of Lords are scholars of the history of our Church. Of course, their main function is to attend the House of Lords, support the Government of the day and preach improving sermons, especially before Parliament on occasions of national importance such as the delivery from the gunpowder plot.

It is necessary that those on the Bench of Bishops recall the history of our Church and do so by remembering that the Church of England is in danger, as it always has been. It is necessary that they are also able to preach about the great sermon delivered before the Lord Mayor by Dr. Sacheverall, which reminded the nation that the Church was always in danger and remains so. Too often, such matters are overlooked and forgotten, and I regard that as highly undesirable.

We are passing into law a Measure that is another retreat from the traditional position of the Church of England. That is a wholly undesirable development. Although I shall allow the Measure to be passed without a Division, I take this opportunity to protest.

Mr. Alison: With the permission of the House, I shall speak a second time. In doing so, I am conscious of the fact that the hon. Member for Easington (Mr. Cummings) is having to be on duty this evening and is not necessarily very much in sympathy with Church of England affairs keeping the House up too late. I shall therefore do my best to be brief. I concede, however, that the hon. Gentleman was helpful in his earlier interchanges with me about Church Commission housing in Easington. If there is anything that we can continue to do to help him, I shall be glad to do it.

The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who spoke for the Opposition, kindly told me that he would have to leave early. I shall in his absence make a quick response to the points that he made, and he will no doubt take note of them through the Official Report. I take seriously his criticisms of the offending clause 6, to which he specifically referred. Indeed, I was party to the device by which its effective non-implementation was secured—the archbishops undertook not to implement it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) offered trenchant criticisms of the procedures of Christ Church, Oxford. The fact is that such a Measure is not likely to come before the House again precisely for the reasons given by the hon. Member for Birkenhead—the gestation and birth of some fundamental proposals for reform along the lines that would appeal to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton). The so-called Turnbull committee will examine the relationship between the General Synod and Parliament and questions such as whether we should have more of an opportunity to make amendments. Such proposals are being made, and I hope that some of the misgivings expressed this evening will themselves be the subject of reform.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Corby will be interested to know that I am advised that Lord Bridge of Harwich, an early chairman of the Ecclesiastical Committee, is chairing the synodical government review, which is looking at the Measure procedure. At least he knows from his experience of chairing the Ecclesiastical Committee how frustrated we have been in the past. At least he knows the kind of anxieties that Parliament has about the Measures.

I do not think that the strictures of my hon. Friend the Member for Corby about the changes proposed for Christ Church would command universal support or assent in the House. I suspect, for example, that there are colleagues who feel that England may have invented cricket, football and rugger, which we did—

Mr. William Powell: Or regius professorships.

Mr. Alison: And clerically ordained regius professorships—but that the fact that Wimbledon was won by an American combating a German, that the All Blacks have proved to be extraordinary rugger players and that England does not always win the World cup has enriched those games.

Let us therefore enjoy the extra richness that will come to the university of Oxford by the throwing open of the regius professorship, as happens at Cambridge, to members of other Churches with other status. It is, after all, a competitive environment in the university world nowadays and it is precisely because Cambridge is able to appoint a Professor Rupp that Oxford is feeling a cold draught and feels that it should be enabled to develop its scope and range of appointments more widely. I hope that there will at least be some sympathy with the "Oxford" approach, if not with the "Corby" approach.

With relief that neither my hon. Friend the Member for Corby nor the hon. Member for Birkenhead—nor, I hope, the hon. Member for Easington—will seek to divide the House, I hope that the Measure will be passed.

Mr. Peter Brooke (City of London and Westminster, South): Because my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) spoke on historical matters, I would make a minor plea to him. He might have a look at the text of his speech. The report of his rendering to the Ecclesiastical Committee reveals that, whenever he mentioned a proper name, there is a question mark after it, as though the writer was not absolutely certain of whom he was speaking. Bishop Moorman is a notable exception to that observation. In at least one case I believe that the writer has spelt the name wrong, although I do not blame him or her for that.

In the interests of historical accuracy, given that these matters will be read by PhD students in 200 years time, it would be helpful if my hon. Friend would supervise the record taken in Hansard tonight.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the Church of England (Miscellaneous Provisions) Measure, passed by the General Synod of the Church of England, be presented to Her Majesty for Her Royal Assent in the form in which the said Measure was laid before Parliament.

Haemophiliacs (Hepatitis C)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

10.47 pm

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): There is always a risk with an Adjournment debate held at this hour that the attendance does not reflect the support for a particular point of view. I can assure my hon. Friend the Minister that the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth), my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Sir T. Higgins) would have been here if they could have been. Early-day motion 1219, which relates to this issue, has attracted 230 signatures.

I pay tribute to the Haemophilia Society—whose chairman, Rev. Alan Tanner, is a constituent of mine—which does so much for sufferers from haemophilia. I also pay tribute to the dedicated staff of the haemophilia centres around the country, who seek to treat those suffering from that disease, and particularly the staff of the centre at the Royal Free, which treats a number of sufferers from my constituency.

I have a sense of deja vu because, on 15 October 1990, I instigated another Adjournment debate on the plight of haemophiliacs who had been infected with HIV. The Minister who answered on that occasion was none other than my right hon. Friend the present Secretary of State for Health, then Under-Secretary of State. He said:

"The judge's argument is based on the proposition that the Government have a moral obligation to the victims in this case. The Government accept that moral obligation"—[Official Report, 15 October 1990; Vol. 177, c. 1033.]

Within a few weeks of that speech, the Prime Minister, in answer to a question of mine at Prime Minister's Question Time, announced that the Government were to give an ex gratia payment to haemophiliacs infected with HIV. The Secretary of State for Health who persuaded the Government to do that was none other than our right hon. Friend the present Chief Secretary to the Treasury. I therefore suggest to my hon. Friend the Minister that his career has a chance of going right into the stratosphere if he can reveal a generous scheme today. He certainly deserves that boost as he was a first-class pairing Whip—the definition of a first-class pairing Whip being one who gives people a night off occasionally.

It is right to remind the House of the sequence of events in the 1970s and early 1980s. In 1974, the Medical Research Council, worried about the spread of hepatitis through infected blood, recommended that the United Kingdom should become self-sufficient in blood products. In other countries, individuals sell their blood, and among those who do so are drug addicts and others who are the origin of risk.

In 1975 Lord Owen, then Minister of Health, said that Britain would become self-sufficient in blood in two to three years. It is a chilling indictment of the locust years of the late 1970s that, if that promise had been kept, this debate would not need to be held and some of those who have died would be alive today.

There was a history of warnings in the early 1980s, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith) would confirm from his wife's specialist knowledge of that issue. The first death of a haemophiliac as a result of infected blood products took place in January 1982 in Florida. In July 1982, the director of disease control in Atlanta published the first warning. There was a further warning in 1983 in The Lancet, but it was not until April 1985 that the NHS heat-treated factor VIII became available—10 years after the pledge by Lord Owen.

In January 1995, my hon. Friend the Minister announced a look-back exercise to try to find out how many people had been infected with hepatitis C. It is not yet known exactly how many people were infected with hepatitis C as a result of receiving infected blood products and infected blood, but it is obvious that about 3,000 haemophiliacs have been infected with hepatitis C and some of them have also been infected with HIV.

Although the position of those infected with hepatitis C is not the same as that of those infected with HIV, the parallels are close. It is wrong to ignore the financial plight of the latest batch of victims. The cause of infection is the same in both cases—infected blood products administered through the NHS. The consequences for many will be the same. For many, although obviously not for all, hepatitis will be just as sure a sentence of death as HIV.

The economic difficulties will be similar. Life insurance will be expensive, if not prohibitive, and mortgages will be difficult. The emotional problems will be the same. The incidence of hepatitis C varies with individuals and the timing of complications varies over a substantial period. We know, however, that, of the 3,000 haemophiliacs who have been infected with hepatitis C, about 600 will develop cirrhosis of the liver. When that happens, their chances of survival will be slim.

Whenever we debate such an issue, the Treasury talks about cost. If the onset of cirrhosis of the liver were to be the trigger for payments similar to those given to individuals infected with HIV, payments would be spread over a number of years and we would not face a huge bunching of payments in, for example, the current financial year.

The circumstances of those infected with hepatitis C vary greatly. Many will live for many years. Some—perhaps 25 per cent.—may be cured completely through interferon alpha. Others, however, will die, and already more than 50 have done so.

The current position is illogical. There was a family of three brothers: two died through having HIV and were, of course, compensated; the third, who died because he had been infected with hepatitis C, received no payment. How can one say to the mother of those three sons, "Your three sons have all died prematurely due to treatment received through the NHS. The two who died in one particularly unpleasant way were compensated, but the third, who also died in an unpleasant way for a similar reason, received no compensation whatever." The mother believes that the third son should receive not a penny more, but not a penny less, either.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I am grateful to my hon. Friend, because I entirely sympathise with the case that he is putting to the Minister. Am I not right in saying that the House has a moral duty to represent these people who, through no fault of their own, have been infected with hepatitis C? Am I not also right in saying that, overwhelmingly, the people of this country—as they did in the case of those infected with HIV—would be only too happy for the House, which represents the people and which has a moral duty, to provide compensation for those people who through no fault of their own have contracted what is, in some cases, a killer disease?

Mr. Marshall: Having served under my hon. Friend on the Mental Health (Patients in the Community) Bill, it is a pleasure to agree with him again, as I did so frequently during the passage of that Bill.

We are in a position that most people would regard as illogical and immoral. It has been claimed that haemophiliacs who become infected with hepatitis C would have died if they had not had the benefit of factor VIII. That is not so: factor VIII was designed to enhance the quality of life—it was not a life-saving treatment.

The Macfarlane trust has administered the scheme for haemophiliacs infected with HIV with care, dedication and skill. When the Government decide to give payments to those infected with hepatitis C, they should use the well established machinery of the Macfarlane trust rather than create a new body to do so.

Of course, we shall be told by my hon. Friend the Minister—if we are not told by him, he will certainly be told by the Treasury—that there is a risk of setting a precedent. That is what we were told in 1990. We were told that we would open the floodgates if we allowed haemophiliacs who suffered from HIV to be compensated. What happened was that, after much effort, another group were compensated—from memory I believe that there were fewer than 100 people—who were non-haemophiliacs and who had also been infected with HIV. Clotting factor concentrates have been heat-treated since 1986 and blood has been screened for HIV since 1991. I therefore do not believe that, if we concede this fair and right case, there will be a flood of cases thereafter.

It is always the weakest of weak arguments to say that something cannot be done because it creates a precedent. If patriotism is the last resort of a scoundrel, the argument about precedent is surely the last resort of mean-minded scoundrels in the Treasury. We have to ask ourselves whether there is a problem and whether that problem is the responsibility of the individuals concerned. The Government must not act like the Pharisee of old; they must help those people who are in an unfortunate position through no fault of their own.

In April 1995, the chief medical officer sent a circular to doctors about the treatment of hepatitis C, in which he stated:

> "Interferon alpha is the only licensed therapy for chronic hepatitis C".

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will accept that the drug is successful in only a minority of cases. After three months of treatment, 50 per cent. of patients will have responded to the treatment and, of that 50 per cent., only 50 per cent. will be cured after 15 months of treatment. Interferon alpha can successfully treat 25 per cent.—one in four—of the individuals infected with hepatitis C.

It is also true that the earlier the treatment is applied, the more likely it is to be successful. I was upset to learn from the Haemophilia Society this morning that some haemophilia centres do not have sufficient supplies of interferon alpha to treat all those who need treatment. That seems quite wrong. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister can assure us that there will be no shortage of interferon alpha at haemophilia centres and that the Government will provide central funding if that proves necessary. While interferon alpha is expensive initially, it will allow one in four of those infected with hepatitis C to lead a full, healthy and active life. It is a much less expensive treatment than a liver transplant or vaccinating infants against hepatitis C.

In the late 1980s, some viewed the issue as a legal matter; others said that it was a clinical matter and that the individuals concerned had received the best possible clinical treatment. I do not believe that it is a legal or a clinical issue: I believe that it is essentially a moral issue. I think that the majority of British people believe that those who receive unfortunate treatment and who become critically ill and, in some cases, economically inactive through no fault of their own should be compensated.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tom Sackville): I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) that the relatively small number of hon. Members present in the Chamber does not indicate any lack of concern about the subject—a concern that I share.

My ministerial colleagues and I have great sympathy for those patients who may have become infected with hepatitis C through blood transfusions or blood products, as we do for anyone who is inadvertently harmed through medical treatment. Despite the recent well-publicised problems with allegedly defective equipment in the blood transfusion service, this country's record of blood safety is among the best in the world.

The debate reminds us that, alongside the great benefits to patients, medical procedures rarely come without some risk. It is important to remember that it is not always possible fully to appreciate the risk at the time or to avoid suspected or known risks. In the case of each individual patient, a balance must be struck between the benefit to be gained versus any possible risk.

Let us look at the facts of hepatitis C. Most haemophilia patients infected with hepatitis C were so infected before blood products were treated to destroy viruses in 1985. That was well before the first hepatitis C tests were available in 1989. Those patients received the best treatment available in the light of medical knowledge at the time. When those patients were infected, little was known about hepatitis C, or non-A, non-B hepatitis as it was then known, and even today a lot more information is needed.

The House will be well aware that, notwithstanding the subject of the debate, the availability of factor VIII concentrate has brought great benefits to patients with haemophilia. Previously, only about 5 per cent. of patients with severe haemophilia reached the age of 40, whereas by 1980 the life expectancy was very close to that of normal males. There was less need for long periods of hospitalisation and boys had a better chance of achieving a reasonable education. Additionally, the convenience of patients being able to keep concentrate in a domestic fridge and treat themselves at the first sign of a bleed meant a considerable reduction in long-term disability.

Before there was any test for non-A, non-B hepatitis, the only way to safeguard blood was to limit those from whom blood was taken by a system of self-deferral. It excluded, among others, those known to be suffering from hepatitis or any other liver disease; drug misusers; and men who were sexually active with other men.

No one should underestimate the effects of hepatitis C. The point that I am making, and this is at the heart of the debate, is that, contrary to views that have already been expressed in another place, patients who tragically contracted HIV through NHS treatment were in a different category. Their exceptional circumstances caused us to make special provision for them.

Many people infected with hepatitis C, as has already been said by my hon. Friend, may live for a long period without any symptoms appearing. However, 50 per cent. of sufferers may progress to chronic hepatitis with varying degrees of good or ill health. Perhaps 20 per cent. of infected patients will develop cirrhosis, a progressive destruction of the liver that may take 20 to 30 years. The majority of those years will be trouble-free in terms of ill health and, as I have mentioned, only a small proportion will die of liver disease, but every death is a tragedy for the family concerned.

In the case of those who contracted HIV through NHS treatment, special payments were made and trusts established to help sufferers or their families in cases of hardship. Those arrangements were put in place in recognition of the very special circumstances of those who contracted HIV. Those affected were all expected to die very shortly, although it has since become clear that, fortunately, that is not always the case. It meant that there might also be significant numbers of young children who had lost one parent or perhaps both if the disease had been transmitted also to their partner.

Sufferers were also subjected to stigmatism and a whole range of other social problems. There were cases of doors daubed with graffiti, lost jobs and children not allowed to mix with other children at school—in short, people were denied any normal family life.

I would in no way wish to minimise the physical suffering of those who have been infected with hepatitis C through blood or blood products—the suffering which may result or the worry which they or their family may experience—but each case has to be examined on its merits. I have to recognise that those who have contracted hepatitis C are not also subject to all the additional problems experienced by HIV sufferers, who were accepted as being a very special case.

Many people infected with hepatitis C may live for a long period without any symptoms appearing or may never experience any. In any case, some people would argue that although individuals were infected in different ways, they are entitled to payments—even though no fault on the part of the NHS was proved. The Government have never accepted the case for a no-fault scheme of compensation for medical accidents. There are sound reasons. Proof of causation would still be needed. It may be just as difficult to establish that medical treatment has caused injury as to prove that someone has been negligent. It also has to be demonstrated that the outcome was not a foreseeable and reasonable result of treatment.

It would be unfair to others if individuals whose plight was the result of a medical accident would be compensated, whereas those whose condition stemmed, for instance, from disease from birth would not. Health negligence is not considered fundamentally different from negligence in other walks of life, where claims for compensation are resolved through the courts.

The experience of other countries that have tried to follow the compensation path has strengthened the Government's view. The costs of the New Zealand scheme have proved extremely high—some 1 per cent. of gross domestic product, which is equivalent to £6 billion in the United Kingdom. In addition to practical difficulties, that scheme effectively denies access to the courts.

I understand that payments under Sweden's no-fault compensation scheme are much lower, but the authorities have found it necessary to make additional payments to individuals infected with HIV. I am not aware of any country in Europe that has made payments to patients with haemophilia infected with hepatitis C through blood products.

Every individual case in which a medical accident has occurred is a personal tragedy for the individual and his or her family. If the NHS is proved negligent in a court, of course the service accepts its liability to pay damages. It remains the Government's view that the most effective use of available resources is to seek to improve the understanding, management and treatment of the condition. Only in that way can the disease's impact on individual patients and their families be effectively minimised.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): My hon. Friend said that one way of trying to meet the problem is to improve treatment. My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) told the House that some patients are not receiving supplies of interferon alpha. We know that medication is not cheap but it offers relief—and in some cases a cure. Can my hon. Friend assure the House that the cost of supplying interferon alpha will be born by the Government, so that affected patients can be properly treated?

Mr. Sackville: I was about to assure the House that I will investigate the issue of medication supplies raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South to see what can be done to ensure that the treatment promised is provided.

The Department is already supporting an initiative by the Haemophilia Society to undertake a study of the best way to support those of its members who are infected with hepatitis C. The Department has made available substantial funding in 1995 and 1996, with a commitment to further funding over a number of years. We are also discussing with haemophilia centres what must be done to ensure good practice in the treatment of people with haemophilia who also have hepatitis C.

If I may, I shall summarise what I have said. On behalf of the Government, I would like to express the greatest sympathy for those who have contracted hepatitis C through NHS treatment. We are taking a number of measures designed to enable them to receive the best possible advice and treatment. But it remains the Government's view that, in the absence of proven negligence on the part of the NHS, there is no case for using moneys which would otherwise be used for the care and treatment of other NHS patients to make special payments to those affected.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fourteen minutes past Eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Intensive Care (London)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Burns.]

10.4 am

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): First, I thank you, Madam Speaker, for the opportunity to have this debate, and the manner in which you responded to my application.

Just before 11 pm on 6 March, the London ambulance service was called to an incident in Orpington, where the ambulance crew found my constituent, Mr. Malcolm Murray, lying unconscious with severe head injuries. He was admitted immediately to Queen Mary's hospital, Sidcup, which lies within the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath).

The senior house officer, an experienced and able clinician, concluded that the patient needed neurosurgery, and efforts were immediately initiated to find an intensive care bed where he could receive such treatment. None could be located in the London area, so the search was extended further afield, and eventually Leeds general infirmary agreed to accept the patient. Speed in transferring him was of the essence, but the London helicopter medical service does not operate at night, so the Royal Air Force was called in. It picked up Mr. Murray from Queen Mary's by helicopter at 6.30 am, and he arrived at Leeds at 8.15 am. Sadly, the patient did not survive.

Medical opinion is that it is most unlikely that any treatment, wherever it was given, could have saved Mr. Murray, but the incident attracted nationwide comment and concern. Naturally, the concern was particularly strong in the neighbourhood in which Mr. Murray lived. The incident in which he suffered the injury has led to a man being charged with murder. It is not difficult to imagine how the tragedy has affected his girl friend, Teresa Davy, and his many friends, and their distress was compounded by the difficulty in securing proper treatment for him. Ms Davy and others mounted a campaign and drew up a petition that attracted more than 4,000 signatures. She came to see me at my advice bureau expressing determination that action should be taken to prevent a repetition of those events.

Miss Davy's reactions and those of others in my constituency and further afield were fully justified. We are all entitled to expect that, should we suffer sudden illness or accident and need intensive care, we shall get it.

In the aftermath of the incident, inquiries into it and its implications were set up by both the regional health authority and Queen Mary's hospital trust. On 23 March, the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Austin-Walker) initiated a brief Adjournment debate on neurosurgery, in the course of which he referred to this case. But at that stage, full details were not known, and the reports had not yet been published. A few days later, they were, and they made various recommendations and raised a number of issues, referring mainly to the availability of facilities.

Both reports speak well of the care that Mr. Murray received at Queen Mary's hospital and of the staff there, with one exception. They are unfairly critical of the consultant orthopaedic surgeon, Mr. Anthony Percy, who also happens to be my constituent. Mr. Percy's treatment is an aspect of the case about which I know my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup feels particularly strongly. I shall confine myself to saying that statements made by the region and the trust, and comments in the media, about Mr. Percy were, in my view, grossly unfair, and have damaged his clinical reputation. I hope that the Minister will take this opportunity of putting the record straight.

One matter that obviously needs clarification is exactly how many intensive care beds there are in London—by which I mean broadly that area within the M25. Following an exchange on the radio with the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), in which he claimed that the number of intensive care beds in London had decreased in recent years and I said that they had increased, I tabled a parliamentary question and had an exchange of letters with my hon. Friend the Minister, whom I am glad to see in his place to respond to the debate.

This is not an issue on which we should seek to score party points with regard to statistics, but perhaps we might have clarification as to how many intensive care beds there are in London, as distinct from North Thames and South Thames regions, which cover a far wider area.

Having established that figure, I would then ask whether it shows that there is an adequate number of intensive care beds, and what formula is used for calculating how many are needed. Since March, there have been other similar cases of patients being transferred out of London, which certainly does not suggest that we have a surplus of intensive care beds.

A few weeks ago, I initiated a Wednesday morning debate on the future of Guy's hospital. I shall not rehearse that today, but I draw attention to the fact that Philip Harris house at the hospital has been planned and equipped, among other things, to accommodate 15 intensive care beds. Surely, far from now planning to use those spaces for other purposes, they should be brought into use as soon as possible.

The issues include not only the number but the type of beds. Not all intensive care beds are the same with regard to the equipment adjacent to them or the staff to service them.

Any one of us or our constituents might at any time suffer a heart attack, and the chances are that whatever hospital we were taken into in the London area would be able to treat that condition. However, if, for example, we were involved in a road accident and suffered head injuries necessitating neurosurgery, that would not necessarily be the case. Only a handful of hospitals can offer that treatment. Although, in theory, sufficient beds should be available to meet those likely needs, obviously there is a question whether there are sufficient. The Malcolm Murray case suggests that there are not.

[Mr. Roger Sims]

The Department of Health is not short of advice on that matter. A report by the Society of British Neurological Surgeons published in February 1993 recommended that four neurosurgical intensive care beds should be available per million of the population. At present, in the whole of South Thames, there are nine beds for a population of 7 million—little more than one per million. The Brook general hospital, which has a catchment area of more than 3 million, had two intensive care beds.

I say "had", because the Brook unit has closed. The King's/Maudsley neuroscience centre is currently running at 40 beds short, as the new Ruskin wing has not yet been commissioned, and, although the surgeons from the Brook have been transferred to King's, they have yet to be allocated secretaries or operating space.

Commenting on his report on the Malcolm Murray incident, the chairman of the South Thames regional health authority said on television that there was no shortage of neurosurgical intensive care beds in London. Who is right—he or the surgeons? Does the Minister accept the Society of British Neurological Surgeons' report, and does he intend to take steps to implement its recommendations?

I have dwelt on neurosurgery, because it is so important, but similar considerations apply to other specialties. I ask again: is there any formula to decide how many intensive care beds we should have in London and the different types of beds there should be, and any policy as to where they should be situated?

Another general issue is how many intensive care beds should be used for routine surgery, and how many earmarked for emergency. I realise that there is a difficult balance to be struck in maintaining empty beds, and staff for them, at considerable cost for emergencies that may not arise, when the beds might be used for elective surgery such as bypass operations. Does the Department issue any guidelines on that?

I also suggest that there should be some clarity on where authority lies when hospital staff seek intensive care beds. In their report, the regional health authorities say:

"In the Panel's view, greater senior clinical advice and direct involvement at Queen Mary's may well have been successful in securing a more flexible response from the hospitals contacted, notwithstanding the pressures they were experiencing."

That, of course, implies criticism of Mr. Percy, whom I have mentioned, and were the grounds on which he was censured. Indeed, in his covering letter to the Secretary of State, the chairman of the regional authority wrote:

"The direct involvement of the senior clinician in obtaining a referral would have made a significant difference".

In fact, in subsequent correspondence with Mr. Percy, the trust has accepted that finding beds is a management responsibility.

In any case, if a clinician is considered sufficiently qualified and experienced to be in charge of a hospital accident and emergency department, surely his judgment should be accepted, regardless of his status in the hospital hierarchy. Indeed, paragraph 6 of the hospital's report says:

"The clinical acceptance of referred patients should not depend upon the seniority of the referring clinicians".

That surely must be right, and I hope that the Minister can confirm that.

An extraordinary feature of that case was the amount of time that staff at the hospital had to spend simply trying to locate a bed. The conclusion that Mr. Murray needed a neurosurgery bed was reached just after midnight, and the hospital's report comments:

"Chasing beds and securing transfer arrangements continued until 05.00 hours. That should not have been necessary and is unacceptable. The lack of any central reference point under such circumstances is a case for extreme concern."

To that we should all surely say, "Hear, hear," and it appears extraordinary that, when we now have so much sophisticated technology available to us, the only way that staff could find out if there was an empty bed was to telephone hospitals one by one.

The first recommendation in the region's report reads:

"A register of intensive care beds availability across the Thames Regions should result in easier and better communication of bed availability. Work on this has already started and the register will be introduced in mid-April. The register will be able to be sourced by telephone and will be updated twice a day."

Can the Minister confirm that that system is now in place, and, if so, is it operating effectively?

Finally, can my hon. Friend confirm that the procedures to be followed in such cases as that have been clarified? Another of the region's recommendations was:

"Commissioners must ensure that hospitals have and follow agreed intensive care bed management procedures and their initial review should be completed within three months."

That recommendation was made on 28 March, so the three months has now elapsed, and I hope that the reviews have been completed.

I hope that, in the course of the debate, the matter of the unwarranted criticism of my constituent Mr. Tony Percy will be resolved and that he will be cleared of the charges made against him.

Miss Davy and her friends were determined that whatever happened in the case of Malcolm Murray should not be allowed to happen again. I believe that they were perfectly entitled to make that demand. I hope that the Minister will give the assurances that they, and I, seek when he replies to the debate.

10.19 am

Mr. John Austin-Walker (Woolwich): I am sure that Labour Members would endorse all that the hon. Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) has said. I share his views about the medical staff at Queen Mary's hospital, Sidcup, and I wish to be associated with his remarks in that regard.

I will not dwell upon the specific circumstances of the Malcolm Murray case and the events of that tragic night, because I dealt with it in the earlier debate to which the hon. Gentleman referred. The hon. Gentleman also set out those circumstances very clearly this morning.

However, I remind the House and the Minister of the tragic death of Roberta Gerardo on new year's day. I have nothing but praise for the medical and nursing staff at the North Middlesex hospital, but there was an eight-hour delay in finding an intensive care bed for that mother of two. There were telephone calls to hospitals as far away as Cambridge in an attempt to find a bed. One was eventually located 20 miles away in Hemel Hempstead, but, sadly, the case of Roberta Gerardo had the same tragic ending as that of Malcolm Murray.

The recent report of the Health Select Committee found that, for a number of years, the former Secretary of State had ignored all the signs of a crisis in the London ambulance service. The Select Committee said that, if the political will had existed, the crisis could have been averted. I draw the Minister's attention to the existing crisis in the provision of intensive care facilities, not just in Greater London but, as the hon. Member for Chislehurst said, in the area within the boundaries of the M25.

There is sufficient evidence to show that it is not just a matter of an occasional crisis, such as the cases of Roberta Gerardo and Malcolm Murray. Night after night, hospital staff throughout the capital and beyond spend hours on the telephone trying to find appropriate facilities for patients whose lives are at risk.

The former Secretary of State accused Labour Members of being obsessed with the issue of hospital beds. But every time we asked the former Secretary of State and the Department of Health about the availability of beds and about hospital closures since 1979, she replied that the Department did not know. The Department of Health does not know how many beds have been lost, and it does not know how many hospitals have closed. The Department of Health does not collect details of the number of existing hospitals, let alone details of hospital closures.

Fortunately, the Library of the House of Commons has produced figures about the number of hospital beds available in London. I do not think that we can divorce the provision of acute services and acute beds from the crisis in the provision of intensive care facilities.

The Library data show that, between 1979 and 1993-94, the number of national health service beds in Greater London fell by 49 per cent., and the number of acute beds by 45 per cent. I know that the new Secretary of State has said that he does not intend to revisit the decisions of the former Secretary of State, but I urge him to re-examine the basis of the decisions to rationalise hospital services and to close beds in London.

We know that the Government are still pursuing the Tomlinson agenda. A recent survey showed that, in order to reach the Tomlinson targets and equalise with the rest of the country, 400 beds had to be lost in 1992-93. In fact, 1,499 beds were lost in that year.

The crisis goes across all emergency services. Hospital staff and consultants who provide acute care are spending inordinate amounts of time on the telephone trying to find beds, and we know that the same crisis exists in the mental health and psychiatric spheres. In my constituency, which has a bed occupancy rate of 120 per cent., patients must often be transported to facilities as far away as Oxford.

The calculation of the number of beds required in London is based upon the Tomlinson report and the subsequent report of the King's Fund. The Secretary of State must also examine the later report of the King's Fund entitled "London—the Key Facts", which was published in April 1994. It stated:

"The Capital's health care needs have been underestimated. There are now good reasons for believing that London merits a larger—not smaller—share of the NHS cake".

Unless London receives an additional share of the cake, I do not believe that it can begin to address the acute needs of its communities and the problem of the shortfall in intensive care provision without damaging other areas of the health service. The King's Fund estimates that London needs an extra £200 million. If the York formula of resource allocation had not been tampered with, it is likely that London would have received those funds already. However, the Government have adapted resource allocation which distorts the formula and takes resources away from areas of social need, such as London.

The hon. Member for Chislehurst referred to the closure of the Brook hospital—the hospital that should have taken Malcolm Murray but which did not have a bed available on that evening. As the hon. Gentleman said, the hospital is now closed. Service planners in the South Thames region say that a neuroscience unit requires five or six intensive care beds. At the time of Malcolm Murray's death, the King's site had two intensive care beds and the Brook had three.

It has now been decided to relocate the Brook unit to King's hospital. The services which are provided for the people of south-east London and north Kent—the area represented by the hon. Member for Chislehurst and the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath)—have been relocated in inner London. That area is close to the M2, the M20 and the M25, and the high incidence of road traffic accidents may result in the need for intensive care and neurosurgery services. It makes no sense to relocate those very important services further away from the area they are intended to serve and closer to central London.

The situation is the same north of the river in east London. The neuroscience facilities at Oldchurch hospital may be transferred to the Royal in inner London. For years, a threat has been hanging over St. George's trust and the world-renowned Atkinson-Morley hospital in south-west London. Moving specialist units and the intensive care facilities that go with them further into central London seems to fly in the face of the Government's original aim to move services out of the centre of London.

Although, in some ways, inner London may be over-supplied with acute services, the same is not true of Greater London as a whole and those constituencies on the periphery of London. It seems strange that the current practice should fly in the face of the Government's professed policy of allowing services to follow the patients. We now find patients chasing scarce resources and scarce beds.

No one has adequately explained to me or to my local community health council why the former Secretary of State took the decision to shoehorn the services at the Brook hospital into the King's Maudsley. The former Secretary of State ignored the fears, concerns and dissatisfaction expressed not only by my constituents but also by consultants involved in service provision.

The hon. Member for Chislehurst referred to the way in which the services have been shoehorned into the unit at King's with 44 Maudsley neurology beds, without easy access to medicine, surgery or intensive care.

The Secretary of State says that proximity to psychiatric services will be advantageous to the neurosciences. It would not have been advantageous in the case of Mr. Murray or most people requiring acute neurosurgery. There is no logical argument for locating neurosurgery services with psychiatry. They need to be located in a major trauma centre with intensive care facilities.

It would have been possible to transfer the services from the Brook, either to the new Queen Elizabeth hospital when the trust takes it over from the Ministry of Defence, or alternatively, to Queen Mary's hospital in Sidcup, where it would have been perfectly placed to serve the sub-region for which it was designed.

There is chaos in the neurosciences following the closure of the Brook hospital, and I am particularly concerned about paediatrics. At the moment, the neurosciences are split; neurology is at the Maudsley, neurosurgery is at King's, and paediatric neurology is split between Guy's, St. Thomas's and King's. Paediatricians at Greenwich are now saying that they would prefer to send their patients to Great Ormond street, where all those services, including intensive care, are provided under one roof.

A worrying aspect of the report into the incident involving Malcolm Murray is the suggestion that perhaps the region should be looking at private facilities. Is that the route that the Government are taking? If there is sufficient supply of intensive care specialist facilities, why should the region and the trust have to look to the private sector?

The Minister talks about more effective bed management, saying that it is not a matter of the number of beds but how they are used. The hon. Member for Chislehurst said that there has to be a balance between keeping emergency beds open and using them for necessary, urgent and acute work. To my mind, that demonstrates the pressure on the acute beds and the inadequacy of provision to meet the demand for acute services. I also fear that what the Minister is saying may inevitably lead to the earlier discharge of critically ill patients than is clinically justifiable.

In the debate on 23 March on neurosurgery services in the south-east, the Minister referred to a meeting two days earlier between the Secretary of State and the royal colleges, the Intensive Care Society and the British Association of Critical Care Nurses to discuss the MacPherson report. He said that the meeting had been brought forward. I do not know whether that was because of my Adjournment debate or because of the tragic circumstances of Malcolm Murray, but it is worrying that it requires such a tragedy to spur the Secretary of State into action.

What was the result of that meeting, apart from the establishment of the steering group? What are the recommendations of that working group, and when is it likely to report to the House? I hope that the Minister will provide some answers to the questions that are being asked today, and that it will not require a further tragedy such as that of Malcolm Murray or Roberta Gerardo before the Government act to address the number of intensive care beds required to serve the capital city.

Sir Edward Heath (Old Bexley and Sidcup): I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) has had the opportunity of raising this subject today. I owe him and the House an apology for not being here for the first part of his speech, owing to traffic conditions entirely beyond my control. Since then, he has given me the opportunity of reading his speech, which I have done, and I thoroughly support everything he said.

As my hon. Friend knows, I should like to add one or two points. There are two major aspects of the problem that has been raised today. The first is the national one, which concerns the facilities available for dealing with such cases. The second is the personal one concerning Mr. Percy, who is a constituent of my hon. Friend. He came to see me directly after the events, because Queen Mary's hospital is in my constituency, and that was where he became involved.

I shall first add a word to what my hon. Friend and Opposition Members have said about the provision of intensive care facilities in Britain under the health service. It is quite obvious that they are not sufficient. Today we are discussing two cases. One involved a patient in Maidstone who had to be driven to Southampton before a bed could be provided where he could have proper treatment. That cannot be a satisfactory state of affairs. In respect of Queen Mary's, as is well known, a patient had to be flown from Sidcup to Leeds by a helicopter that was specially commissioned from the Royal Air Force, and paid for by the Royal Air Force, before he could receive proper treatment.

There is general agreement among the medical profession at Queen Mary's and at Leeds that everything possible was done by the doctors involved. There is no question about that, so it is not the problem. The problem concerns the facilities where treatment can be provided.

We have just heard that the Brook hospital was immensely important for many decades. For as long as I have represented Old Bexley and Sidcup, there have been attempts to close down the Brook hospital, all of which were successfully resisted until the present one. We now have a case where the lack of facilities at the Brook hospital meant a flight from Sidcup to Leeds. The Brook hospital was telephoned, but as it was closing down, no facilities were available.

I have said previously that the reports that were produced in recent years on the hospital service, and the distinguished people who wrote those reports, dealt with everything except the patients. They have centralised everything for the benefit of the medicos and the administrators, but the fact that a patient, instead of being able to go to the Brook hospital, had to be flown to Leeds never crossed their minds. That is the essence of the matter as to the proper provision of such facilities.

The chairman of the region stated that there were ample facilities in the London area, but he is quite wrong. His comment must raise doubts whether he is suitable as a regional chairman. He said that beds were available at the Royal Free hospital that night. That is also untrue. The Royal Free was telephoned, and replied that there were no beds available. It has now said that, had a more senior person telephoned the hospital, a bed might have been available.

What philosophy or approach is it to say that a bed is available only to a top person who is said to be influential, but not if those on duty at the hospital and carrying out the work there apply for a bed? That cannot possibly be tolerated as an approach to service in our hospital system.

I am sure that the Secretary of State and the Minister would not for a moment suggest that such an approach can continue. The report produced by Queen Mary's, Sidcup, was very full, and made a number of suggestions that have been touched on by my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst. Like him, I hope that they will receive full consideration in the Department. The Minister may not be able to say at the moment whether they are all acceptable, and I quite understand that.

We now have a new Secretary of State for Health, who may have a different approach from his predecessor. He and the Minister might want to look at those suggestions. As far as I am concerned, the fuller the consideration they get the better, because a great deal of thought has gone into them and into what should be said and done about them. There are practical propositions, but the fact remains that beds with the equipment to deal with neurological cases are not available in London, and they are the basic necessity.

I now come to the personal position of the doctor involved at Queen Mary's. The matter has been handled deplorably. The first investigation, which was hastily rushed, was carried out by the chairman of the region, and three lay people. Not one was a medical person. It was said that they consulted a doctor, but what his qualifications are we do not know. Was he familiar with all the problems of this particular field of medicine?

The committee produced its report, and the chairman went on television and said that Dr. Percy had not only been criticised but condemned for his mistreatment of this case. The chairman was followed by the Secretary of State herself, who also said on television that the doctor had been condemned.

What sort of justice is that? They were three lay people, not in any way experts or experienced in these matters. What is more, the doctor himself was not invited to appear before them to give his account of what happened or to attempt to justify his actions. I cannot consider that that is possibly justifiable in any organisation, be it private or public, but least of all public.

To behave in that way is totally unacceptable, and I hope that it will be made clear to them and to all the other regions that, if doctors are going to be criticised in this acute way, the investigations have to be properly handled. The committee should include people who are experienced, and the people being considered should be invited to give evidence, as fully as they like, about their own position. Nothing else is possibly justifiable.

There was a leak of the report of the region. How it happened or where it came from we do not know. It has been denied by the region, but it led to a press attack on the doctor, of the most extreme kind. As the case is coming before the courts, I do not propose to say any more about it. It would be improper on my part, even though the House of Commons has special arrangements.

As a result of the leak, Dr. Percy has, in the minds of millions of people in this country and throughout the English-speaking world, been condemned for his conduct in this case. We all know when that happens how difficult it is for any person to wipe out what has appeared in the press in the most extreme form. That was the consequence of the leak.

The inquiry that was made by Queen Mary's took longer and was thorough, and all those involved, in addition to Dr. Percy, were invited to give evidence to it. They did so. In addition to making recommendations about the general situation, it also commented fairly fully about the doctors involved.

What is very important is that the people who were working that night in Queen Mary's were also described fully. In paragraph 12, the report says:

"The Panel felt very confident that the team in place on the night in question were of a high calibre and sound experience. Indeed, ironically, if they had not been so experienced help may have been sought at an earlier stage."

There was no question about those who were in charge in the hospital. The senior doctor in charge had been at Queen Mary's for a comparatively short time, but was very experienced in the problems that arose that night. There was no criticism of him or of any of those who were working with him.

I am told that, altogether, a group of 15 hospital specialists worked on this case, all through the night, until they could get the RAF helicopter. My hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst mentioned the administrative arrangements, which need to be improved, to get facilities for handling such cases. They did extraordinarily well to find out that, although other helicopters were not available, the RAF had one, and to get around the problems of paying the RAF, which, with limitations on Government expenditure in mind, wanted an assurance that it would get the cash quickly once the helicopter was used. There is room for improvement in the administrative arrangements as well.

We then come to the question of Dr. Percy and what he did. Let me quote again from the report:

"It was the view of the Enquiry Panel that there were no grounds for criticism of the clinical supervision of the patient"— no grounds.

"However, once the call had been received by the consultant Orthopaedic Surgeon"—

Dr. Percy—

"at 0217hrs he could have taken greater responsibility in helping the junior staff on site possibly by attending the hospital or by telephoning neurosurgical colleagues in specialist centres when it became clear that Leeds was the only option available."

There are two things about that. First, the panel says that Dr. Percy could have taken greater responsibility in helping junior staff, possibly by attending the hospital. In fact, he did what the junior staff asked. He was absolutely certain that the staff were doing their job properly after they reported to him, and advised them about getting in touch with hospitals where beds would be available. He later advised them on how to solve the transport problem. In that respect, he had done what was required, and had done it properly.

The report continues:

"Nonetheless, at 0217hrs with a patient who clearly required specialist attention it is probably the case that the involvement of the consultant would not have made any difference to the clinical outcome."

Those are two statements. What grounds are there for censuring that doctor? Justice has gone badly astray, to the permanent damage of the doctor, who is highly skilled and respected, unless this is corrected—and it must be corrected, because it is entirely unjustifiable.

The report continues:

"With the benefit of hindsight the consultant has recognised that he could have telephoned the Brook consultant neurosurgeon at home to try to ease the administrative situation".

It is very doubtful whether he could have telephoned, but how he could have eased the administrative situation when the Government are determined to close down the whole show, I do not know.

"This reflection was positively welcomed by the panel." That endorses the fact that there were no grounds for censuring Dr. Percy.

The panel did not censure Dr. Percy. The fact that the chairman of the region went on television and announced that the doctor had been censured was entirely unjustifiable. The fact that the previous

[Sir Edward Heath]

Secretary of State for Health also went on television and gave her view that the doctor had been justifiably censured was also completely unfounded.

I cannot over-emphasise the damage that it does to a person in a professional career to allow such things to be said. There is still confusion. I, among others, was assured by the hospital that the doctor had not been censured. I do not think that one can take the sentences that I have read from the report as censure. On the other hand, he has been told by the administrator that he has been censured. That, again, is entirely unsatisfactory. I ask the Minister and his advisers to get to the root of this and sort it out. We are relying on him to do so.

I want to say one word in general to the Minister, which perhaps he could pass on to the new Secretary of State, and it is this. The health service is doing a good job—there is no doubt about that—but it has one great drawback, which is that, publicly, it is always announced that more and more money is going to the health service. Yet the health service knows that, because of the rapid advance of medicine in so many different spheres, its need for finance is increasing faster than the amount that it receives. It is that which Ministers must take account of if there are to be proper arrangements for looking after the health of the British people.

Medicine has not stood still. It has probably advanced almost faster than any other scientific area, except nuclear and space. The fact that that is not acknowledged by Ministers is why people do not have confidence that Ministers know how to deal with the situation. That goes to the root of the question.

The same is also true of hospitals. Queen Mary's hospital has a tremendous reputation, and the result is that it can often deal with patients more quickly than neighbouring hospitals. We are then told that, if hospitals can deal with patients more quickly, they do not require so much money. The fact is that they require more money because they are dealing with more patients because they are dealing with them more quickly.

Could we please have a Secretary of State who recognises that, and perhaps mentions it occasionally, so that we know that he recognises it? That is essential to an understanding of the position of the health service.

The other aspect that I want to mention is that there are matters which are not satisfactory, such as the one that we have been discussing this morning. Will the Secretary of State please agree that these things are not satisfactory, and tell us how he will deal with such unsatisfactory aspects? Instead of merely emphasising again how much money is going into the health service and how much the Government want to maintain it, let us have a little quiet appreciation of the problems where they do exist, and an indication of how they will be dealt with for the benefit of the patients and of our constituents.

If the Secretary of State adopts that attitude, he will be far more successful in commending to the population—the voting population is getting closer and closer—the good things that the health service is doing, because our constituents will see that those things that are at the moment lacking are being satisfactorily looked at and dealt with.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I count it a privilege to follow the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), and, like the right hon. Gentleman, I congratulate the hon. Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) on having secured it. It is an important debate. It is important to Mr. Murray's family and friends, to the clinicians who cared for Mr. Murray, and to other health service workers who tried to do their best for him. It is also important because it raises wider questions about the provision of intensive care beds in the capital and the capital's catchment area.

When the incident occurred, the Under-Secretary of State for Health, who is to reply to the debate, wrote to the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam) about the case. In his letter, he did something which was, frankly, deplorable. He said:

"The junior doctor in charge of his case at St. Mary's failed to persuade any of the other local neuroscience centres he contacted to admit him."

In other words, the letter sent by the Minister pins the blame firmly on the junior doctor.

Like the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup, I deplore that scapegoating of health-care professionals. It is not justified. In any event, it is the job of the bed managers of hospitals to find beds. I cannot see how a senior doctor could find a bed that a junior doctor could not. A bed was either available or it was not.

That is the issue to which those who have responsibility for the health service should address themselves, rather than seeking to scapegoat health-care professionals. Like the right hon. Gentleman, I also deplore the appearance of the previous Secretary of State on television pontificating on who was guilty and who was not before the matter had been properly inquired into.

The Under-Secretary of State went on to say that he had already commissioned a study of intensive care provision. That will be an important study, and we look forward with interest to seeing the fruits of it. This is not the first time that the House has debated the provision and availability of intensive care beds in the NHS and, in particular, in the capital. There has been a spate of highly publicised incidents in which seriously ill or injured patients have been transported from one hospital to another in a desperate search for a bed in an intensive care unit. Mr. Murray's tragic case is one of the most dramatic, but it is not an isolated incident.

I well remember the Prime Minister being asked about this at Question Time. He defended the 200-mile journey by saying:

"I understand that Mr. Murray required a highly specialised form of treatment with which Leeds was particularly able to help".—[Official Report, 9 March 1995; Vol. 256, c. 454.]

It is incumbent on the Minister when he responds to say what the highly specialised form of treatment was—a form of treatment which apparently was not available in the capital. It is also incumbent on him to say how it was that Leeds was "particularly"—the Prime Minister's word—able to help. I look forward to the Minister's explanation, and I hope that it is as plausible as he can manage.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Austin-Walker) pointed out, incidents such as this have sparked a series of inquiries into the availability of intensive care in the NHS. It is right in a debate such as this that we should ask what is the size of the problem. The Department of Health has already conducted a study entitled "Study of Provision of Intensive Care in England", dated 1993. It provides us with some useful facts and findings to guide our debate.

The Department of Health tells us, for example, that, in the United States in 1992, the proportion of moneys spent on intensive care was 10 per cent. of total health costs. In the United States, total health costs consume some 12.4 per cent. of GDP. In the United Kingdom, for the same year, we spent on intensive care 1 per cent. of health-care costs, and in this country health-care costs consume only 6 per cent. of GDP. That represents a twentyfold difference.

The report goes on to state:

"We found that considerable numbers of patients were denied the possibility of intensive care because the intensive care units were full."

It does not go on to say that perhaps, if a junior doctor had tried harder, or if a more senior doctor had asked for a bed, one would have been found. The Department's own study says that the intensive care units were full.

It goes on:

"In our study we have shown that intensive care provision in England based on numbers of staffed beds is unequal between regional health authorities."

Our debates on provision in London have highlighted that.

The hon. Member for Chislehurst referred to an exchange about whether there had been increased or decreased provision for the capital in recent times. I wrote to him after the exchange telling him where I obtained my figures. I obtained them from the Minister in answer to a parliamentary question. They relate to the two London regional health authorities, and show that, between 1992 and 1993, the number of beds fell by 12 to 724. In other words, the two London regional health authorities covering London and its immediate catchment area have lost provision.

A survey was carried out in January this year by consultants at St. George's hospital, which showed that, out of 35 hospitals within the M25, only eight to 10 intensive care unit beds were available. Between 30 and 40 of those beds were closed because of funding or staff shortages. That is a slice of life revealed by a survey conducted by consultants at St. George's.

A second survey was conducted in February 1995 of five cities—London, Birmingham, Manchester, Cardiff and Glasgow—which found that, of a theoretical total of 452 intensive care beds, only 376 were open. The figures that the Government like to use do not reveal the whole story..

The Government responded to the survey by admitting the existence of pressing problems in the provision of intensive care beds, especially in London; and, as the Minister's letter reveals, they have ordered an urgent review. Given all that Ministers have said about the Labour party's call for a review and a moratorium on closures, it is a bit rich for them to say now that they will conduct an urgent review of intensive care provision.

Despite the Government's commitment, only two months passed before the previous Secretary of State signed the warrant for the closure of Guy's hospital, and approved the ripping out of brand new and as yet unused intensive care equipment from a ward in Philip Harris house. The hon. Member for Chislehurst knows what an obscenity I consider that to be; we have debated these matters in the House before, and I do not suppose that his views differ much from mine.

It is fair to say that the provision of intensive care is very expensive. One bed costs about £1,500 for 24 hours, and health authorities and trusts think carefully before purchasing and providing more than is absolutely necessary. That apparent drive for efficiency, however, can have terrible, tragic results, especially in the event of an unexpected increase in demand.

The case that we are discussing suggests that one accident occasioned an unforeseen increase in demand in the capital on the day in question. What if four people had been injured in a traffic accident, rather than one? The tragedy would have been multiplied by four. If one bed was not available, four certainly were not.

It is clear to me—as it is to every observer, whether politically neutral or not—that there is a crisis in provision in the capital, and, indeed, in other urban areas. That crisis is money-driven, and driven by the Government's peculiar approach to the management of the national health service: savings are everything, and the provision of a front-line service must take second place.

The demand for intensive and emergency care cannot be entirely predictable, by its very nature. No one can predict when a serious traffic accident, for example, will occur—or, indeed, when a hospital operation will go wrong or something unexpected will be discovered. It is therefore essential to proper patient care to allow a reasonable margin of safety in the number of intensive care places that are funded and staffed.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Austin-Walker) pointed out, that margin of safety has not been in evidence in several instances. It is not good enough for Ministers to pass the responsibility on to local management, or, even more shamefully, to try to scapegoat individual clinicians.

As the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) has observed, it is the duty of Government to ensure that there are enough intensive care beds. If today's debate has highlighted that need as well as the tragic case of Mr. Murray, I hope that it will have done some good.

11.3 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tom Sackville): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) on raising a matter that has caused considerable concern not only in his constituency but nationally as a result of the dramatic events on the night of 6-7 March. I welcome the presence of my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), who has been involved through his discussions with the doctor concerned.

The Opposition Members who spoke have used the words "crisis" and "chaos" liberally, no doubt in an attempt to draw attention to what they were saying. There is no crisis, but an intelligent discussion is needed about the number of intensive care beds. For reasons that have already been given, a difficult balance must be struck between wasteful over-provision—the provision of resources that are then not used for much of the time—and the need to minimise the risk of incidents of the kind that we are discussing.

Both Opposition speakers refrained from specific discussion of the number of intensive care beds, and attempted to widen the argument to the question of the number of acute beds generally in the London area. The two issues may be conncected to some degree, but it is inappropriate to suggest that "a bed is a bed is a bed". As we all know, there is a world of difference between the question of how many acute beds there should be in London hospitals, and the specific issue of how many intensive care units there should be and how many staffed beds should be available in them.

Today's debate principally concerns the incidents that took place in March, and the lessons to be learned about the provision of neurosurgery and intensive care. Hon. Members discussed, in general terms, the sorry circumstances of the transfer from Sidcup to Leeds on the night of 6-7 March in a debate on 23 March. At that time, we were awaiting the report of an investigation of the case; I am now able to reveal the findings of that investigation, and the action that has been taken since. Before I do so, let me add my condolences to those that have already been extended to the Murray family in their bereavement.

Much has been made today of the treatment of Mr. Anthony Percy, the orthapaedic consultant at Queen Mary's hospital in Sidcup. I appreciate the reasons for which my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup expressed concern, but the investigating panel felt that Mr. Percy—who was contacted at home at various times by the senior house officer in his attempts to find a bed for Mr. Murray—might have done more to help in what was a highly unusual and difficult situation for hospital staff.

It is a matter of record that the trust's chief executive wrote a private letter of censure to Mr. Percy, commenting on his contribution—although stressing that he had been responsible for no failure of clinical care, and that the question of disciplinary action did not arise.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup suggested that that was inconsistent with another statement that the clinical outcome of the case would not have been affected, but it is not. No one has suggested that the clinical outcome was necessarily affected, however unsatisfactory it was that the patient had to be transported to Leeds. No one has suggested that that had a significant adverse effect on the patient—although I should be the last to say that what happened should have happened in that way: it is unacceptable that the patient had to be taken to Leeds.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Sackville: No.

I well understand Mr. Percy's wish now to do all he can to put right the damage that he feels has been done to his reputation, and I very much regret the way in which the whole matter was reported.

Mr. Brown: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Sackville: No. The hon. Gentleman had his chance to give his views; I have quite a long speech to make.

Given the possibility of legal proceedings, hon. Members will appreciate, as my right hon. Friend has said, that I cannot comment further on this matter. What I can categorically state is that there is no question of Mr. Percy being used as a scapegoat to deflect criticism of bed shortages in London.

Indeed, the investigation panel concluded that there was not a shortage of beds. Although the intensive care beds in neurosciences centres were certainly all very busy, the panel believed, on the evidence it had before it, that Mr. Murray could have been treated that night in London following his head injury. The key point is the management and use of beds and the co-ordination and communication between units, rather than the absolute number. That is the real issue, and I shall return to it.

Mr. Sims: My hon. Friend says that there is no question of there being any scapegoats in this matter, but has he read all the correspondence, in the course of which the chief executive says that he fears that scapegoats were required, the implication being that Mr. Percy is the scapegoat? Can my hon. Friend say whether Mr. Percy was censured or not? If so, why was he censured, and if there were no grounds for him being censured, why cannot that censure be withdrawn?

Mr. Sackville: I have stated the facts as I know them: a letter of censure was written to Mr. Percy by the hospital, critical of his performance. That is a matter of record.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The Minister told the House that it was a private letter. If so, why did Ministers go on television and talk about it?

Mr. Sackville: We did so because it was very germane to the whole account of what happened on that night that the hospital was critical of Mr. Percy. There was enormous press interest in the matter. As I said, however, I regret the way in which some newspapers and media carried the story. I can understand why Mr. Percy feels that he has been unfairly treated.

Sir Edward Heath: That letter was sent some time after all this began, and I have quoted from the report of the hospital panel and its chairman of chancellors. Their conclusion was obviously different. The letter was sent by the administrator of the hospital. By what authority did he send that letter, when it was not justified by the whole panel of the hospital, with the chairman presiding?

Mr. Sackville: I understand that the letter was sent with the full knowledge of the chairman of the hospital, and that clearly the hospital was critical. The fact that that was perhaps blown up to a considerable extent by the media is regrettable, but it remains a matter of fact that, with the full knowledge and permission of the chairman, the hospital was critical of Mr. Percy.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Sackville: No. I will carry on, because I have a lot to say about the action that has been taken since on intensive care beds.

On the situation during that night, the panel also concluded that the Royal Free hospital did have two intensive care beds available and could have taken the patient. I appreciate that that raises all sorts of queries, and I would like to make it clear that a call was made by Queen Mary's hospital, and the information was given to the doctor concerned that the Royal Free considered it clinically inappropriate to transport the patient across London. That was its opinion, and it was therefore asked to see whether some nearer facilities could be found.

As far as can be ascertained, there was no further contact after that. The Royal Free was not contacted again. That is why I say that there was a failure of communication and co-ordination, but it remains clear that two intensive care beds were available at the Royal Free. That much we know, and it is a matter of great regret that that was not followed up. I am not blaming anyone. The situation was confused and difficult. Later, a decision was therefore taken to transport the patient to Leeds.

The report makes it clear that, with the proper use of existing intensive care facilities and better co-ordination between hospitals, it should be possible to minimise the risk of inappropriate transfers of this sort occurring in the future.

Sir Edward Heath: Does it not seem to my hon. Friend to be quite extraordinary that, if those beds were available at the Royal Free, which it has since denied, and a doctor is on the other end of the telephone, the hospital should not say to him, "Yes, it would be much easier and more suitable for the patient if you could get him into the Brook, but if you can't get him into the Brook, then come back to us." It said nothing of the sort. It said to the doctors in Queen Mary's hospital, "Aren't the beds available? Try the Brook."

Mr. Sackville: That is not the information that I have, which is that the hospital said that beds were available, but advised that nearer facilities be sought. Unfortunately, that was not followed up. That is one of the factors that led to the inappropriate transfer of this patient to Leeds.

As the House already knows, the report calls—

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Sackville: No. I shall continue, and I have said what I understand to be the facts about what happened in relation to that telephone call.

The report calls for the establishment of stronger systems for the referral of patients to specialist neuroscience centres, better co-ordination of bed usage between neuroscience centres, and improved communication between specialist centres and their referring hospital. Those are important recommendations. All of them are being implemented, with some already in place and others being refined.

A key recommendation was that the London emergency bed service, about which my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst asked me earlier, should extend its service to cover intensive care beds. The new service began on 17 April, and is already proving to be of considerable assistance to units in helping to match supply and demand for intensive care services.

Trusts in the region were asked immediately to review their on-call protocols to make much clearer the involvement expected of staff out of hours.

All acute hospitals are required to make formal relationships with one of the specialist neuroscience centres. That is the centre that they will contact initially if they need to refer a patient for neurosurgery. Many hospitals in South Thames have already confirmed that they have such procedures in place.

For their part, the specialist neuroscience centres have introduced procedures to inform hospitals that normally refer patients to them of any severe pressure on beds and the alternative arrangements available. The burden of finding a bed is thus co-ordinated by the specialist centres. If the specialist centre cannot identify a place, a referral is made to the emergency bed service, which maintains a comprehensive information service on bed availability for all London hospitals.

The procedures that have been established should ensure that, when a patient needs access to a specialist centre, the referral can be organised efficiently and with optimal clinical effectiveness. I have gone into the matter at some length, and I want to make it clear to the House that, with good organisation, the things that occurred on that night should be avoided in future. I hope that some of those actions that have been taken will minimise the risk of such events recurring.

Health authorities are actively considering intensive care provision, and are working with their local hospitals to ensure that the referral procedures are in place. The two Thames regions are also holding detailed discussions to ensure a fully co-ordinated approach to forward planning and bed usage between their specialist neuroscience centres.

Mr. Murray's injuries were severe, and he required both neurosurgery and intensive care. An intensive care unit is a specialised hospital ward where critically ill patients with organ failure can receive treatment and monitoring, using invasive techniques and high-technology equipment, and benefit from the high staffing ratio—at least one to one—necessary to maintain adequate care. The number of available intensive care beds in England has risen by over 100 since 1989 to more than 2,600, and the number of qualified intensive care nurses has risen by 1,000 to 7,650. The working group that has been set up will produce guidelines on admittance and the better use of those beds.

Despite those increases in facilities, there were allegations of shortages long before the Murray case. To clarify the matter, we commissioned a report from Professor Klim MacPherson of the health promotion sciences unit at the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine on the provision of intensive care services in England.

That thorough report showed that, overall, there was sufficient provision. However, it identified a number of problems and important issues. In particular, it showed that about one in six admissions to intensive care are considered by clinicians to be inappropriate, on the grounds that the patients are either too ill to have any reasonable chance of recovery, or not ill enough to require the level of specialist care that is provided in an intensive care unit.

On 7 February, the report was formally sent to all health authorities and trusts asking them to examine local provision carefully in the light of the findings and recommendations. Following the publication of the report, Ministers met leaders of the relevant professional bodies and, in the light of those discussions, a working group of professionals, to which I have just referred, is considering guidelines for admission and discharge. It is also looking at the relationship between intensive care units and other less intensive forms of care, such as high dependency units.

Given the resources that are required for an intensive care bed, it is vital that we get the balance right between meeting the need for both emergency and planned treatment requiring intensive care, and avoiding those facilities being under-used. As we have heard in the debate, that is a difficult balance. Getting it right remains a challenging priority for all those involved, given the fluctuations in demand for this highly specialised and intensive treatment.

The Government's policy, whether for London or for the rest of the country, is that it is for individual health authorities to plan the level of provision that is appropriate for their, areas, taking into account all factors of need, demand and the availability and desirability of other services.

Of particular interest to the debate is information on London. Professor MacPherson's report found that each of the Thames regions had more general intensive care beds per head of population than the national average. The former South East Thames region had the highest ratio in the country, with three beds per 100,000 of the population. The Department's information returns show that, in inner and outer London, the average number of available intensive care beds rose from 480 to 501 in the year to 1994.

The Government do not hold central information on the number of intensive care beds within different specialties. According to the London emergency beds service, there are currently 247 general adult intensive care beds in 35 hospitals within the 16 London health authorities. There are also 29 neuroscience intensive care beds, 50 paediatric intensive care beds and 186 beds in cardiothoracic units. In addition to these 512 beds are intensive care beds in renal, liver and other specialist units that are not presently covered by the emergency beds service.

To help to ensure the best use of available resources and to improve communication and co-ordination, the emergency beds service has extended its coverage to intensive care services, including neurosurgical intensive care in the Thames regions and surrounding area. It is operational 24 hours a day, and it contacts every intensive care unit in the Thames regions twice a day—or three times a day for those with specialist neurosurgery or paediatric beds—so as to update its information on bed availability. It is thus able to respond immediately to units that are seeking to transfer a patient because they have no spare capacity.

Initial experience of the emergency beds service is that it is proving very helpful. In the first 45 days of the service, there were 173 inquiries from 53 hospitals. On average, that is four a day, and there were as many as 13 on one day in April. The work of the service led to 112 patients being transferred to 54 destinations. Some 78 per cent. of the inquiries were for general intensive care and 14 per cent. were for neurosurgical intensive care.

The service is of considerable assistance to units in helping to match supply and demand for intensive care services. Similar services are being established in other parts of the country, with considerable benefit.

In the light of Professor MacPherson's finding that many intensive care beds are inappropriately used, no discussion of intensive care would be complete without considering acute bed provision. That the NHS generally will have fewer acute beds in 10 or 20 years' time is common ground. However, neither the Tomlinson report nor "Making London Better" includes a planned or target reduction in beds, and it is not Government policy to set such targets.

We have said that, in London, as in the rest of the country and in the world, more patients will be treated with fewer beds. Developments in modern health care, such as non-invasive diagnosis and treatment, and new and improved drug therapies, mean that, overall, the demand for beds is steadily falling. That trend is clear in Britain and overseas.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Sackville: No. I should like to continue.

The common theme from many studies is the need for better management. That was the key message of a report on beds from the chief executives of the inner London health authorities. Considerable work is being done to develop neurosciences in the Thames regions and London. That is well in hand, and the transfer of neurosurgery from the Brook hospital is being phased to ensure the continuation of safe and effective services. My hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst spoke about that transfer.

The new neurosurgery service, which was established at a cost of £7 million including magnetic resonance imaging facilities at the Ruskin wing of King's, will begin to take patients next month. It will be complemented in 1999 by the move of the neurology service from the Maudsley to King's, so that a comprehensive service will be available in one building. The Higher Education Funding Council is also investing in specialist research and teaching facilities. That will bring an academic dimension, and further complement the service at King's.

A clinically led review of neuroscience services in South Thames recently proposed that a new specialist neurosurgery unit should be located at St. George's hospital, Tooting. If health authorities agree to those proposals, the new centre will replace the outdated facilities at Atkinson Morley hospital and Hurstwood Park. Actions already taken and current considerations demonstrate the commitment to ensuring that London and South Thames in particular have the best possible pattern of neuroscience services.

The events of 6 and 7 March underline the urgency and the importance of the work that is already in hand to define and facilitate the best possible future pattern of neuroscience and intensive care facilities in the Thames regions. I hope that I have been able to demonstrate the Department's commitment to ensuring that everything possible is done to avoid any repetition of the unacceptable events of that night. I understand the concerns of my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst about what happened.

I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) for his comments about the good work of the NHS. I agree that the many new technologies, new medicines and new ways of treating patients mean that there will be a demand for ever greater resources for the NHS. I hope that my right hon. Friend was not entirely correct when he said that Ministers have failed to acknowledge that.

I take it as read, just looking at the history of resources in the NHS, that the same pattern will continue; that we will need to find more and more resources to provide for ever greater demand for health as new ways of treating patients emerge. I think that many problems will exist. The problem of balancing the need for intensive care beds with supply will always exist. I hope that, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup suggested, we will take a quiet and sensible approach to the matter, and that some of what I have said will convince him that we are doing just that.

Sir Edward Heath: Does my hon. Friend accept that, while we welcome the improvements that he has outlined and hope that they will be more effective than the present arrangements, I for one cannot accept the information that he has been given on Mr. Percy? As the matter is likely to come before the courts, he has heard far from the last of it.

Radioactive Waste

11.30 am

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): I want to raise today issues surrounding the disposal of radioactive waste from the nuclear industry and that which is generated by medical processes in local hospitals. I want to concentrate on low-level waste, which has been the subject of particular concern in my constituency during the past few months. I hope that the Government will reiterate some good news on that subject.

The Government published a consultation document on 14 August last year in which they reviewed nuclear waste and its disposal. Last week, a White Paper was issued in response to that consultation process. I want to place on record straight away that I welcome the Government's decision to abandon their initial intention, as expressed in the consultation document, to allow waste from the nuclear industry to be deposited on public refuse sites. This morning, I want to ask questions about how we have come to have this debate today and why it was necessary to consult on the issue in the first place.

I also intend to discuss some issues raised by the White Paper appertaining to low-level waste and its disposal—I want to seek some clarification from the Minister on that point. Last, I want to raise some issues surrounding the transportation of waste from the nuclear industry. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson) hopes to raise his own concerns on transportation.

It goes without saying that the issue of radioactive waste is highly sensitive. It naturally worries the public. Even when the waste in question comes from local hospitals, and people can therefore see an obvious benefit from the processes that have produced it, local residents are worried about its disposal and treatment. Those public concerns are naturally heightened when the waste is from the nuclear industry. It does not take speeches from politicians at public meetings to produce that concern; it is natural. The issue has therefore to be handled with sensitivity and I shall today question whether the Government have not been guilty during the past few months of substantial insensitivity.

In my constituency, we have a large public refuse tip called Beighton tip. Only four or five years ago, planning permission was granted to extend it. Tipping will continue on the site for the next two to three years. It is surrounded by houses. A local school and a nature conservation area of reclaimed land are next door to it. Excellent work has been put in by volunteers from the local community who are committed to our natural environment.

The tip has naturally caused public disquiet. No one likes living next door to a refuse tip, but when proposals are made to dispose of radioactive waste from the nuclear industry at such a site, it is natural that residents become extremely alarmed. For many years, radioactive waste from local hospitals has been deposited on the site. Even that causes some concern. A local group of residents has formed the Hackenthorpe against the tip campaign and been vigilant in monitoring all matters in connection with the tip. They attend regular meetings with me, local councillors and council officers, at which they raise concerns about the depositing there of any radioactive waste whatever.

In Sheffield, we have considered the possibility of incinerating radioactive waste, but we were worried about emissions into the atmosphere. On balance, it was thought that depositing the waste in a controlled and authorised way at Beighton tip was probably the best way forward. However, there is a difference between dealing with radioactive waste from hospitals and dealing similarly with waste from the nuclear industry.

The first difference is that there are no problems of definition with waste from hospitals. It is all low-level waste. It is not a matter of where one draws the line. It is all the lowest level radioactive waste that is in need of disposal. That is not the case with waste from the nuclear industry which, as the Government's consultation document illustrates, comes in various grades from low level right the way through to high level, for which specific plans are made. There is also a difference in type, which I shall deal with later.

There is a scientific difference between waste from hospitals and waste from the nuclear industry. The Government's consultation document published in August last year therefore made chilling reading. I shall quote from the key points in the document. It says:

"Some of the waste from nuclear sites which is currently disposed of to Drigg could in principle be safely disposed of to local landfills, while still providing full radiological protection of the public, although each case would need to be carefully considered. Yet even though the charges for disposal at Drigg are high compared with landfill burial, the majority of the nuclear industry has not switched to alternative disposal routes, nor does the ability to charge for radioactive waste disposals seem to have generated interest from private landfill operators."

It is probably not surprising that people are not queueing up to take the material, but the document expresses some surprise that, despite the willingness of the nuclear industry to pay, even private operators have not been willing to take the material on board and put it on private sites.

The document continues:

"This current practice creates needless pressure on the disposal capacity at Drigg. The Government therefore believes that there would be advantage in encouraging waste producers to make greater use of controlled burial. Views are invited on this, as well as on the methods by which it might be achieved."

That was the key part of the proposal in the consultation document last August. It was some time before there was public recognition that the proposal was around at all. Indeed, the public profile of the issue was raised only when Greenpeace issued a press release and there followed an article in the Observer.

It is worth asking questions at this stage about why the idea was put out to consultation. I accept that it was a suggestion for consultation, but still it was raised. Once the public read about a Government proposal, even though the Government keep on saying that it is merely a matter for consultation, they become worried that what is proposed will happen—that waste from the nuclear industry will appear on their doorsteps. They know that, for all the security measures that are taken on refuse tips, children go and play on them and that, although they should not, people have motorbike scrambles on them. People can put up all the warning signs and fences in the world, but they will not completely prevent public access to such sites. People therefore become extremely concerned.

It is even more worrying that the proposal seems to have been brought forward for two reasons. The words that I have just read out gave the game away. First, the Government were concerned about the cost of using Drigg and were considering burial at public refuse sites as a cheaper option—it was about saving money. Secondly, they were looking to save money by considering Drigg for the disposal of intermediate-level waste, which would be cheaper than the way in which it is currently disposed of.

There is also the complication of reprocessing waste from nuclear industries in other countries. The Government decided not to return the totality of that waste to other countries but have chosen, for cheapness of transportation, to send back high-level waste in concentrated form and leave substantial volumes of low-level waste for disposal in this country. That presents the Government with the problem of how to dispose of the low-level waste. Given the capacity problems at Drigg, and the pressure it will be under if it is also to be used for intermediate waste, there will be a difficulty not merely on cost but on where else the waste can be disposed of.

It is worrying that the Government brought forward the proposals because of their policy decisions on reprocessing waste from other countries and because of considerations to do with cheapness. Burial on refuse sites was thought to be an easy, cheap and convenient way out of their difficulties.

It was also unfortunate that the Government chose to raise such a sensitive matter without bringing it more forcibly to public attention. Until the Observer story, the proposal had gone largely unnoticed. It was hidden away in a few paragraphs towards the end of a very large document which mainly dealt with other grades of waste from the nuclear industry. The Government made no attempt to highlight their proposals. That shows that, while it was a consultation document in name, little effort was made to activate the consultation process and bring it to the attention of people who might want to have a say—not least ordinary members of the public such as my constituents who live around the Beighton tip.

The Government also said that there was not a list of tips into which they were proposing to put waste from the nuclear industry. In one sense, that was technically correct, because paragraph 126 of the report mentioned that authorisations were necessary. It states:

"Disposals are permitted only when the waste containment characteristics and performance of the site have been fully assessed".

I accept that, even if the Government had carried on with this proposal and had come to a different conclusion the day after the White Paper was announced, waste from the nuclear industry would not have been deposited on tips without careful consideration of their containment characteristics. However, the fact is that the document listed municipal refuse sites that would be considered for the disposal of nuclear waste—nuclear waste would not be disposed of at those sites but they would be considered for it.

The existence of a list heightens public concern. People know that, even if the tip they live near has not been designated as a disposal site, it is on the list for consideration to be so designated. The public naturally react. They believe that Government lists have some validity and that proposals that the Government make are likely to come to fruition.

It is not as though the Government could not have foreseen what would happen. Indeed, I find it staggering that the Government felt that they did not have to offer any extra explanation or to contact local authorities and ask for views on the proposals. They must have realised what the reaction would be because there was a parallel case in the mid 1980s. I am sure that the Minister is aware of that. He will want to say what lessons were learnt from the row in the 1980s when the Government climbed down on similar proposals in a consultation document.

In the mid-1980s, the Government brought forward proposals to create disposal sites for low-level radioactive waste from the nuclear industry at Fulbeck, South Killinghome, Elstow and Bradwell. That led to a major campaign by bodies such as Greenpeace and the county councils involved—Humberside, Bedfordshire and Essex. It was a cross-party campaign. I do not think that anyone in the councils supported the proposals, whatever party they came from.

The issues raised in that campaign were the same as those that have been raised in the past few months: the definition of low-level nuclear waste, the fact that the definition might be changed at some stage because it is a quantitative definition and quantities can be changed and the concern that, once a site had been established for low-level waste, a policy change could mean that intermediate waste could be deposited there too, especially as the Government were thinking of doing that at Drigg. There did not seem to be an overall policy for coping with the capacity difficulties of the nuclear industry. Those issues were raised then and they are pertinent to this debate.

In 1987, the Government withdrew the proposals. I am sure that the withdrawal of those proposals in, I think, May of that year had nothing to do with the general election that was about to take place; or with the fact that three of the four Members of Parliament for the constituencies involved happened to include the Government Chief Whip and Under-Secretaries of State at the Home Office and the Department of Health. All of them spoke out against the proposals.

The press reports at the time, and the undue haste with which the then Secretary of State, Nicholas Ridley, rushed the announcement through the Commons on a Friday morning, interrupting private Members' business, suggest that the Government had an eye on the electorate's views. Ultimately, they gave in to public pressure. The Times said:

"Public action led to nuclear waste ruling, says Nirex".

Nirex, which was involved in evaluating the sites, had no doubt at all. Mr. John Baker, the chairman of Nirex said that it was public opposition to the schemes which stopped them.

The Government should therefore not have been surprised, when they brought forward proposals in 1994, that there was a public reaction. There had been a reaction in the 1980s. The public affected by all four sites that had been designated to receive low-level waste reacted. County councils, Greenpeace and local Members of Parliament reacted. In the end, the Government reacted too, and climbed down. That incident is clearly a parallel.

It would be interesting to know to what extent the Government took account of what happened in the 1980s before they put their proposals in the consultation document. It seems inconceivable, given what happened in the 1980s, that the Government could have been unaware of public opposition and failed to take account of it. Why, then, did they put forward a proposal this year only to withdraw it a few months later, again on the grounds of public opposition? That is the reason that the Government have given for withdrawing the proposals in their consultation document.

When challenged about the consultation document, the Government argued that it was not too sinister because they were not proposing—with one minor exception, as was explained to me in a written answer—to change the law. The law as it currently stands allows for the disposal of radioactive waste both from medical processes and from the nuclear industry, providing, of course, that proper authorisation from Her Majesty's inspectors is given for disposal on a site. Obviously, the site has to be properly inspected and recognised as having the necessary containment characteristics.

The Government said that what was proposed was not a big deal as they were not changing the legislation—but they were changing policy. Although low-level waste from the nuclear industry could legally be deposited on public landfill sites, it had not happened, as the consultation document recognises, so the Government were in effect proposing a change of policy.

In many ways, that change of policy was more worrying and frightening than the change of policy proposed in the mid-1980s when the campaign was run on the four sites that I mentioned. Those four sites were to be specifically designated for low-level waste from the nuclear industry. The change of policy proposed in the consultation document in 1994 was not to create four new specifically designed sites but to deposit the waste on public refuse tips.

If because of public opposition the Government withdrew a proposal to create four specifically designated sites in the 1980s, did they not think that the public might be even more worried about proposals to put such waste on refuse tips on which their children could play? It is incomprehensible that the Government could come up with such a proposal without realising the likelihood of public outrage.

As a Member of Parliament, I received letters and telephone calls immediately. People asked whether the proposal was real. When I said yes, they said that the Government must be off their head. No one could regard the proposal as serious. A large public meeting in the constituency was attended by 200 people. We did not merely berate the proposal but invited people from Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution and the hospitals, environmental health officers and people from the South Yorkshire waste regulation unit. We ensured that local people had all the technical information that they needed to form an opinion. Needless to say, at the end of the meeting, no one thought that the proposal was a good idea.

The local residents who were part of the Hackenthorpe against the tip campaign were outraged and made their views clear, as did Greenpeace. Essentially, however, it was ordinary local people who said that they did not want their children brought up next to a tip where nuclear waste was deposited.

The Government can give all the assurances in the world that nuclear waste can be deposited only on tips that have a proper clay base which is not permeable so that there should be no leakage into the local water courses. However, at Beighton tip, which happens to have a clay base and where thorough inspections were carried out and advice given by the National Rivers Authority and the waste regulation unit before it was used for its current purposes, there have been unforeseen leakages of leachate into the Shirebrook. The city council has been fined £5,000 for allowing those leakages to occur. Even with proper planning, such problems occur. Local residents were aware of the risks and asked how they could be absolutely certain that leaks would not occur if nuclear waste was put on their local tip.

Residents asked whether, as the tip was a council tip, the council could refuse to accept such waste. The answer came back that the council could not refuse. Although the council has to be consulted, an authorisation from HMIP means that the council cannot refuse to take radioactive waste even though it owns the tip. That is currently the case with waste from local hospitals and would be the case with nuclear waste if the change of policy had come about. In a written answer, the former Minister for the Environment and Countryside said:

"Under section 18 of the Radioactive Substances Act 1983, local authorities have a duty to accept radioactive waste for controlled burial if the regulatory bodies authorise disposal to sites provided by them. The consultation document contained no proposals to alter or extend that duty."—[Official Report, 6 December 1994; Vol. 251, c. 132.]

Officers of Sheffield city council attended the meeting and gave professional advice and made it clear that they were opposed to the proposal. However, as the law stands—and with no proposal to alter it—the council might well have been compelled to take waste had the Government's proposals gone ahead.

There are, of course, some private tips in the South Yorkshire area which could have agreed to take the waste. In that case, the council would have no statutory right even to be consulted on behalf of the local populace. With the establishment of the Environment Agency, the waste regulation unit's remit in these matters will be removed, so local opinion will not be reflected through the democratic process.

At the meeting, someone said that waste from the hospital was already deposited on the tip and asked what difference additional waste would make, as it would all be the same low-level waste. I am not a scientist, but I understand that such matters are now included in general certificate of secondary education courses. There are apparently differences in terms of the isotopes involved in the medical processes that create radioactive waste.

David Purchon, the director of environmental health for whom I have the highest professional regard, explained at the meeting that waste including alpha-emitters has a low penetrative quality and that one can walk on it without being exposed to radioactivity. In fact, one has to swallow it for it to have any effect, which is wholly understandable in view of the medical processes that create it.

The difference is that waste from the nuclear industry includes gamma and beta-emitters. Waste may be classified as low-level waste, belong to the same category as hospital waste and have the same energy, but when alpha and beta-emitters are involved, the waste has a different penetrative quality. Putting it on a public refuse site poses a greater risk to the public as there is a possibility of radioactive penetration such as would not be possible with the same grade of waste from medical processes. All that was explained at the meeting. It might have slightly reassured people about the medical waste being deposited on the site, but it provided no reassurance at all about the possibility of industrial nuclear waste arriving on their doorstep. Indeed, people felt even more compelled to mount a campaign.

We had a very good campaign. Local television reporters and journalists attended the meeting and we had a great deal of local coverage. There was a silent vigil on site which was attended by many local residents, and a petition of 10,000 signatures was collected. Those involved were ordinary people who probably did not understand all the scientific issues but who were very worried about what they regarded as a threat to their environment. We were also supported by Sheffield city council and we welcomed the resolution that it passed. We received support from Greenpeace, and I congratulate that organisation on raising the issue in the first place and on its campaigning.

The campaign also received tremendous support from the local tenants' federation in Sheffield, which collected many of the signatures for the petition. People from the federation talked to ordinary people and enabled them to express their concern through the petition. I pay tribute in particular to Olive Caterer from the federation for her energy and enthusiasm. The Hackenthorpe against the tip campaign might have been voluble in its criticism, but it worked hard. Its chair, Irene Dawtry, spoke at meetings and to the media and kept local residents informed of what was happening. I congratulate all the individuals and organisations involved. The fact that they managed to collect 10,000 signatures is a tribute to their energy and enthusiasm, and evidence of their burning desire to stop a wrong being committed against their community.

I conclude by asking the Minister some questions. My constituents are delighted with the outcome of the consultation process, in that their campaign was successful and represents a victory for the ordinary people of Sheffield. It is good that the Government listened to them, but why on earth was the proposal included in the consultation process in the first place?

Why on earth did the Government make such a suggestion, having experienced the public opposition to the proposal in the 1980s? It is good that public opinion has been listened to and that the campaign mounted by my constituents has succeeded, but why was it necessary to upset and concern them?

Will the Government give a commitment that this is the last time that they will bring forward any such proposal? Will they confirm that they are not just saying that, for the time being, they do not have any ideas about dumping waste from the nuclear industry on public refuse sites?

My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) kindly met a delegation of my constituents who came down with a large part of the petition. In his own direct way, he spoke for all of them when he simply said that the proposals were daft and should never have been put forward. He made it very clear that when the Labour party forms the next Government, it will not ever contemplate such proposals. I hope that the Minister will give a similar commitment on behalf of his party.

Will the Minister indicate why the Government, in recognising that such dumping is a stupid idea, are not prepared to change the law? At present, it is legally possible for waste from the nuclear industry to be put on public refuse tips. The Government are saying that it is not their policy at this stage to do so, so why do they not relieve public concern and change the law accordingly?

I have a few more questions about waste from local hospitals. I have explained that I understand the differences between hospital and nuclear waste. The public recognise that waste from hospitals is not merely different in type, but that it is all low level, and that they feel some sense of obligation and responsibility for it in their community. One concern is about the Government's indication that, in future, only local authority tips will be compelled to take waste from such processes. There will not be any compulsion to do so on private tips or on tips owned by local authority waste disposal companies.

Given that most local authority tips are being transferred to LAWDAC ownership, how many tips will remain under the ownership of local authorities in respect of which compulsion can be used? Will local authority tips left under local authority control have to take more such waste because other tips will not take it? If there is not a clear answer to that question, my constituents will become concerned.

Will the Minister also explain why, as the White Paper indicates, local authorities will be consulted on all proposals about the authorised disposal of radioactive waste, but will not have a statutory right to be consulted on proposals to put waste on private tips? Why does not the Minister give them such a statutory right? If the Government accept that it is right that they should be consulted, why should not they make such provision statutory?

I do not know whether it is a technical slip in the White Paper, but while the Government accept that there should be consultation about the disposal of radioactive waste from hospitals on private tips, they do not indicate that there should be consultation on such waste being disposed on tips owned by LAWDACs. I do not know whether that is a mere omission and that, in fact, the Government intend to consult local authorities in such cases. I recognise that local authorities are entitled to—I think—20 per cent. of directorial representation on LAWDACs, but as local authority members or officers are to sit on a LAWDAC as directors, and are not there simply to report back to their authorities, and in view of their responsibilities as company directors, I should have thought that direct consultation with local authorities would be in order.

Finally, I shall raise the issue of transportation of nuclear waste, about which my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South will shortly provide more detail. I spoke to the chief fire officer in South Yorkshire about the matter. There has been much correspondence from South Yorkshire on the transportation of nuclear weapons—there has also been a lot about nuclear waste.

The Government feel no obligation or need to advise fire authorities in advance that waste will be moving through their areas. The police are told, but the fire authorities are not, even though fire authority staff would have to turn up to deal with any accident or emergency. Certainly in the case of nuclear waste, a description of the material being carried appears on the outside of the vehicle transporting it, yet no advance warning is given to enable fire services to prepare.

I also understand that there is no capacity for joint training between the nuclear industry and local fire services so as to form a mutual understanding of the materials involved and the sort of joint processes that might have to be conducted if an emergency or accident occurred. That is very worrying. I do not understand why the Government are intent on keeping the matter secret. Why cannot they be more open about it? Why cannot they trust the fire services, which have an important—indeed, essential—and often dangerous job to do on behalf of the public? Why cannot the Government give advance warning, facilitate joint training and enable greater public safety in such matters?

In conclusion, I want to emphasise that, for my constituents, this is a day for celebration. It is a day for congratulating the Government on withdrawing proposals that should not have been made in the first place and for congratulating the people of Sheffield, especially in the Attercliffe constituency, on a great public campaign to stop waste from the nuclear industry being dumped on Beighton tip. Many people who have joined in the campaign with enthusiasm deserve great credit.

I hope that it is also a day for clarification of the issues concerning medical waste and a day for obtaining further assurances on the legalities of disposing of waste from the nuclear industry. I also hope that it is a day on which a clear commitment will be made—that we will never again debate this matter in the House because we will never again worry people, especially my constituents, that nuclear waste will appear on their doorstep, or on their local refuse tip, because never again will any Government propose a policy that gives rise to such public concern.

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): I am very pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) has obtained this debate. I share many of his concerns about the disposal of nuclear waste—concerns which are likely only to increase as we have to face the decommissioning of nuclear power stations as an issue of today rather than a distant prospect for tomorrow. I shall concentrate on the transportation of nuclear materials, which has an equally practical focus.

In the early hours of 26 June, a lorry going through part of my constituency was involved in an accident at a roundabout. As a result, a concrete bunker containing nuclear materials was thrown off the lorry and split open. The canisters inside, containing caesium and beryllium, were deposited on to the road. The good news is that the lead casing of those canisters was not fractured and the risk to the public turned out to be minimal. If the canisters had been fractured, we would have been talking about a very different matter. I understand that those substances would in a very short time have a catastrophic effect on the nervous system of anyone exposed to them.

The roads concerned were closed for about four hours while the wreckage was cleared and tests were conducted for the prospect of any leakage. It turned out that that lorry movement was just one of 600,000 vehicle movements around the United Kingdom every year. The lorry was not delivering nuclear waste but nuclear materials for use on an oil rig and was travelling from Morecambe to Great Yarmouth. What worried me was that as we tried to explore the public safety implications of such traffic movements the matter became more of a farce than an accident.

The shift from accident to absurdity was exposed by journalists on the Nottingham Evening Post, to whom I am particularly grateful, when they tried to find out who knew what about the contents of the containers being transported and the risk levels to which—potentially—members of the public were exposed. The farcical element started when the journalists contacted the Department of Transport. The response of the officials there was that such matters had nothing to do with them but were the responsibility of the Health and Safety Executive. But the HSE said no, such matters were the responsibility of the police and the Department of Transport. We then turned to the Central Office of Information and were told that there was a joint responsibility between the Health and Safety Executive and the Department of Transport. When we went back to the HSE, however, the people there said the matter was not their responsibility. They did not accept responsibility for the regulations and told us to go back to the Department of Transport to clarify what the regulations were. Eventually, when we got in touch with the HSE yet again, it agreed that the regulations were its responsibility after all and said that it would look into the matter.

I was extremely alarmed when HSE staff said that under the existing regulations there was no obligation to notify the HSE, the Department of Transport, the emergency services or the local authority about the movement of nuclear materials. My alarm was compounded when I contacted the people who, over many years, I had come to expect to be responsible at a local level for the discharge of duties in relation to public safety and the transport of goods in the local environment.

I contacted the chair of the public protection committee and the emergency planning officer for Nottinghamshire. The emergency planning officer confirmed to me in writing:

"The Police are only notified of military consignments, none of the emergency services are notified of civilian movements . . . safe routes and the volume of traffic is not known."

The chair of the public protection committee replied to the county council which, understandably, was as concerned as local residents, in the following words:

"Neither I, nor the Emergency Services are made aware of the movement of radioactive materials through our county. Since the use of radioactive isotopes is relatively commonplace in our hospitals, universities and industry, it is to be assumed that they are transported from time to time. These materials that are less hazardous concern me less than the intermediate and high level radioactive substances that can be and I am sure are transported through our county. The storage and use of such materials is controlled by HM Inspectorate of Pollution under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 and the Fire and Rescue Service is notified of the nature and location of such sources. However . . . they have no knowledge of where or when radioactive material is being transported."

The Government consultative document on the transport by road of radioactive materials must be welcomed, but it still focuses on only three main areas—packaging, labelling and driver training. That misses out a whole series of areas which, understandably, public authorities would like clarified. Many terms in the consultative document are obscure and unhelpful, and both my local authority and the Association of County Councils have shared those concerns in previous representations that they have made.

The document uses terms such as "a suitable container" without defining what would be suitable to contain radioactive materials. The document also mentions a duty for the carrier to "take reasonable care", but nowhere is there a code of conduct defining reasonable care. There is a clear recognition of the importance of testing containers for suitability and strength at the beginning of their lives, but no requirement to test for wear and tear during the lifetime of their use. We contacted the HSE to ask what the word "suitable" meant, and the spokesman replied that he did not know but would do his best to find out. As yet we have received no explanation.

The document mentions driver training but says nothing about carrier licensing. It worries me to realise that there is no licensing requirement for any vehicle weighing less than 3.5 tonnes. The requirement is simply a notion of some sort of training, which is not monitored. The danger is that if that is not more tightly regulated it could turn out to be a cowboys' charter and the lads who offer to tarmac our path one day could be trundling radioactive materials past our house the next day, having invested £200 or £300 to make the signs for their vehicle but without meeting any of the standards that we should demand in a system for the movement of radioactive materials with licensing at its core.

The consultation document still does not mention an obligation to notify anyone about the frequency or direction of road transport movements. I fail to understand why that should be so. It does not seem to me a party political point at all. I can see no interest on either side of the House that would be served by the lack of a requirement to notify public authorities and especially the emergency services of the movement of radioactive materials on public roads.

In the context not only of today's 600,000 road traffic movements but of the near certainty that that number will increase, a publicly notified and regulated set of procedures to govern the terms and frequency of such movements is essential. We need a statutory framework, and it should consist of four elements.

First, there must be prior notification of the police, the fire services and other emergency services which would be involved in clearing up an accident involving the transport of nuclear materials. They need to know in advance what plans there are for such movements. Secondly, there should be a requirement for prior consultations with the public bodies through whose areas the loads would be transported. That is a simple matter of common sense.

If Nottinghamshire county council had been asked for its suggestions about the safest and most acceptable routes along which to move radioactive materials through the county, it would have provided that information—and I doubt whether it would have directed such loads through the built-up urban areas that the lorry was passing on the night of 26 June. It would have suggested a route avoiding densely populated areas rather than passing through them simply because that might be a few minutes quicker.

The county council would also have been able to offer, through the police, a form of guided transport through the county, or through the city of Nottingham. That could be done if there were an obligation to notify in advance. At present, it cannot be done because no such obligation exists. I cannot see any suggested framework being workable or acceptable to the public if it is not attached to a strict licensing system for the carriers of nuclear materials. It is not enough to know where the load will end up, although I accept that there are huge issues about where the load will end up and how it is to be disposed. There should be public concern, and concern among Members of Parliament, about the quality, reputation and experience of carriers involved in the transport of radioactive materials.

Finally, a point must be changed in relation to the wording of the consultative document about public risk. As it stands, the document refers only to environmental damage. There are experienced people in this House, around the country and internationally who understand that measuring public damage from exposure to radioactive materials in many cases comes many years after the damage has been done, so it is singularly unhelpful to have that as a benchmark of the Government's consultative document. It would be far better to build in a requirement which defines the prohibition of unauthorised releases of radioactive materials into the environment. That recommendation has been made by public authorities around the country to the Minister, and I hope that he will take it on board.

Accidents such as the one which occurred at Nottingham should not happen, but in a country where we will face an increasing volume of road traffic movements involving radioactive materials we must accept that there is a risk that we cannot entirely eliminate. We must establish an ethical basis for allowing such movements to take place, and we must build two things into the system. First, the public and local authorities have a right to know about movements taking place through the environment which are potentially affecting their lives. Secondly, we need a legal framework which offers the highest standards of public protection at a reasonable cost. We are not talking about something that is likely to cost a great deal, but about a framework that could change the process from a clandestine, inadequate and ill-informed one into one that is open and above board.

The House must ensure that a fully informed response mechanism exists to deal with accidents involving the transportation of nuclear waste. That, rather than a farce, is what the public have a right to expect of this House. We do not have the right to expose the public to unnecessary risks because we will not provide a regulatory framework. Nor have we the right to expose members of the emergency services to unnecessary risks by not telling them in advance the nature and contents of loads, the frequency of traffic movements and the times and directions of the loads being transported. A small regulatory requirement could produce a huge benefit to the public, and that is the duty that the House must meet.

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): Whether we like it or not, we live in the nuclear age. The genie cannot be put back in the bottle and the discoveries of nuclear scientists cannot be undiscovered. Nor should they, as the peaceful uses of nuclear energy have bestowed enormous benefits upon mankind, especially in the generation of electrical energy, upon which all modern societies depend for the health, welfare and well-being of their citizens.

We must do everything we can to save energy and use it most efficiently, but there will always be a need for large-scale generation. The generation of electricity by nuclear means is enormously safe and does not create carbon dioxide or emissions of nitrous oxide which, as we all know, are damaging to the environment. The safety record of the nuclear industry in this country is second to none.

When nuclear materials are used, waste is created, and proper facilities must be provided for the disposal of that waste. Much of the low-level nuclear waste that has been referred to by the hon. Members for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) and for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson) is generated by hospitals. While there is always a danger in handling nuclear materials, the benefits in terms of the lives saved and prolonged and the improvements in the quality of life from the use of nuclear materials in our hospitals outweigh the dangers that those materials pose to society.

This is an emotive issue. Whenever one uses the word "nuclear", the emotional level is raised. That is possibly because of the connotations of nuclear weapons and explosions and the terrible suffering caused in Hiroshima and Nagasaki, not only by the explosions but by the subsequent radiation. Organisations such as Greenpeace use that emotion to the best possible advantage in pursuit of their case.

Greenpeace has established such a position in the world that, to some people, everything that Greenpeace says is right while everything that the Government say is wrong. I do not think that that is the case. Greenpeace has a role to play in bringing our attention to environmental dangers, but it was wrong about the incidence of cancer in the Sellafield area and about the emission of dioxins from high-temperature incineration, and it grossly exaggerated the environmental effects of the Braer disaster. Greenpeace is not always right.

I am concerned that organisations such as Greenpeace are flourishing in the area of what is called direct action, where a group of people decide that something shall or shall not be done, bypass the democratic process and seek to impose their will on their fellow citizens. That is not the way to proceed in a democratic society. The place in this country where decisions must be made affecting all of our citizens is here in this House. We do not live in the age of the suffragettes or the Tolpuddle martyrs, when thousands of our fellow citizens were not represented. Decisions affecting our fellow citizens must be made in this House after a full debate in which the House can hear all points of view from Members representing all sections of the community.

I have no particular knowledge of the tip to which the hon. Member for Attercliffe referred, but I was a member of Essex county council at the time of Bradwell, so I have some experience of the issues involved. Low-level waste can be a particularly emotional issue, particularly when it is planned to dispose of it not far from an area of human habitation. But we must not get carried away by emotion or by the "not in my backyard" factor. We are all politicians, and so are local councillors. It is all too easy to jump on to an emotional bandwagon to get oneself elected or re-elected or to promote the interests of one's political party. We must resist those temptations.

We are here as the representatives of the people of this country as a whole, and we must make decisions in the interests of those people and not in the interests of people who happen to live in a particular place at a particular time in history. We have a heavy responsibility not to allow people to believe, as many do today, that it is possible to live in a risk-free society. It is not. We never have lived in a risk-free society, and we never will. Those who believe that death is optional should think again and realise that we live in a real world.

It is easy for us to regulate. Opposition Members have suggested ways in which we might fill 10 or a dozen more pages of the statute book. But we must resist the temptation to regulate and impose unjustifiable burdens on the community and businesses that serve the community. Opposition Members have not pointed to a single incident in which a member of the public's health or safety has been damaged. Given the many hundreds of thousands of movements of nuclear materials around the country, those responsible for that transportation have not demonstrated a bad record.

I am pleased that the nuclear industry has been given the freedom of going into the private sector. I am sure that it will use that freedom with skill and responsibility. The export potential is enormous. I am sure that, if the nuclear installations at Chernobyl had been designed and built by British engineers and operated to British safety standards, the problems that occurred there would not have arisen.

The disposal of nuclear waste is a world problem and those countries which are best equipped to deal with it safely and securely have a responsibility to mankind to perform that function. Safety is paramount in the nuclear industry, as everyone who works in the industry knows. Nuclear materials must be handled to the highest standards and, wherever possible, children must not be exposed to them. Scientists well understand the difference between alpha, gamma and beta emissions, and regulations must be made accordingly. Of course we must have joint training and, within reason, notification, but we must have regard to the costs imposed on the organisations concerned of excessive notification, and we must have clear lines of responsibility when something goes wrong.

Britain can be proud of its nuclear industry and the skill and inventive genius of the men and women who work in it, who have made and will continue to make a vital contribution to the well-being of mankind throughout the world.

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point): The transport and management of nuclear materials, where it is within the control of, for instance, British Nuclear Fuels Ltd., is conducted in a professional and responsible manner. That needs to be put on the record in view of some of the scaremongering comments made by Opposition Members.

As time is short, I shall concentrate on just one issue: waste substitution and BNFL's part in it. BNFL first proposed waste substitution to the Government in 1988. Since then, there has been considerable consultation, particularly that on the thermal oxide reprocessing plant, which was carried out by the Department of the Environment in 1993. The most recent consultation was carried out this year during the Government's review of radioactive waste management in the United Kingdom, when more than 250 representations were received from individual organisations.

This issue has therefore been well aired and carefully considered by the Government, who have now endorsed the waste substitution philosophy as the agreed, sensible and commonsense approach to returning nuclear waste to overseas customers. I welcome the fact that, in their White Paper on radioactive waste management policy, the Government fully accept the principle of waste substitution and integrate BNFL's proposals within their nuclear waste policy. So BNFL can now engage in waste substitution for intermediate and low-level waste. It can have detailed discussions with customers about returning their waste in the most effective, practical and safe manner.

It might help if I outline some of the considerations surrounding waste substitution. The radioactivity contained within overseas customers' low and intermediate-level waste, which would be retained in the UK, will never be greater than the extra high-level waste that would be returned to customers. The required number of nuclear waste shipments overseas, which means shipments in this country as well, would therefore be cut from 1,000 to just 100—that is, decimated. That also saves the burning of 1.25 million tonnes of fuel oil, which would yield considerable improvements in terms of safety and economics. Although that is self-evident, let me spell out some of those improvements.

It would reduce transport and handling costs by several hundred million pounds and put BNFL in a strong position to win the £2 billion to £4 billion-worth of further export business that it seeks. Without substitution, BNFL would be at a considerable competitive disadvantage, particularly to Cogema, the French nuclear reprocessor. If BNFL were to get the business, as I hope it does—all hon. Members should hope the same—that would sustain 5,450 additional full-time jobs in the UK well into the next century. That is no small consideration.

The increase in low and intermediate-level waste would amount to less than 8 per cent. of total waste arising in the UK, and that waste could be easily accommodated in the Nirex repository without expanding it. Indeed, it amounts to only 5 per cent. of the capacity of the proposed repository. Since BNFL made its first waste substitution proposals, the volumes of waste arising each year at Sellafield have been cut by 30 per cent. through a programme of waste minimisation, which should be continued. If it is, as I believe that it will be, further substantial volume savings will be achievable.

Those are all important considerations. I congratulate the Government on their pragmatic, safety-first and putting-Britain-first approach to this problem. As my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen) said, the problem will not go away, so we must deal with it effectively. I urge the Government to set an early start date for the Nirex repository, as that would deal with some of the issues that Opposition Members have raised and would be in the best interests of the public, the industry and our economy.

Ms Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) on securing this important debate and on setting out so clearly the concerns of his constituents about disposal to landfill. I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson), who expressed his constituents' concern for safety in the transportation of nuclear materials.

This debate has focused on civil nuclear power generation and its waste, and waste arising from medical processes, but as the hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen) reminded us, there is a link with the military programme. In an energy-rich nation such as Britain, the costs of a civil nuclear power programme would never have been justified had it not been for that link. Today, the many reasons advanced in favour of nuclear power should not blind us to the fact that it has been an enormously expensive programme that has depended entirely on the public purse and given rise to lethal waste products.

Dealing with that waste presents a legacy for the future, which stretches far beyond the imagination of anyone here today. That is why ordinary people are, rightly, deeply concerned about both Government and commercial activities in this sector, and particularly about the secrecy that surrounds them.

As with all waste, the first discipline should be minimisation. Given that neither the present Administration nor the Opposition see a case for supporting new nuclear power stations, it is conceivable that, over a period, nuclear waste production may diminish. However, decommissioning of old nuclear power stations and obsolete military hardware means that the problem is likely to get worse.

It is difficult to obtain meaningful figures for nuclear waste. Nuclear waste is divided into three categories—high, intermediate and low level. Only low-level nuclear waste is disposed of. The other two categories are stored, as no safe method of disposal has been developed.

Will the Minister give us a clear account of the extent of radioactive waste production and future projections? Will he tell us whether the Government continue to stand by the 1991 inventory of radioactive wastes—that is, projected to 2030, that there would be 8,180 cu m of high-level waste, 208,000 cu m of intermediate-level waste and 1,420,000 cu m of low-level waste—and will he say whether that includes waste from the military programme? Will the Minister give us the projected costs of nuclear waste disposal and storage both from the civil and military programmes?

The safe decommissioning of obsolete nuclear installations presents us with a major challenge and a colossal cost—originally a cost recognised by Government, but now set aside in the drive to sell off anything to raise money for tax cuts.

Dr. Spink indicated dissent.

Ms Ruddock: Yes; it is true.

Privatisation of the nuclear industry would be an act of gross irresponsibility. Major questions should be asked, not only about operational safety in a privatised industry, but about the enormously expensive disposal, storage and transport of nuclear waste arising from that industry.

Mr. Stephen: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Ruddock: I cannot; there is no time.

The most extraordinary aspect of all the Government's plans to sell off the nuclear industry is that they dispose of public assets—no doubt yet again providing opportunities for fat cats to avail themselves of massive share options—while retaining at the taxpayer's expense all the current major liabilities of decommissioning the Magnox reactors.

In 1993, the National Audit Office report on the cost of decommissioning nuclear facilities estimated liabilities to Nuclear Electric, Scottish Nuclear and BNFL at £15 billion at 1992 prices, but will the Minister confirm that the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority's liabilities are estimated at a further £8 billion and that the generators' and BNFL's liabilities for management of spent fuel and nuclear waste are estimated at an even higher figure than those that would arise from decommissioning? Taking all the categories together, will the Minister confirm that the gross lifetime cost of discharging nuclear liabilities is well in excess of £40 billion?

The Government, in retaining public responsibility for decommissioning the old power stations, are acknowledging that private industry will not pick up that price. What guarantee have we that in future a privatised industry will safely conduct those enterprises, dispose of the waste and so on? Is it not a fact that recently, faulty bloodbags have made a nonsense of the privatisation that is occurring within the national health service, and that in future, similar risks might be taken with potentially cheaper fuel flasks? Privatisation will exacerbate the already difficult, dangerous and costly problems of disposing and storing nuclear waste.

As to transport, the local authority associations said in their evidence to the nuclear review:

> "Every proposal for storage or disposal of radioactive material away from the site of origin . . . involves potential risks to the areas through which the material is to be transported to its next resting place—a factor which is equally relevant when the station is ultimately decommissioned".

The fears that the local authority associations expressed in that evidence have been well documented and spelt out by my hon. Friends in their speeches today.

We are deeply worried about the continuing incidents and accidents that do occur, no matter what the Government tell us. The National Radiological Protection Board records that, between 1964 and 1990, there were 406 transport accidents and incidents, 65 of which they identify as significant in terms of the severity or radiological consequences. This year, there has been a considerable number of disturbing incidents.

In March, Greenpeace discovered an unattended lorry containing spent nuclear fuel rods from Chapelcross. What is the Minister's reaction to the fact that the driver and security guards of that vehicle had taken a tea break?

Only a week later, a 22-tonne lorry carrying low-level waste overturned on the M5 north of Bristol. I am told that, as recently as last Friday, a train transporting nuclear waste from Dungeness to Sellafield was taken into a siding at Rugby because of "weird noises emanating from a fuel flask." Can the Minister confirm that incident and tell us what happened?

Nuclear waste transport is a cause of considerable anxiety in my constituency, through which irradiated nuclear fuel from Dungeness is carried on the Hither Green-Lewisham-Nunhead line twice a week, passing through highly populated areas and unstaffed and insecure stations. What does privatisation of the railways mean for the safety of that transport, given that we already know of a catalogue of incidents at the very least, if not potentially serious accidents?

Finally, I shall comment on the White Paper. Like my hon. Friends, I have questions for the Minister. We are told that the Government favour land disposal for the long-term management of vitrified high-level waste. Will the Minister tell us what is meant by > "putting in hand the steps to develop and implement the necessary research strategy"?

What is the time scale—when will the development of that much-needed facility take place?

[Ms Ruddock]

Will the Minister confirm something to which one of his hon. Friends alluded today—that the Government are prepared to allow high-level foreign nuclear waste to be stored in the United Kingdom?

Low-level nuclear waste was comprehensively discussed in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Attercliffe. His anxiety and that of his constituents about the possibility of disposal to landfill are entirely understandable. I trust that the Minister will reply to the pertinent questions that my hon. Friend posed, and those that were asked by myself and my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South.

As the debate has shown, although we all have good reason to celebrate the victory of public pressure and good sense over landfill of low-level nuclear waste, major worries remain about the transport and safe disposal of a huge volume of highly dangerous and toxic nuclear waste.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. James Clappison): I am glad to have the opportunity to wind up a debate on an important and interesting subject, and to have the opportunity to respond to the arguments of the hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts). I am also glad to have had the opportunity to listen to the constructive and realistic points of view that were expressed by my hon. Friends the Members for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen) and for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) in their speeches.

Dr. Spink: It is extremely remiss of us that none of us have welcomed this most noble and honourable Minister to his new position.

Mr. Stephen: May I associate myself with those remarks?

Ms Ruddock: May I do so also?

Mr. Clappison: I am overcome by the kindness that has suddenly been showered on me from all directions.

As the House has heard, last week the Government published a White Paper containing the final conclusions of its review of radioactive waste management policy. The review was announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment in May 1994, and preliminary conclusions were published in a consultation paper in August 1994, to which the hon. Member for Attercliffe has referred at length. The final conclusions have been reached in the light of the responses that were received.

The purpose of the review was to examine policy in the light of changes since the Government's national strategy on radioactive waste management was published in 1984. The primary aim throughout has been to ensure that radioactive waste, irrespective of whether it is produced by public sector or private sector operations, is properly managed, and to ensure that people and the environment are not exposed to unacceptable risks now or in future. Those are the underlying principles.

As the House has heard, there are a number of categories of radioactive waste ranging from very low-level waste—including that to which the hon. Gentleman referred—from research or medicine, to high-level waste from the reprocessing of spent nuclear fuel. The waste has the potential to cause harm and needs to be managed carefully.

The Government are committed to maintaining and developing a policy which ensures that radioactive wastes are not created unnecessarily; that such wastes as are created are managed and treated safely and appropriately; and that they are then safely disposed of at appropriate times and in appropriate ways. The Government will do that by means of a regulatory framework which ensures that producers and owners of radioactive waste fully meet their responsibilities and develop appropriate waste management strategies.

The Environment Bill, which is currently before Parliament, contains provisions that will streamline the handling of applications to dispose of radioactive wastes for nuclear licensed sites in England and Wales by making the new Environment Agency the sole authoriser, with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Welsh Office as statutory consultees. The White Paper also says that developers of major projects may, if they wish, submit early applications for disposal authorisations and the regulators will then be able to decide on them before major commitments of money and effort have been made.

The review has confirmed the Government's commitment to disposal rather than indefinite storage of radioactive waste as the best means of meeting our commitments to future generations and therefore contributing to sustainable development. In the case of high-level waste, which British Nuclear Fuels plc is converting from liquid into glass, the waste must be stored for at least 50 years to allow for the short-lived radionuclides to decay and heat generation to reduce. However, after that the Government favour disposal to geological formations on land as the best option for the long term. We have said that we will put in hand the development of a research strategy to help us produce a statement of future intent, setting out the decisions to be taken and the milestones to be achieved.

In the case of intermediate-level waste, the Government consider it appropriate that Nirex should continue with its programme to identify a suitable site for a deep disposal facility. The Government have decided that no advantage would be gained from delaying the development of the repository itself and that, once a suitable site has been found, it should be constructed as soon as reasonably practicable. The precise timetable will depend on the granting of planning consent and compliance with regulatory requirements, including the establishment of a sound safety case. The Government have already promised to hold a full public inquiry into an application for the repository.

Disposal routes are already available for low-level waste which, depending on its concentration and level of activity, may go to BNFL's shallow disposal facility at Drigg in Cumbria or for "controlled burial" at suitable landfill sites.

I shall deal now with the points raised by the hon. Member for Attercliffe. A large number of members of the public have expressed concern about controlled burial. That form of disposal has been used for many years by non-nuclear industries which process raw materials containing natural radioactivity, and by major hospitals and universities for their relatively more active waste streams. The hon. Gentleman will be familiar with the disposals by hospitals in Sheffield to the tip at Beighton, to which he referred. That method has also been used by BNFL for waste from its uranium enrichment and fuel fabrication plants and, at its Sellafield site, for lightly contaminated excavation spoil.

A site usually receives waste for controlled burial from no more than one or two sources. In considering an application for controlled burial, the regulators assess not only the type and activity of the waste but the containment characteristics of the site to which it is to be sent. If an authorisation is granted, the regulators also arrange for leachate from the sites to be monitored and for the results to be published.

It was proposed in the preliminary conclusions of the review that there would be an advantage in encouraging waste producers to make greater use of controlled burial in order to relieve needless pressure on the disposal capacity of BNFL's disposal facility at Drigg in Cumbria. Contrary to reports made at the time, that would not require new legislation; nor would it involve deregulation of the nuclear industry, as the route is already open to it and disposals would continue to be strictly controlled by the regulators. That is a very important point and the hon. Gentleman referred to it. There is a very tight system of regulation in place.

Although the proposal was supported by the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee and the National Radiological Protection Board, the Government have recognised the genuine anxieties that their proposal has aroused among local residents and, for that reason, they have decided not to encourage greater use of controlled burial by the nuclear industry. Nevertheless, there are sound economic and radiological grounds for controlled burial and the Government believe that it should continue to be available as a disposal route, particularly for "small users"—such as hospitals, universities, research laboratories and non-nuclear industries—subject to the agreement of the site operators and to the necessary regulatory requirements being met.

I shall now deal in more detail with the points raised by the hon. Member for Attercliffe. He recognised and noted very fairly the Government's response in the White Paper following the consultations that have gone on since last August. The hon. Gentleman has clearly been involved in making representations and in the discussions that have taken place. The issues have been ventilated, and the hon. Gentleman will know from reading the White Paper that, while the Government recognise that nuclear waste can be disposed of safely in that type of landfill operation, they have made it clear that they are responding to public anxieties and the sorts of views expressed by the hon. Gentleman and are not encouraging the nuclear industry to use that disposal method. That point is plainly on the face of the White Paper.

The White Paper contains positive proposals for inviting the environment agencies to offer suggestions for making more transparent the information about which landfill sites receive such waste and for issuing formal guidance to the agencies about the need to consult local authorities about authorisations for controlled burial. The Government have no proposals to introduce legislation which would force private operators or local authority waste disposal companies to accept radioactive waste. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be reassured by the White Paper on that point.

The White Paper proposes a policy of national self-sufficiency in dealing with radioactive waste. The Government believe that countries which are sophisticated enough to have a nuclear industry should also be able to develop their own waste facilities and that accepting their waste would reduce the incentive for them to develop facilities of their own. On the other hand, countries should not be precluded from taking advantage of the non-nuclear uses of radioactivity, such as medical diagnosis and treatment, simply because they do not have the resources to develop waste facilities. Equally, there may be sound technical reasons why waste should be imported for treatment, provided that there is no environmental detriment to the importing country. Certain exceptions will therefore be allowed.

Consistent with their policy of self-sufficiency is the Government's requirement that BNFL should exercise its return-of-waste clauses in contracts with foreign customers for the reprocessing of spent fuel. The Government have accepted that that policy can be implemented by waste substitution arrangements which ensure broad environmental neutrality for the United Kingdom, but they consider it prudent that they do not become irrevocably committed to waste substitution in the absence of appropriate disposal arrangements within the United Kingdom.

In agreeing equivalence between categories of waste, some additional high-level waste should also be returned over and above that calculated on radiological grounds alone in order to account for some minor non-radiological environmental consequences of substitution. Substitution does not mean that the United Kingdom will become a "nuclear dustbin", as some have alleged—far from it. The Government are adopting a properly cautious approach to ensure that there will be no environmental or radiological detriment to this country.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson) raised the question of transport. I apologise for dealing with it only briefly, but time is pressing. A strict regime is in place. Responsibility for policy concerning the safe transport of radioactive materials, including waste, is a matter for my right hon Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

The movement of waste is governed by regulations recommended by the International Atomic Energy Agency. The purpose of the IAEA regulations is to ensure that the packaging for transport should adequately protect transport workers and the public under all foreseeable circumstances, including the occurrence of a severe accident. Rather than requiring the use of special vehicles or special routes, the regulations ensure that appropriate safety is built into the design of the package in which the radioactive material is carried.

The regulations specify design performance standards which are independent of the means of transport. Where the radioactivity to be contained exceeds specified levels, the standards include tests for demonstrating the ability of the container to withstand damage from involvement in a severe accident without any significant release of its contents or an increase in external radiation.

A national scheme, called the nuclear industry road emergency response plan, has been put in place to provide contingency arrangements in the event of a road accident involving radioactive materials. Its participants include a number of important publicly recognised organisations such as the Ministry of Defence, Nuclear Electric,

[Mr. Clappison]

Rolls-Royce and Associates and Scottish Nuclear. Those organisations have agreed to dispatch qualified health physicists from the nearest organisation to deal immediately with any incident.

I shall write to the hon. Member for Nottingham, South setting out the details. I shall also write to the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms Ruddock) who raised many detailed points. It is a serious subject that involves long-range planning—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. We must move on to the next topic.

Foetal Pain

1 pm

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for enabling me to raise this issue in the House today. I also thank Madam Speaker and the Minister, who is in his place. I draw his attention to the all-party early-day motion 1380 tabled today by myself, the right Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) and the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), who is in his place. It draws attention to the recommendation of Dr. Maria Fitzgerald in a report commissioned by the Department of Health that "the effects of trauma of any kind to the developing nervous system should be minimised as far as possible by whatever means are available."

The Minister should be congratulated on his Department's response to date on the issue of foetal pain. Let me explain the background. In 1988, the Department of Health commissioned a report from Dr. Fitzgerald, of the department of anatomy and developmental biology at University college, London—to whom I have just referred—on the evidence for foetal pain.

In 1994, a team led by Professor Fisk of the centre for foetal care at Queen Charlotte and Chelsea hospital, published pioneering work on "the level of response in the unborn to potentially painful procedure; intrauterine needling".

Its research concluded:

"The human foetus feels pain in utero and may benefit from anaesthetic or analgesia for invasive procedures."

In the light of that research, Dr. Fitzgerald updated her report, and, in response to a question from the right hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten)—who I am pleased to see in his place and to whom I am grateful for his encouragement and support in promoting this cause in the House—the Department lodged a copy of its findings in the Library of the House.

Dr. Fitzgerald finally concluded:

"It cannot be denied that the foetal nervous system mounts clear protective responses to tissue injury and this cannot be ignored . . . If a foetus or a pre-term infant is to survive and mature into an adult it is essential to consider this issue. The effects of trauma of any kind on the developing nervous system should be minimised as far as possible by whatever means are available."

Today's debate is in response to that report. I should stress immediately that the debate is about foetal pain, and not about the Abortion Act 1967. My position on that legislation is perfectly clear, and I have never tried to hide it. However, there are a hundred and one other intra-uterine operations which can cause pain to the foetus.

Surely no one in the House would not wish to combat pain and suffering wherever they occur. As a parent, I have watched my own children on the ultrascan. For many of us, that is an increasingly common introduction to the wonders of the developing human being. I saw one of my sons at nine weeks' gestation, and I saw my daughter at 18 weeks' gestation. By that stage, the child is about a foot in length and pumping 50 pints of blood a day. Every single one of its organs is in place. The child is sentient, and responds to light and sound. It is most extraordinary that, with the aid of science, we can now see those marvellous developments in human characteristics.

There is no difference between a child at that stage in its development and any person in the Chamber, other than in terms of size and weight.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): The hon. Gentleman will know that I gave my maiden speech on this subject. It is an extremely important issue. Does he recall the film "The Silent Scream", which was produced seven or eight years ago, and was never given the coverage that it deserved? It proved quite conclusively that everyone in Britain and throughout the world should be considering that it is proven beyond doubt that the foetus feels pain, and something should be done to protect it from that pain.

Mr. Alton: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that point. The film "The Silent Scream", and others like it, are subject almost to a conspiracy of silence. I cannot understand why it was never shown on our national television network, especially when one considers some of the programmes that are broadcast. We see every medical procedure known to mankind, so it is extraordinary that such a programme has not been given a wider audience.

I hope that, as a result of today's debate, others may take the time to search out that film and see it, but unfortunately—this corroborates what the hon. Gentleman has just said—there are those who attempt to sweep under the carpet the facts about foetal pain. That may explain why, despite the existence of evidence of foetal pain since the 1960s, we have statute law protecting foetal, larval or embryonic animals from any scientific procedure likely to cause pain, but none to protect the human foetus in the womb.

It seems extraordinary to me that, although some people and hon. Members find it credible that animal foetuses can feel pain, others balk at the notion that the human foetus also feels pain. I refer the House to the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, for which most of us voted. It states:

"Subject to the provisions of this section, 'a protected animal' for the purposes of this Act means any living vertebrate other than man."

It continues:

"Subject to the provisions of this section, 'a regulated procedure' for the purposes of this Act means any experimental or other scientific applied to a protected animal which may have the effect of causing that animal pain, suffering, distress or lasting harm."

In the debate about when life ends, it states:

"For the purposes of this section an animal shall be regarded as continuing to live until the permanent cessation of circulation or the destruction of its brain."

I cannot help thinking wryly that only when a seal is washed up on our shores holding a placard saying "Save the human race" will we see the illogicality of the decisions that we take. Crucial and important as animal welfare may be, the same rules should apply to our own species.

In an attempt to blur the issue, there are even attempts to argue that pain is almost a metaphysical experience, based on understanding and memory that the human foetus has not had the opportunity to develop. I hope that we can lay such bunkum to rest once and for all. I refer the House in particular to the pioneering work of Professor Kenneth McAull on the issue of foetal memory.

Pain is a physical fact. There are thousands of patients suffering from diseases such as Alzheimer's who have no memory or understanding of their plight. Despite that, they can experience physical pain, and any doctor who suggested otherwise would be in severe trouble.

The old chestnuts used to describe the human foetus as "a blob of jelly" or "a clump of cells" have long since been shown to be a parody of science. A human being, however small, who can react to light and disturbance and even show taste preferences, could never be described as a jelly.

There is more bad science peddled on the subject. Some attempt to argue that the foetus can feel pain only through the cerebral cortex. That notion is wildly outdated, following the most recent research showing that it is in the lower part of the brain, the thalamus, that pain receptors discharge electrical impulses telling the body to react to trauma and noxious stimuli. The earliest response from the thalamus occurs at the end of the seventh week of pregnancy.

Those who attempt to dismiss foetal ability to feel pain should take a lesson in science from Baroness Warnock and the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists. When Baroness Warnock and her committee were attempting to settle a time limit for destructive experiments on the human embryo, one factor that they took into account was the embryo's capacity to feel pain. They state in their report:

"As long as the embryo is incapable of feeling pain, it is argued that its treatment does not weigh in the balance.".

The report concludes:

"The time limit for research on the embryo could be set either when the first beginnings of the central nervous system can be identified or when functional activity first occurs."

Expert evidence was sought from the Royal College of Gynaecologists, and the Warnock committee reported its findings:

"The Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists suggested that embryos should not be allowed to develop in vitro beyond a limit of seventeen days, as this is the point at which early neural development begins."

In the light of that, and the recommendations not only of Professor Fisk's team but of the Department's own report, I suggest to the Minister modest and reasonable action that he could take that would settle the matter, I hope, once and for all.

First, a circular could be issued to health authorities and to doctors, drawing their attention to the conclusions of the latest research and recommending action to anaesthetise foetuses before any invasive procedure, such as needling or intra-uterine surgery liable to cause trauma to the foetus. Secondly, in the interest of a fully informed decision, any parents who are considering giving permission for such procedures should be alerted to the possibility that pain will be inflicted on their unborn child.

If such action was properly and promptly taken, and adequately complied with, it might not then prove necessary to write pain prevention for the human foetus into statute, as it is at the moment with animals. I should also warn the Minister that, if such action is not taken, this issue will not go away, and legislation may be the only way to ensure that the suffering and the pain currently inflicted on the foetus will be alleviated.

1.11 pm

Mr. John Patten (Oxford, West and Abingdon): I am glad to have the chance to intervene briefly and to make three points. First, I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister and his predecessors in the Department of Health on taking this issue seriously; on immediately bringing before the House, in May this year, the most recent Department of Health report; on laying it in the Library; on making it publicly available; and on ensuring that there is no cover-up of the information that is available. My hon. Friend deserves our congratulations on that.

My second point flows directly from the first. The information is publicly available and the Department of health has, I understand, accepted the report that foetuses feel pain during various procedures in the uterus. Just suppose that information had been made publicly available that a drugs company had a product on the market, a product that was used by pregnant women and caused pain to the foetus. Imagine the uproar that there would have been: early-day motions in this place; screaming headlines about a new drugs company scandal; learned leaders opining that something must be done; and Ministers dragged from their beds early in the morning on to the "Today" programme to explain why nothing had been done.

I do not suggest that there is a conspiracy of silence by the media about this issue—after all, the report has been available for many weeks—but I have seen no mention of it in the public prints. I suggest to the House that there is a blanket of silence about the issue, and it should now be brought as quickly as possible to the public notice.

I am sure that the BBC will be giving proper notice tomorrow to the debate. This is a classic issue for my friend, Michael Grade, whom I personally greatly admire, to ensure that it is properly aired, for example, on Channel 4, so that the public are awakened to something that would be seen as a scandal if a drugs company were involved, but over which a heavy blanket of silence has been drawn.

Thirdly, I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister would not seek to say that nothing should be done after the report. The first and most important thing to be done, as a matter of urgency in the coming weeks and months, is to give guidance to doctors, health authorities and trusts, and to private clinics as well, about the evidence shown by the report, to minimise the pain that foetuses may experience in all sorts of procedures, not just abortion. That is a matter of prime urgency.

Clear guidance should also be given to those who counsel mothers and fathers considering an abortion. One of the factors they should bear in mind and weigh in the balance when making that terrible decision—which many take but from which quite a few draw back—is that the procedure they are permitting and encouraging to go forward will involve pain to an unborn child.

They should have a clear understanding of that. It is a matter of prime importance. It is a considerable humanitarian issue, and the House expects a rapid reaction from Her Majesty's Government on it.

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point) rose—

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. Can I be clear that hon. Members who are now seeking to catch my eye have the permission both of the organiser of the debate and of the Minister? It is also usual to inform the Chair in advance.

1.14 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): I am sorry about that, Madam Deputy Speaker, because, as you know, I am always very deferential to the Chair.

The right hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten) referred to do a conspiracy of silence. I believe that there is a conspiracy of silence. The reality is that it does not suit those who argue the right to choose—as freely as they would wish to exercise it—to have to consider the implications of foetal pain. That is the real world. It is an argument that is going on in America, here, and no doubt in other parts of western Europe. Only by publicising the issue will women face up to the responsibility of having to consider the implications of late abortion.

1.15 pm

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point): I congratulate the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) on bringing the debate to the Floor of the House. It is a very important issue.

Although I very much respect the hon. Gentleman's intention not to focus on abortion this morning, we cannot ignore the fact that many methods of abortion will bring pain and much suffering to a foetus. We heard quite graphically about how a foetus can experience suffering and pain.

I would therefore ask the House to reflect on the attitude of women who sign up to the Labour party's "Emily's List", because, I believe, one of the conditions for signing that list is that the women who do so have to accept that they are pro-abortion, and that that has certain implications. That needs further investigation, and we should look at it extremely carefully, because it is an important area. It is something that the country deserves to learn about.

I thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for giving me the opportunity of raising that issue.

1.16 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tom Sackville): I congratulate the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) on his success in raising a topic which, as we know, he has raised in different ways in the House on many occasions and about which he feels very deeply.

Perhaps I should first make clear the Government's position on abortion, as the matter is germane. Parliament decided that abortions may lawfully be carried out in the circumstances set out in the Abortion Act 1967, as subsequently amended by the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990. The present provisions are in place as a result of a series of free votes in the House in 1967 and again in 1990. It was clear then and it is clear now that there are strongly held and widely differing views on the subject. In spite of that wide divergence, the Government must operate within a framework laid down by Parliament.

We have a duty to ensure that the provisions of the Act are properly applied until and unless Parliament chooses to change that law. In England, the operation of the Act is monitored closely by the Department of Health, through the Department's control of the private sector, and the investigation of specific complaints. Similar arrangements apply in Scotland and Wales. Last year, the Department of Health reviewed and updated its arrangements for improving and inspecting places approved under the Abortion Act.

All medical practitioners carrying out terminations are required to notify the chief medical officer of each abortion they perform. The notification form includes the grounds for abortion, the method of treatment and the estimated gestation—that last point being particularly relevant to the matter that we are discussing today. The notification forms are scrutinised by staff authorised by the chief medical officer, to ensure that they do not indicate any contravention of the abortion law.

I am setting out the details of the Department's monitoring activities, because it is important for the House to understand the context and framework within which we operate. Monitoring is not a passive activity.

The Government do not take their responsibilities in this area lightly. We are conscious of the turmoil and worry that women face when they undergo termination of a pregnancy. We are sensitive to the feelings of those who oppose abortion. For many women, it is a tragic and difficult decision they face: it is no easy option. We recognise the importance of counselling for the women concerned, and all centres carrying out abortion or providing advice on abortion have guidelines on this important prerequisite. Furthermore, if an abortion has to take place, distressing though that may be, the earlier in pregnancy the better for all concerned.

There have been developments since the 1967 Act. The viability of the foetus at 24 weeks has been recognised, and for the great majority of cases that is the upper limit for termination. Medical, in contrast to surgical, termination has become available. In other words, for late terminations, drugs can be used to terminate the pregnancy instead of surgery.

Mr. Alton: As the Minister is setting out the record, I am sure that he will also want to make it clear that, since 1990, abortion is allowed right up to and even during birth on a handicapped baby.

Mr. Sackville: I am aware of that, but I reiterate that the vast majority of terminations are much earlier.

Some people who oppose abortion claim that those who accept it simply have no regard for human life. That is not the case for the Government.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Will the Minister bring his speech to the issue of foetal pain, which is what we are here to debate?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): I have been following carefully, and my understanding was that the Minister was seeking to sketch in the background. One must also bear in mind the fact that there is rather more latitude in Adjournment debates than there might be on other occasions.

Mr. Sackville: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I want to illustrate the fact that the Government listen to all views by reminding the House that the Department of Health responded quickly to representations from the hon. Member for Mossley Hill on the disposal of foetuses after termination of pregnancy. All centres carrying out termination have clear instructions. Full account must be taken of any personal wishes expressed. I am sure that all hon. Members accept that respect is due to the dead foetus based on its loss of potential for development into a fully formed human being.

We must always take the humane view in all aspects of the termination of pregnancy. For that reason, the topic raised by the hon. Gentleman for debate this afternoon deserves careful consideration, the question being whether the foetus experiences pain.

The House has heard today mention of an article in The Lancet of 9 July 1994 entitled "Fetal Plasma Cortisol and Beta—endorphin response to intra-uterine needling". The work reported in The Lancet is a welcome addition to our knowledge on the subject. However, one of the dangers with any such issue is that conclusions may be jumped to which are not justified by the evidence. Therefore, let us consider for a moment the main conclusions of the article.

The studies involved relate to life-saving blood transfusions before a baby was born, not to abortion. One process required the passing of a needle which carried the blood into the foetus's abdomen. That process was compared with another whereby the blood transfusion was via the umbilical cord. The comparison is important, because the umbilical cord has no nerves.

The hormonal response was then measured—the actual measurement being the concentration of cortisol and beta-endorphin, the substances referred to in the title of the article in The Lancet. A known physiological response to stress is the production of those substances in the blood.

The researchers found that in neither case did the concentrations of cortisol and beta-endorphin increase in the first 10 minutes of the transfusion. However, after 10 minutes, a substantial increase was observed when the transfusion was via the abdomen of the foetus. The study suggests that the foetus mounts a hormonal stress response to invasive procedures. What the study does not tell us is whether the foetus can be said to feel pain.

Other studies have shown that those parts of the brain that may recognise pain are developing in the second three months of pregnancy, but some of the anatomical changes can be recognised only beyond the end of that period. However, the fundamental question of when the foetus is conscious of feelings remains incompletely resolved.

Mrs. Helen Jackson (Sheffield, Hillsborough): I am grateful now for not being the only woman, besides yourself, Madam Deputy Speaker, in the House today to be considering a subject which is of major importance to women in particular.

Does the Minister agree that the study in The Lancet to which he has referred is a study of foetuses over 23 weeks, and that any connection between that study and a general opposition to the present legal right to abortion in this country would be inappropriate, because late abortions are not only undertaken with extreme distress and unwillingly by women, but also only in rare cases where there is foetal abnormality anyway?

Mr. Sackville: I have already made that distinction clear. Most abortions are now below 24 weeks. There have to be unusual grounds for late abortions.

This is a matter which is clearly worthy of research. The Medical Research Council is always ready to consider soundly based research proposals. In the meantime—

Dr. Spink: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Sackville: I must carry on, because I want to continue my argument.

In the meantime, I feel sure that the study to which the hon. Member for Mossley Hill has drawn attention will have been studied carefully by obstetricians and gynaecologists, as well as anaesthetists who are involved with invasive clinical procedures.

In 1988, a report on sensory development in the human foetus was prepared, as has been said, for the Department by Dr. Maria Fitzgerald in connection with the report of the committee to review the guidance on the research use of foetuses—the Polkinghorne report. In the light of recent interest in the subject, we asked Dr. Fitzgerald to update her earlier commentary. A copy of that updated report has been placed in the Library. It continues to support the view that, up to 26 weeks, the foetus does not feel pain.

A necessary prerequisite for pain perception is considered to be the presence of mature neural pathways to the cortex of the brain. In the human foetus, the relevant nerve fibres begin to reach that cortex only from 26 weeks' gestation. Before that, foetal movement in response to stimuli should be regarded as a reflex involving peripheral nerves and the spinal cord.

All these matters are open to different interpretations. What has appeared in an early-day motion may put Dr. Fitzgerald's recent report in a slightly different light. In its summary and conclusions, she says:

"The existing evidence shows that little sensory input reaches the developing cortex before 26 weeks and therefore these reactions to noxious stimuli cannot be interpreted as 'feeling' or perceiving pain."

While I appreciate what my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten) said about the need to acquaint health authorities and parents with the latest science, I stress that those conclusions do not support the view that, before 26 weeks, foetuses feel or perceive pain. I am afraid that we must view the subject within that context.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. We now move to the next debate.

Gilts and Bonds (Taxation)

1.30 pm

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I welcome my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who now has one of the most fascinating jobs in Government. There is no doubt about the importance of taxation. My hon. Friend has probably already discovered the difficulty of reconciling the various principles: we all want simplification, but we also want fairness. The subject of taxation of gilts and bonds illustrates that difficulty very well.

This may seem a somewhat technical subject, but it is important. A surprising number of private investors have holdings in gilts—three quarters of a million, I understand. Many others have holdings in zero-dividend preference shares, and use both gilts and those other instruments for the purposes of legitimate financial planning arrangements.

When my hon. Friend's predecessor published a consultative document on the subject on 25 May, it provoked considerable interest. I entirely support the twin objectives contained in its proposals. The first was to simplify taxes by sweeping away 100 pages of legislation dealing with the taxation of different financial instruments, and stating that no distinction would be made between capital and revenue in regard to gilts and bonds: the whole lot would be taxed as one.

That was clearly straightforward, but it involved a major extension of tax. I rather agree with The Daily Telegraph, which said yesterday that, if matters were to be simplified, it was probably better to abolish taxes than to extend them. Nevertheless, I support the objective.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young) said:

"The current tax rules for gilts and bonds originate in the 19th century. As the financial markets and the tax system have evolved, more and more special rules have been added."

If that is the case, the whole thing had become very complex.

The second objective was to support the establishment of a gilt strips market, and to facilitate the development of new varieties of bond in the market, to ensure that London remained a leading financial centre. You may not know what "strip" means in this context, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There is a helpful definition at the bottom of page 3 of the Bank of England's consultative document:

"Originally 'stripping' referred to the practice of physically stripping coupons from a bearer bond certificate. As the US market developed, the term 'STRIPS' was employed to stand for Separate Trading of Registered Interest and Principal of Securities."

You are now fully au fait with the term, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

A serious point is embodied in that objective, quite apart from the wish to ensure that London remains a successful financial centre. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) will recall much discussion in the Standing Committee on the Finance Bill earlier in the year about the gilts repo market. All the changes involved the laudable aim of reducing the Government's funding costs by trying to ensure that the instruments available to investors matched their needs as far as possible.

The reform was simple. The idea was, and still is, that all profits should be treated as income and all losses should be relievable. What caused concern was the extension of the proposals to cover private investors. Professional investors can cope with complex financial instruments and, indeed, complex taxation; it is much more difficult for private investors to do so. The document proposed the extension of the proposals to all private investors, subject only to a fairly low threshold: a nominal value of about £20,000-worth of gilts was suggested.

That prompted two sets of concerns, about the substance and about the timetable. I would not say that lower coupon gilts designed for the private sector had been marketed by the Government, but there is no doubt that they were introduced for the benefit of the private investor and, in particular, for higher rate taxpayers, on the understanding that they would not be subject to capital gains tax. There was a problem for those who held gilts individually, and a major problem for collective investment schemes. Many people prefer to invest through either a unit trust or an investment trust.

The second concern related to the fact that people had been asked to respond by 30 June to a consultative document published on 25 May. I believe that, notwithstanding the timetable, some 400 people have responded. My right hon. Friend the Member for Acton said that he would make a decision soon after that date, which prompted a worry about parliamentary consideration: it was clear that, by the time the Finance Bill went into Committee in January next year, all would be signed, sealed and delivered, and we would be considering it retrospectively. We ought to have the opportunity to consider such a major change before its full implementation.

I do not particularly like legislation by press release. It is fair enough if the Inland Revenue discovers some major source of tax avoidance and wants to clamp down on it quickly,. but a major change such as this should not be introduced in a press release. Another important consideration is the operative date: when such changes are made, taxpayers should be allowed a reasonable period in which to reorganise their affairs.

On Monday afternoon, my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary and my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced major alterations to the proposals. I congratulate my hon. Friend on the speed with which he has moved since his appointment to deal with the matter; however, it could be said that, after having to deal with the problems of Cornish fishermen, he finds dealing with the men from the Inland Revenue a doddle.

In Monday's press release, the Chancellor dealt with most of the major concerns expressed by those who commented on the consultative document. The vast majority of private investors will now have to pay income tax on interest only, as a £200,000 threshold is to be introduced. That will leave only 4,000 private investors subject to the new regime. Why, however, does my hon. Friend consider a threshold necessary? Why can there not be a separate regime for private investors generally?

I have received a number of letters from constituents about that. One, who had chosen to invest in gilts the wealth that he had created during a lifetime in business, told me that he had an investment of £1.5 million. I think that we should welcome the fact that people are prepared to support the Government's funding requirement in that way, and I am not sure why my constituent should be subject to the new regime simply because he has a large holding.

None the less, the change is extremely welcome, exempting as it does the vast majority of taxpayers, and so is the proposal—this could be the answer to my constituent, who has such a large holding—to exempt two particular low coupon gilts: the 3.5 per cent. 1999-2004 and 5.5 per cent. 2008-12 because they are held by private investors in particular. I suppose that one could say to my constituent that he could choose to switch into those two, although some cost would be involved.

Unit trusts that are wholly dedicated to gilt and bond investment are also to be excluded from the new regime. That, too, is extremely welcome, as is the fact that zero-coupon preference shares will be excluded. Some details are to be sorted out in relation to the transition. I am sure that my hon. Friend will now be familiar with what is known as the kink test. That will have to be considered. As with all these things, we shall have to ensure that we do not have a regime that is subject to abuse. That is extremely important.

I should like to mention the position of investment trusts, because, unless I have missed something, I do not think that Monday's announcement referred to them. Of course, a number of them also invest in gilts and bonds, and it is therefore not surprising that the Association of Investment Trust Companies is still concerned. A letter that it has sent me today states:

"under the proposed rules investment trusts will be subject to taxation on capital gains on holdings of gilts and bonds.

The key principle underpinning the taxation of investment trusts has always been that, wherever possible, investors should not be any worse off should they choose to invest indirectly through an investment trust, than if they had chosen to invest directly in the underlying investments."

As they presently stand, however:

"The government's proposals would run counter to this principle as investors would be exposed to double taxation".

They would be paying capital gains tax inside the trust, and then capital gains when they sold their shares in the trust. I hope that the Minister will consider that point, because a strong case exists for putting investment trusts on the same footing as unit trusts.

Of course, there is a difficulty when one gets collective investment vehicles that invest partly in gilts and bonds and partly in equities. It is for that reason, and also because it is important that Parliament should have an opportunity to consider the proposals in detail, that the change in the implementation date, which was announced on Monday afternoon, is most welcome.

The proposals will not come into force until 1 April next year for institutions and 6 April for individuals. That will both provide an opportunity for some of the detailed technical matters relating to collective investment vehicles and other matters to be sorted out, and ensure that we have full parliamentary debate on all the details. That is a much more sensible way to proceed.

First, I welcome the change, because the objectives are entirely laudable: secondly, I welcome the amendments that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has proposed, because we will have a sensible system that will allow some simplification—although, inevitably, there will be more legislation than there would have been. As I said, however, that is the problem if one wants to have equity.

[Mr. Tim Smith]

The proposal will encourage the development of the strips market in the City, and reduce the cost of borrowing to the Government.

1.43 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Michael Jack): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) for his kind warm words of welcome. He is entirely right that this is my first appearance in my new role at the Dispatch Box. May I also say how pleased I am that the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) is here as well? I am sure that we will debate matters across the Dispatch Box in perhaps more combative terms than today.

This is not, however, my first parliamentary outing since joining the Treasury, as, within but a few hours of my appointment, I was debating a double taxation agreement on the subject of Bolivia and Belarus. I think that, at that point, I realised, in the nicest sense, what I had let myself in for in transferring my responsibilities from Cornish fishermen, who showed their dissent by throwing things at me, to this more esoteric world. I have yet to find out what angry taxpayers do.

I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this Adjournment debate on this important subject. In considering his correspondence in the Treasury, I am conscious of the substantial amount of campaigning that he has done on this issue on behalf of private investors in gilts and bonds. I also acknowledge his particular interest in tax matters in general, which his opening remarks attested to, and in the special subject of tax simplification.

As my hon. Friend said, not only does this proposal offer us a way forward in that subject, but Monday's announcement shows that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, my right hon. Friend who preceded me in my job and I listened carefully to all the views expressed on this important matter.

Before responding to my hon. Friend's sage remarks on this subject, I hope that the House will allow me to explain briefly what the Treasury hopes to achieve by the reforms outlined in this sector.

There were two main objectives. The first was to simplify the tax rules in this sector to provide a more straightforward and coherent regime. At present, taxpayers must grapple with, as I am discovering, many arcane mysteries: deep gain securities, deep discount securities, qualifying convertible securities, the accrued income scheme, and much, much more. When each set of rules was introduced, there was good reason for it, but the overall effect is now a mountain of complexity, full of anomalies, tax traps for the unwary, and scope for avoidance.

With our announcement on Monday, we see the prospect of major deregulatory gains sweeping away the hundreds of pages of legislation that my hon. Friend referred to, and having a much simpler, shorter and more intelligible tax code as a result.

The second objective is, as my hon. Friend said, to free up the financial markets for new developments. There is a clear demand, from both issuers and investors, for new types of financial investment.

To give just one example, some people have said that they would like to see the issue of "limited price index bonds". Those are bonds where the maturity value is indexed within a pre-set limit. They could be of value in financing large capital projects and in meeting the needs of long-term institutional investors, but at present the tax rules get in the way. My hon. Friend also put his finger on another important point—the potential for the Government to reduce the cost of their borrowing.

Another example is an official market in gilt strips, which again my hon. Friend mentioned. I must admit that I too worried when I first came across that piece of terminology, but he provided us with an extremely good explanation of it. As he said, that is an official facility to trade separately in both the right to capital associated with a gilt, and in the rights to receive interest. Other countries, notably the United States of America and France, have introduced an official strips market with considerable success, but the United Kingdom's current tax rules get in the way of such developments.

There is a clear demand for such innovations, and we need to allow them to take place if the UK is to stay competitive in world financial markets, but it is difficult to cater for them without having some radical tax reform.

Under the proposals, both the Government and private companies can benefit. Companies issuing debt would receive full relief for their borrowing costs. The present obscure distinction between different types of bond will largely disappear, and income and profits received by lenders will be treated as income, with the additional benefit that any capital losses made by lenders will be relieved.

Thus the distinction between capital and income will be removed for bonds. That distinction makes good sense for shares and for real property; it is doubtful whether it makes much sense for bond-type lending, where the likely returns are more predictable from the outset. The result will be a simpler system in which tax factors interfere much less with normal commercial decisions, and in which market innovations such as those I have mentioned can take place.

All that is for companies as issuers and holders of such investments, but we were always clear that something much less sophisticated would be necessary for private investors, and that, for the great majority of them with relatively modest holdings, it would be sensible to continue taxing them, in general, only on interest income, much as now.

To test reactions to the proposals in my hon. Friend's speech, the Inland Revenue and the Bank of England issued consultative papers on 25 May. In response, companies and tax practitioners strongly endorsed the reform in principle for professional investors, but two reservations came through very clearly.

First, there were widespread calls for implementation to be deferred to give a further opportunity for consultation on matters of important detail, and to give the House full scope to examine the results. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield for his comments on that. Deferral will also allow firms and individuals to approach the start date with reasonable certainty about what they are taking on.

Secondly, while the ideas were welcomed by business and the financial markets, concern was expressed by private investors who felt that the proposals might adversely affect them. They were particularly concerned that their investment expectations could be disrupted, as they had planned their existing portfolios against the background of the tax rules that have applied to date. Some called for a higher threshold than the one that was mentioned in the consultation document, while others pressed the particular claims of investors in low-coupon gilts. Others urged us not to disturb the debt/equity borderline, and to leave the current taxation of shares, including zero-coupon preference shares, unchanged.

Those concerns were carefully considered by my predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young), who is now Secretary of State for Transport, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield agrees that those concerns were addressed by the Chancellor's announcement on Monday. I hope that it will be helpful to the House to set out the details of his announcement.

There will be a generous threshold of £200,000 for private investors. That will ensure that probably no more than 4,000 private investors will fall within the scope of the changes. I shall develop that point later in answering my hon. Friend's question about why there should be a line at all above which some private investors will be included.

Two gilts with a particularly low coupon are to be excluded altogether. Those have long been held by private investors, and assurances about their tax treatment were given by a previous Administration. There will be no change in the debt/equity border line. Therefore, there will be no change in the present treatment of zero-coupon preference shares or, indeed, any other type of share. I hope that that underlines the reassurance that my hon. Friend derived from Monday's announcement.

The start date for all these changes has been deferred until April next year. Consultations on the details of the proposals will continue until that date, giving people more opportunity to prepare for the changes and to voice any remaining concerns. I hope that my hon. Friend, who has considerable expertise and interest in these matters, will participate in that exercise. Where valuations are needed, they will be carried out in April 1996.

Some hon. Members have expressed concern about the impact of the changes on collective investment vehicles—in particular on the need to avoid the double taxation of gilts and bonds that are held by such vehicles. My hon. Friend spoke about that. We envisage that unit trusts that are invested predominantly in gilts and bonds will, as taxpayers, be wholly outside the new rules. They will be treated in the hands of investors as a sort of synthetic bond that is subject to the new rules, but included, in the case of private investors, in the generous threshold provisions that we propose.

That ensures that collective schemes will continue to offer efficient access to the full range of PEP opportunities, including corporate bond PEPs which are deservedly attracting so much attention. It also gives bond funds equivalent treatment in competing with direct investment in gilts and bonds outside PEPs.

I appreciate that there are some further concerns in the unit trust and investment trust sectors. That is one reason why we are deferring the start date until April next year. As I have said, that will allow additional consultation on the details of the proposals to continue. Given a constructive approach in future discussions, I am confident that we can find whatever further detailed adaptations may be necessary.

The end result of the Chancellor's proposals is that, essentially, there will be no change in the way in which the overwhelming majority of private investors are presently treated. I trust that the House welcomes the proposals. The outcome has been widely welcomed outside. My hon. Friend quoted from a well-known national newspaper, so I shall reciprocate by quoting from another.

The view of the Financial Times was:

"Most private investors have been given everything they wanted from the changes to the gilt tax proposals".

The paper said that it was

"a victory for private clients and common sense".

Many professionals have welcomed the further opportunity for consultation on details and the prospects for progress—now confirmed—towards the gilt strip facility which I and my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield have described. I am glad to hear that my hon. Friend's main concerns have been met.

In the context of valuations, he asked whether the so-called kink test fits well with gilt strips—we must leave others to judge the terminology. The issue is of some interest to my hon. Friend, but I hope that he will forgive me if I do not give a precise answer now. I am aware of some questions about the issue.

The fate of the so-called kink test is tied up with wider questions about the handling of the transition that the Revenue will need to develop and discuss further. It is our firm priority that the transitional rules should be seen to be fair and workable. I am sure that my hon. Friend will contribute to that debate.

He also asked about the drawing of the line, and whether any private investors should be included in the reform. As I think he understands, some 4,000 people will be above the threshold. In setting any line, there is always an element of judgment, but a high threshold has two results. It protects the Exchequer, while retaining the bare minimum of detailed provision to deter tax-driven investment strategies.

With no threshold at all, we would face an unattractive choice between open-ended Exchequer costs and retaining or even increasing the full and sometimes ugly apparatus that we all want to get rid of. We think that the threshold that we have chosen for private investors strikes the right balance between cost and complexity and the concerns of private investors.

My hon. Friend said that, for those above the threshold, the larger investors, there will be an additional gain, in that any capital losses that they may have incurred will be eligible for relief under the proposals. That may appeal to his friend who has a large holding.

We have set out the basic principles. There are many matters to discuss and much detail to fill in, as the ideas are worked up into their full legislative form. Many of those ideas are outlined in the Revenue's press release that was issued at the beginning of the week, and the Revenue will approach them all in a constructive spirit.

This is a valuable reform. It will improve the competitiveness of the City and make life simpler and easier for companies. At the same time, it must respect the concerns of private investors, and I think that our package achieves that proper balance. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for continuing to press this matter in debate, and for giving me the opportunity to put on record the current position on this important matter.

Cannabis (Therapeutic Use)

1.59 pm

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): This is a matter of enormous importance because it affects the suffering of many thousands of people in Britain. By a simple decision made now by the Minister, we can today not take any path that is new or daring but go back to the position that existed in 1971. By doing so, we will decriminalise not the recreational use of cannabis but many people who use cannabis now because they regard it as essential for their needs or their family needs. Those people will stop being branded as criminals. Now they seem to be breaking the law.

Perhaps it is best to say what we are not proposing or debating this afternoon. There is no question of any proposal to decriminalise cannabis or increase its availability as a recreational drug. Neither is there a proposal to make cannabis available as a medicine on every chemist's counter for every minor complaint such as headaches, stomach aches or whatever. We are urging the Minister and the Government today to allow cannabis to be prescribed for a certain number of identifiable conditions that are all serious. Those conditions are multiple sclerosis, glaucoma, the effects of chemotherapy, cerebral palsy, spasm and terminal illnesses.

We know that a strong demand for decriminalisation is coming from the association that has been set up to make the point. The demand rightly comes not from politicians but from patients, from the families of patients and from the medical profession. We are debating the matter today because a meeting of the Alliance for Cannabis Therapeutics took place in October last year at which I believe that the Minister was present. He answered questions at the meeting and he has answered parliamentary questions on the matter.

We want to take the issue forward from what was said at that meeting. I understand that it was a friendly meeting and people shared a great deal of common ground. An all-party group went along to the meeting. It included members of two parties and a letter of support was sent by a third party. Today I have received expressions of support from hon. Members in all parties in the House. So the matter is not party political.

The Government agree with our main case, which is that cannabis is effective in relieving pain. There is a wealth of evidence that for certain patients afflicted by one of the illnesses that I have mentioned cannabis provides a unique palliative for the torments of pain. The measures that we advocate can be introduced without interfering with Government policy. We accept the reality of Government policy on all drugs, but we believe that our argument today chimes precisely with Government policies on drugs, Home Office policies and even the Government's policies on deregulation and choice.

At the meeting with the alliance, the Government side accepted the therapeutic qualities of drugs. Their objections included one from the Home Office that any move to allow cannabis to be prescribed therapeutically would send a wrong signal to the rest of the country. The Government representatives also said that the Department of Health did not want to give any approval to smoking. I believe that those arguments can be answered well.

Cannabis was prescribed until 1971. Whatever signal was given then had no apparent effect. There was not a sudden rash of cannabis taking or abuse because it was prescribed to a small number of people, just as it would be prescribed if our plea today was accepted. There is clearly an understanding in the minds of the public and the medical profession of the distinction between cannabis for recreational use and cannabis for therapeutic use.

No poll of any great merit has ever suggested that recreational use of cannabis is regarded by the majority of the public as desirable. However, a poll in The Independent some time ago showed that 75 per cent. of all doctors and 70 per cent. of the general public wanted to see cannabis prescribed therapeutically. So the distinction exists in people's minds. We do not have to worry about wrong signals.

I agree entirely with Ministers about smoking. No one in the House wants to increase the number of smokers of anything—herbs, tobacco or cannabis. Smoking any substance brings the same problems of bronchitis and heart disease, even if not cancer, but that is not the point. We know that cannabis can be used in a variety of ways. A vaporiser is used in America. There are inhalers. Cannabis can be taken in the form of a food, a drink, a patch or a tincture. Those are all acceptable ways to divorce therapeutic use from the recreational use of cannabis. So smoking is not the problem.

Distinguished scientists attended the meeting at the Department of Health. Professor Wall, a distinguished scientist at St. Thomas's, gave interesting evidence on which he has since enlarged on—I hesitate to use the word—endogenous receptors in the brain. He made the point that the arguments were not the same old arguments which were about in the 1970s and 1960s. When cannabis was withdrawn, it was not because it was thought that prescribing it sent the wrong signals but because it was used only as a sedative at that time. Various other sedatives were available, so there was no need to prescribe cannabis as a sedative.

New knowledge about cannabis has been discovered in the past 25 years. According to the theory of endogenous receptors, our brains can produce one of the active elements in cannabis. We are all familiar with the odd moments of unexplained joy and euphoria that we have from time to time—frequently in the House, of course. Our bodies are remarkably clever machines. They can produce all kinds of chemicals, including many painkillers. So we know that there is a natural source of an element of cannabis in our bodies.

One of the objections, strangely enough, to the derivative of cannabis that has been used—nabaline—is that, although it is a part of cannabis, it has caused more problems than natural cannabis. So there is a strong case for using cannabis in its natural state. Dr. William Northcott, who is an expert in treatment of pain and runs a pain clinic, said that he saw many patients who did not respond in any way to conventional medicine, but who obtained relief as a result of cannabis, which he could not prescribe, although he routinely prescribed much more powerful and addictive drugs, including heroine and cocaine. So the mild, non-addictive drug is banned and the more powerful addictive drugs are permitted—and used in enormous quantities.

The Government have used the argument about willow bark, which is an interesting one. They say that cannabis is a complex substance, and it is indeed complex. There was a time when people sucked willow bark to obtain the active substance in it, which is aspirin. We can go on from there and say that we cannot delay any longer removing the ban on cannabis. It is used today by thousands of people. It has been used since the time of the Assyrians. It has been used for at least 5,000 years. The people who built the pyramids in Egypt knew that cannabis was good for eyes. It was used for what is now known as glaucoma. It reduces the pressure in the eyes by as much as a third. The Egyptians knew that then. We lost that knowledge. It was a forgotten medicine, but we know about it now. It was used by tens of millions of people in every continent for thousands of years. There is not one case of anyone being poisoned by it or having a toxic reaction to it.

We need more research. I am sure that the Minister will say that in his speech. We need to understand which of the substances in cannabis are psychoactive and which are analgesic. But that is no excuse for delaying allowing cannabis to be used in its natural form.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I do not oppose my hon. Friend's argument. Indeed, I strongly support it and I took a delegation to the Minister at the end of last year. My hon. Friend is exactly on the point. Cannabis should be available on prescription under medical supervision for the relief of pain for certain specified conditions. That is all that we ask. Even if the Government's reason for the long delay in considering that proposal is that more research is needed, it will be difficult to carry out research unless cannabis is available, as it was before 1973, for the treatment of those specific conditions. The research is conditional on the availability.

Mr. Flynn: My hon. Friend is right. There have been strict limits on availability. At the time of the meeting it was not available at all.

It is fascinating that pain specialists have pointed out that they are well used to using drugs which have not been formally trialed or even licensed. The gentleman to whom I referred previously said that, with the majority of his patients, only single trials are conducted before a treatment is introduced. If that did not happen, the treatment that he gives in his pain clinic would be stopped in its tracks. He has to continue to use drugs such as amitriptoline, depo-medrone, sodium valproate, clobazam and flecainide which are unlicensed for use in pain relief. If that can be justified, so can the use of cannabis in its present form.

The most persuasive evidence does not come from the great litany of experts and bodies of chemists who want this change and whom I could spend the rest of the afternoon quoting. More persuasive is the evidence of people who are criminals in the eyes of the law, who are listening to us now and whose lives have been affected by cannabis.

One of the most moving articles that I have ever read was by Carol Howard, who is listening to me now, about the death of her daughter Sara, Sara was in her 20s and died of a rare cancer. She was nursed by her mother. She suffered chemotherapy in the final period of her life and her mother writes movingly in a searing document about her. Her mother used cannabis to help that young woman and has told me within the last hour of that fact. She says that cannabis was the only drug that provided any true or lasting relief. However, in the final phase of her illness that young person was filled with heroin and morphine in a form that has a devastating effect on people. If the choice is between morphine, which often turns people in addition to their health problems into zombies and using a drug which allows them to continue to converse and communicate with loved ones into their final hours, why on earth can we not allow people to continue to use it?

There is another lady who uses the drug. She is the mother of two teenage children and finds that the only relief that she can have from multiple sclerosis and its many symptoms is to use cannabis.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): I am grateful to my hon. Friend and congratulate him on obtaining a debate on this very important subject. It has been said that beta interferon, which people are pleading to have available on prescription in this country for sufferers from multiple sclerosis, will not be available until it has been through trials. People find that they can get relief from some of the most dangerous and soul-destroying tremors of MS by using cannabis. If the Government are determined to trial beta interferon and probably delay its use for another decade, they should hear this plea for the use of cannabis as a prescribed drug for MS.

Mr. Flynn: My hon. Friend is right. I wrote an article recently in The Independent about drugs in general. As someone who is fanatically opposed to the taking of medicinal drugs, I tried to make the point that there are only two sorts of drugs: those that we know have very nasty side-effects and those whose nasty side-effects we have yet to discover. We know that there are problems with every possible drug that we can discuss. No drug that civilisation has encountered has had the trial in practical circumstances that cannabis sativa has had. It has been used by many people over a period of years without the reactions which have occurred with thalidomide, eraldin, opren and a whole host of other drugs which have made a lot of money for the drugs trade but have poisoned and killed many people.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I sympathise with the hon. Gentleman's point. That is why I have come to hear the debate. I apologise for being a little late. Is it not true that hemp drugs such as cannabis, which are widely used in the east, especially in India, are natural drugs and that the opiates which are widely used in and China and the far east are natural substances? We tolerate alcohol and tobacco, which are acceptable drugs in our society. Is there not a big difference between such substances, which have been used for centuries and about which we know a lot, and the sort of artificial chemicals that the hon. Gentleman has described, which can devastate bodies because they are not natural?

Mr. Flynn: The hon. Lady is right. That is precisely what happened with the derivative of cannabis that has been used as a substitute in hospitals. There have been problems with that which have never occurred with cannabis in its natural state, which comprises 64 different elements.

Mr. John Austin-Walker (Woolwich): Will my hon. Friend also confirm that cannabis is non-addictive, unlike tobacco, alcohol and some of the other drugs mentioned?

Mr. Flynn: Indeed. It is clear from a wealth of medical evidence that cannabis is not an addictive drug.

I must mention some other cases. I find myself greatly moved by the personal circumstances of many people who have nursed relatives who are terminally ill and the beautiful stories of how radiance came back into their faces after taking cannabis—a radiance absent when they were on conventional drugs. I see also the pain on other faces—of people who bravely say that they are taking cannabis or giving it to relatives. The law says that those people should be thrown into gaol or fined £2,500 and criminalised. There can be no sense in continuing with such nonsense in respect of a mild, benign drug. But that is the law.

One case involved a man who was looking after his 48-year-old wife who was in the prime years of life. He was visited by Customs and Excise, although the matter was not pursued as far as a charge. Another case involved a doctor who prescribed cannabis for her seriously ill daughter. That case went to court. The law is unenforceable. There is not a judge or jury in the country who would dare act against someone behaving in a humanitarian way to their loved ones. The law is stupid and no one can defend it.

The Minister cannot hide behind the nonsense of saying that we need more research, which is his defence. We need more research into every possible aspect of medicinal drugs. There is no drug like cannabis which has had such a trial over the centuries. As we heard from the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) said, who has a background in chemistry, in its natural form it is acceptable and safe.

We know that there are problems. Cannabis should not be given to people suffering from schizophrenia or those who are engaged in driving or other activities which might be affected by the psychoactive parts of the drug. Such circumstances must be taken into account by anyone prescribing it. However, there is overwhelming evidence from thousands of patients that for glaucoma, multiple sclerosis, cerebral palsy, spasm and muscular illnesses cannabis is the only drug that can be used.

The case of chemotherapy has recently come up. Many people taking that terrible treatment suffer from continuous nausea. Conventional medicines do not work, but cannabis has been found to be effective in many cases. Who dares to deny those people that medicine? Many hon. Members in this House would never dream of breaking the law on anything, but any of us would recommend it if our relatives were suffering such nausea and there was no alternative. What do people do now to get the drug? They can only get it on the street or grow it themselves. One brave lady from Cardiff, who is not 100 yards away from me—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. The hon. Gentleman must not refer to people in the Gallery.

Mr. Flynn: Clearly, there is no one here but the lady might be listening to me on the radio. I shall not refer to her again. However, the lady in question bought a cannabis plant. She does not have the dexterity to roll her cannabis cigarettes herself but keeps them in a lovely silver cigarette case that she has placed near a bust of Queen Victoria because Queen Victoria took cannabis every month of her adult life and lived to a great age, thus demonstrating the drug's lack of ill effects. Many other people took the drug at that time.

The Government cannot continue to hide behind the claim that additional research is needed. Research could continue for many years and might produce a result only in five, 10, or 20 years. The argument needs to be resolved now. The Minister is known to be a humane and compassionate man who is respected by every hon. Member. He has the possibility to do something that all politicians would love to do—he can relieve the pain of hundreds of thousands of people, stop many people being criminals and take a major step towards the provision of respite.

Many patients cannot be treated for their terrible illnesses with the proper medicines that doctors would like to use. That charade must be stopped. On behalf of the many law-abiding people who are nevertheless breaking the law, those who are denied the best treatment, those who are in pain but cannot get relief, and those who see others in terrible pain, I appeal to the Minister to announce a minor change in the law and a return to what it was in 1971.

2.21 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) for his eloquent summary of the arguments. I endorse the sentiments that he expressed. The Minister is known to be a compassionate man: indeed, I regard him as the acceptable face of Conservative extremism. Is there any conflict between the Department of Health and the Home Office? Is it not a fact that the real problem lies with the Home Office rather than with the Minister's Department?

This morning I took part in a phone-in on the BBC. The hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) and I were asked how we would tell a person suffering from multiple sclerosis and who was in a wheelchair and in great pain that cannabis was to be denied to them because it was illegal for a doctor to prescribe it. I invite the Minister to contemplate that question when he replies. I am sure that in his heart he is persuaded by our arguments. We should all be grateful to hear him say so from the Dispatch Box.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Bowis): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) for raising the issue and to hon. Members of both parties for chipping in. I am also grateful for the kind comments which I imagine have something to do with those moments of high joy and ecstasy that the human brain can experience and to which reference has been made.

This is a serious matter which affects many people. There is a great deal of pain, but there is also a great deal of hope that cannabis may become available as a prescribed drug. I understand that, but, in the short time available, I must set out the Government's position. I shall not dwell on the recreational misuse of cannabis. On the basis of what the hon. Member for Newport, West said, I think that he and I agree about that. I shall deal with the therapeutic use of cannabis.

We have received a number of representations claiming that cannabis is effective in treating some of the symptoms of multiple sclerosis and other conditions, some of which the hon. Gentleman mentioned. In October, I met the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), Lord Whaddon and representatives of the Alliance for Cannabis Therapeutics to hear the case that cannabis should be made available for medicinal use. I agreed then to give careful consideration to the points put to me. Since then, the hon. Gentleman has written to me and acknowledged that it is not something to be rushed, although we need to move as fast as is sensible.

The therapeutic use of cannabis is a complex issue. It may be helpful if I deal more fully with some of the important considerations related to it. Under section 7 of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, cannabis and certain other controlled drugs, such as raw opium and coca leaf, have been designated as drugs which it is in the public interest for their production, supply and possession to be either wholly unlawful or unlawful except for the purpose of research or other special purposes, or for it to be unlawful for doctors to prescribe or supply except under licence from the Home Secretary. The controls imposed by the Act conform with the international restrictions covering those drugs.

It has of course been claimed—and it may be so—that specific medical conditions could be improved by the use of cannabis, but everyone agrees that we need to consider such a claim carefully before deciding to allow the use of cannabis as a prescribed drug. As for any other unlicensed product, the supporting data would need to be presented to the Medicines Control Agency, which in the usual way would evaluate any application made to it by a sponsor seeking a product licence. I understand, that if a product licence were issued by the MCA, the 1971 Act controls could be modified to make such a medicine available to patients. Any change in the controls would not, of course, extend to non-medical use.

I have heard it said that cannabis was available for many centuries, and certainly for medicinal use prior to 1973, so its legal use could simply be reinstated. That is not possible. The decision to stop the medicinal use of cannabis was based on the evidence available at the time, which was that cannabis was no more effective than other available drugs and followed on from the advice of the World Health Organisation at the time. Since 1973, all drugs currently on prescription have undergone a stringent review of their safety, efficacy and quality, and it would be wrong simply to reinstate cannabis without such a review being undertaken. A company seeking a product licence would therefore have to present evidence of the drug's safety, efficacy and quality to the MCA in the usual way.

There are side effects from the use of cannabis. There is convincing evidence that for some people cannabis gives rise to acute and transient mental disturbance and may be implicated in drug-induced serious mental—or psychotic—illness. For regular long-term users, there is some research evidence of damage to the testes, liver and lungs. It is not a matter of dispute that in the short term cannabis can make users light-headed and unable to concentrate, which can affect their ability to drive a vehicle, operate machinery or make sound decisions affecting work, leisure or daily living. The more potent version of cannabis—skunk cannabis—has a higher level of tetrahydro-cannabinol. Because THC is fat-soluble, it tends to accumulate and can damage organs.

Most drugs have side effects, and a relevant consideration—

Mr. Flynn rose—

Mr. Bowis: I must press on in an attempt to deal with the points that have been made.

A relevant consideration is whether the benefits of the drug are sufficient to outweigh the risks, which is why companies seeking to market drugs have to provide evidence of their safety, efficacy and quality.

The form in which cannabis would need to be available for use as a medicinal product in a controlled dose is another consideration. As the hon. Member for Newport, West said, nobody wants to see reefers being prescribed. The matter of form is also in the first instance for a company seeking to market such a product.

The representations that I have received include a wealth of anecdotal evidence of the efficacy of cannabis in treating some of the symptoms of multiple sclerosis and other conditions. In matters as important as those affecting people's health, however, scientific research-based evidence is what we need. Although the hon. Gentleman predicted that I would say that we needed more research, such a statement has to be right. As yet, conclusions of available research are not very convincing owing to the limited scope of the projects, the use of small cohort groups or the lack of suitable scientific methodology.

It may be that further research is needed, and I understand that the Multiple Sclerosis Society of Great Britain and Northern Ireland is taking positive steps to encourage trials by offering support to researchers. The main agency through which the Government sponsor medical research—the Medical Research Council—is always willing to consider scientifically sound proposals.

It may be helpful if I also remind the hon. Gentleman that current legislation does not prevent research into the medicinal use of cannabis, provided that a Home Office licence has been obtained for that purpose. I can tell the hon. Gentleman that there is no difference between the Home Office and the Department of Health on this matter. For the purposes of a clinical trial which involves the sale or supply of medicinal products and various other specified activities, a clinical trial certificate or a clinical trial certificate exemption would also have to be obtained from the Medicines Control Agency.

We are aware of the distress experienced by people suffering from multiple sclerosis and other conditions and we have been carefully considering the representations that have been made. I remind the hon. Gentleman, however, that we are committed to ensuring that patients receive the drugs that they need to treat their clinical conditions. If a medicine is brought forward and approved by the MCA, the controls under the Misuse of Drugs Act—for which the Home Office is responsible—could be modified to make such a medicine available to patients. If the regulations were amended, the decision to prescribe a particular drug would depend on the clinical judgment of the doctor concerned. The trouble is that we have not yet reached either of those two stages, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that we shall watch developments carefully and fairly.

It being half-past Two o'clock, the Motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, pursuant to Order [19 December].

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Unsafe Products

1. Mr. McAllion: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what further representations he has had from the organisations representing consumers about improving recall procedures for unsafe products. [32115]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate and Consumer Affairs (Mr. Jonathan Evans): I have received no recent representations on this matter, but the Government have in place powers which allow enforcement authorities to remove unsafe consumer products from the market. Those powers are complemented by powers to require public warning notices if necessary.

Obligations to comply with consumer safety legislation, as well as the adverse impact of product liability claims, also provide business with clear incentives to act quickly when issues of safety may arise, including undertaking recalls when appropriate.

Mr. McAllion: Is the Minister aware that as many as 3,700 Citroen ZXs are being driven with potentially lethal footbrakes due to a manufacturing fault? Will he speak to Vauxhall about the 330,000 cars on the road with wrongly fitted airbag sensors, or to Renault about the 1,000 Espaces which can burst into flames at any moment?

Consumer groups are telling us that the recall procedures are shambolic and ineffective. What is the Minister going to do about that? Is it not time that he put the interests of consumers before, not after, the interests of the big companies that dominate our car industry?

Mr. Evans: For goods in the business supply chain, there are already in place quite stern measures of enforcement of the sort the hon. Gentleman desires. The point that he is making goes beyond the business supply chain to when the goods are in the hands of consumers. As I indicated in my main answer, when any difficulty arises in relation to product safety, there is a very clear incentive for manufacturers to deal with such matters by means of proper recall procedures.

The hon. Gentleman might be aware that the Department has been involved with the British Retail Consortium, the Association of Manufacturers of Domestic Electrical Appliances and the Consumers Association in creating very clear guidance to cover the sort of points to which he referred.

Privatised Utilities (Directors' Pay)

2. Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if his Department intends to compile information on directors' pay and share options in the privatised utilities, with particular reference to the regional electricity companies. [32117]

10. Mr. Pike: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received about the need for measures relating to excessive pay and share option increases by the executives of privatised utilities. [32126]

11. Ms Eagle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans his Department has to compile information on directors' pay and share options in the privatised utilities. [32127]

The Minister for Industry and Energy (Mr. Tim Eggar): Remuneration in the private sector is a matter for the companies concerned and for their shareholders.

Mr. Jones: Will the Minister explain why the Government chose not to use their golden share to prevent the directors of the regional electricity companies paying themselves huge salaries and topping them up with gross share options, to the disgust of consumers and the general public alike?

Mr. Eggar: Under the terms of the golden share, it could not be used for that purpose. That was very clear when the companies were floated. The hon. Gentleman ought to do more research. He appears not to be aware that the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), who led for the Opposition on the Electricity Bill, never once, throughout the entire passage of that Bill, raised on the Floor of the House or in Committee the issue of share options. The hon. Gentleman ought to be asking his right hon. Friend the question.

Mr. Pike: If the Greenbury committee does not ultimately yield proposals which act in the best interests of consumers and the public, and stop the excesses, what will the Government do to protect the interests of the public and consumers?

Mr. Eggar: In terms of the monopoly utilities, which will, of course, shortly be exposed to the competitive market, consumers do not suffer from excessive payments to directors because, under the way in which the regulation works, any increase in pay comes off the return to shareholders. It is not added to the costs to consumers. The hon. Gentleman should understand that.

Ms Eagle: Is not the Minister being terribly complacent when he says that that huge issue of public concern is not a matter for the Government? Has not the Prime Minister himself said that he finds the increases distasteful? Is not the real problem the fact that the Government do not want to do anything about them, yet the public out there are disgusted by the huge, excessive increases that executives are paying themselves and want action? When will the Government take action?

Mr. Eggar: Nobody condones excessive pay increases or remuneration packages, but the hon. Lady fails to recognise the considerable contribution that the privatised utilities have made to reducing bills. For example, if the announcement that Professor Littlechild made last week is implemented, it will result in a £9 reduction in the average electricity bill for the average consumer. Moreover, there has been a 40 per cent. real decrease in industrial gas prices as a result of the introduction of competition. That is good for consumers, both domestic and industrial.

Mr. Congdon: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the concerns expressed by the Opposition about executive pay must be set against the real benefits that privatisation has brought to consumers? Is he aware that the customers of Seeboard have already benefited from a 20 per cent. reduction in the standing charge, and will benefit from a further 25 per cent. reduction later this year? Does that not show that privatisation has worked to the benefit of consumers, who would not have benefited if we had listened to the siren voices of the Opposition?

Mr. Eggar: My hon. Friend is right. If the industries had still been nationalised, we should be seeing rising rather than falling prices, massive overmanning and inefficiency. My hon. Friend might be aware that, as a result of the recent announcements on electricity prices, the average electricity consumer may spend about £75 less on his electricity bill in the coming year than he did last year. That represents a considerable benefit to the individual consumer.

Mr. Salmond: Does the Minister have a personal view about the actions of Richard Giordano at the British Gas annual general meeting, where he exercised the block vote to defend the pay and perks of his fellow executive directors? Does not that sort of behaviour make nonsense of Government claims that it is up to shareholders to restrain excesses? What changes, if any, in company law does the Minister think could be introduced to make a reality of shareholder democracy?

Mr. Eggar: The hon. Gentleman and the rest of the Opposition do not seem to recognise that such issues are the responsibility of the private sector directors and the chairmen and boards of the companies. What Mr. Giordano has said is a matter for him. Of course the Government will take account of any recommendations by the Greenbury committee when we receive them, and if appropriate we shall not hesitate to legislate.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, at private sector annual general meetings, it is not only the final vote but the atmosphere in which the meeting is conducted that matters? If a meeting believes that members of the board have been given more than they are entitled to, perhaps people should reflect on the fact that for every pound that those individuals receive, 40p goes to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Eggar: Of course the taxpayer benefits from the contribution made by individuals who receive high wages. At the end of the day what matters to consumers is the fact that their bills come down in real terms. That has been achieved for both gas and electricity as a direct result of Government policies that the Opposition have consistently opposed.

Mr. Wilson: I congratulate the Minister on his effrontery, if on nothing else. I am sure that he is aware of the Library's independently researched finding that the price of electricity has increased since privatisation. If he wants to argue about that let him argue with the Library, but will he cease to restate the misleading information that he has repeated over and over again today?

Is he aware that, in the few days since an American company acquired a stake in South Western Electricity, the share options held by the four directors of the company have increased in value by £322,000? Is that what passes for enterprise in Tory Britain today? Are not share options in the privatised utilities a disreputable and discredited scam, organised by the beneficiaries in their own interests under licence from the Government? It seems as if the new President of the Board of Trade intends to do as much as the previous one to end the abuses—absolutely nothing.

Mr. Eggar: Not for the first time, the hon. Gentleman is wrong. There has been a real decrease in electricity prices of 8 per cent. in the past two years, and we can look forward to further considerable decreases in electricity prices in real and perhaps nominal terms in the coming months.

With regard to the hon. Gentleman's other point, why do the Opposition constantly peddle the politics of envy? Why do they never take into account the positive benefits that flow directly to the consumers that have resulted from the policies followed by the Conservative party?

Small Businesses

3. Mr. Hendry: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what support is given by the Department to encourage small businesses; and if he will make a statement. [32118]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Small Firms, Industry and Energy (Mr. Richard Page): The Government recognise the crucial role played by small firms by keeping inflation and interest rates low and by reducing legislative, administration and taxation burdens. They also provide direct assistance where appropriate. This includes finance, specialist advice and support in a variety of areas including innovation and technology, exporting and design.

The new business link network is revolutionising the delivery of business support services. From April 1996 it will be the normal delivery route for all DTI services.

Mr. Hendry: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the most important ways in which the Department can help small firms is by helping them to finance their growth and development? Does he further agree that the loan guarantee scheme has played an important part in that process? As a number of firms cannot take advantage of the scheme, will my hon. Friend undertake to keep it under review, so that it may benefit as many firms as possible?

Mr. Page: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind words about the loan guarantee scheme. As he has been so generous, I shall reveal that, along with my hon. Friends the Members for Surrey, North-West (Sir M. Grylls), for Hampshire, North-West (Sir D. Mitchell) and for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe), I was responsible for pushing for the introduction of such a scheme at the beginning of the 1980s. Applications for the scheme are at a record level, which is indicative of the confidence that is building throughout the UK economy. A review of the scheme is taking place so that we can focus our efforts to try to help British small businesses even more.

Mr. Harvey: The Minister will recall that, in the Budget two years ago, the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced that it was the Government's intention to bring forward measures to address the problem of the late payment of commercial debt. Given that the previous President of the Board of Trade—he has now gone to greater offices, both literally and metaphorically—always seemed to be implacably opposed to any such measures, can we anticipate that the Government will now bring forward measures to give effect to the promise made two years ago?

Mr. Page: If statutory instruments were the magic bullet to solve the problem of late payment, I would sign up along with everyone else. I am afraid that life is more complex than that. Surveys have suggested that the majority of late payments are due to disputes about the terms of a contract and about whether goods have been supplied. Surveys by Grant Thornton have shown that payment periods in the United Kingdom are coming down, that we are improving against the rest of the European Union and that we are doing better than most countries which have a statutory right to late payment.

We are encouraging support for the Confederation of British Industry's code of conduct regarding practices of payment. As the Minister for Small Business—from, I believe, 11.30 this morning—I can say that the Department is working towards a British standard regarding prompt payment. I can also recommend the Department of Trade and Industry's free leaflet on making cash flow to help late payment.

Mr. Wilkinson: In his list of measures to encourage small business, my hon. Friend rightly included the reduction of taxation. Between now and the Budget, will his Department make representations to the Chancellor of the Exchequer suggesting that small incorporated companies be exempt from corporation tax below a certain threshold, just as individuals are below a certain threshold for income tax, as small businesses are usually under-capitalised and must expand on the basis of the profits that they can retain?

Mr. Page: I note what my hon. Friend says. He will understand if I do not give a direct answer, but I understand the reasoning behind his question. Since 1979, the Government have reduced corporation tax for smaller businesses from 42 per cent. to 25 per cent. in order to help small businesses.

British Coal Enterprise

4. Mr. Bayley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many new jobs have been created by British Coal Enterprise. [32119]

Mr. Page: British Coal Enterprise estimates that it has helped with the creation of 51,300 jobs through its business funding activity and 15,000 jobs through its workspace activities. Through its job and career change scheme, BCE has also provided help to some 57,000 ex-employees of British Coal seeking work. Of those, BCE estimates that some 50,000 found jobs, either directly or following a period of retraining.

Mr. Bayley: Many hon. Members from mining areas might dispute those figures. Nevertheless, British Coal Enterprise has invested considerable sums of money in former coalfield communities. If that is good for the coalfields, why is it not good for the railways? What plans do the Government have to set up a British Rail Enterprise to replace the tens of thousands of railway jobs that have been lost as a result of privatisation?

Mr. Page: I am the first to pay tribute to the work done by British Coal Enterprise in providing jobs for people in former mining communities. Providing jobs for ex-railway workers is a matter for the Secretary of State for Transport. I look the hon. Gentleman straight in the eye and say that I fully accept that difficulties have arisen in his constituency as a result of the unemployment caused by the closure of a railway manufacturing company. However, in his travel-to-work area, unemployment is only 5.7 per cent., which is way below the national average. There should, therefore, be a good chance of people finding work in his constituency.

Crown Post Offices

5. Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the future of Crown post offices. [32120]

The President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian Lang): The location and ownership of post office outlets is a matter for the board.

Mr. Michie: I am sure that the House and people outside are interested to know how much support the Government have from consumer organisations for the possibility of privatising and franchising Post Office Counters. People outside are saying that Crown post offices should be given freedom of access to funds so that they can once again create a service that is appreciated by the vast majority of the nation. Why are the Government prejudiced against a public enterprise that works and is appreciated?

Mr. Lang: I presume that the hon. Gentleman is aware that 95 per cent. of all post offices are already in the private sector. What we are talking about with regard to the Crown offices is not privatisation but providing better services in a more responsive way in the interests of the public. It is clear from the success that has been established with those offices that have been transferred to agency status that the services have improved and customer satisfaction has risen.

Mr. Gallie: First, may I commiserate with my right hon. Friend on giving up the great office of Secretary of State for Scotland? That shows great sacrifice in the interests of the Union, because I am sure that he will do remarkably well in his current national post. May I also remind him that, in recent times, there has been great concern about post offices in rural areas? May I point out that the lottery, gas companies that now offer a bill payment service through post offices, and a range of other matters linked to privatisation offer a great future for post offices in rural areas? Will my right hon. Friend bear that in mind when he deals with the matter in future?

Mr. Lang: I thank my hon. Friend for his opening remarks. As one of my colleagues said to me, I have moved from the position of viceroy to that of president. I can live with that happily, and I hope that my hon. Friend will support me as I seek to ensure that the rest of the United Kingdom achieves the lower unemployment that we have in Scotland, the higher productivity and the greater exports per head of the population that Scotland has already achieved.

On the post offices, my hon. Friend is absolutely right. They operate in a competitive market, and it is important that they react to the shifting pattern of retail trade. That is part of our objective.

Brent Spar

6. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the most recent communications he has had concerning the disposal of Brent Spar. [32121]

Mr. Eggar: I have had meetings and communications as appropriate with Shell on that matter.

Mr. Banks: Is it true that the Government did not consult the Natural Environment Research Council regarding the disposal of Brent Spar, and that they took advice mainly from the Scottish Office?

As we now know that, according to the Government's own figures, 32 oil rigs will reach the end of their useful life during the remainder of the century and that 13 of them might end up being dumped at sea, can the Minister really assure the House that environmental considerations are uppermost in his mind and that dumping something at sea is more environmentally advantageous than bringing it ashore? The rigs were made onshore; surely they should be dismantled onshore.

Shell is worried only about its budgets, its income and its money. It is not at all concerned about the environment. It is about time that the Government shared the feeling of the great majority of people in the country that dumping at sea is unacceptable.

Mr. Eggar: There were, of course, three years of extensive studies carried out by Shell. The major document is now in the public domain, and has been since 16 February.

The Brent Spar is now moored in a Norwegian fjord. Shell is inviting an independent inspection entity, DNV, to inspect and analyse the allegations that have been made by Greenpeace and to report on them fully and independently.

As for the environmental damage that the hon. Gentleman claims will be done to the deep sea and the Atlantic, I shall quote Dr. Tony Rice, an independent scientist and probably the leading independent deep sea biologist in the country, who said that the most likely impact of deep sea disposal of Brent Spar was "the death of a number of worms on the sea bed".

Mr Banks indicated dissent.

Mr. Eggar: It is no good the hon. Gentleman shaking his head. The leading independent deep sea biologist said that, and that it was equivalent to the number of worms that would die on the ground during construction of a quarter of a mile of motorway. In his career in the House, the hon. Gentleman has taken up many lost causes, but taking up the cause of the Atlantic deep sea worm seems beyond even him.

Mr. Dover: Can my right hon. Friend confirm two things—first, that whatever method of disposal is decided on will be less environmentally pleasant than the one that has been irresponsibly thrown away by Shell and, secondly, that the cost to the taxpayer will not be greater than it would otherwise have been?

Mr. Eggar: I can confirm that Shell has informed me that the additional amount—in excess of the cost of deep sea dumping—will not fall on the taxpayer but be absorbed by the company. That is as it should be.

Future methods of disposal will now be studied. Shell came to us with the best environmental practical option. I expect it, in any proposal that it makes to us in future, to reach the same high standards of proof on the best environmental way to proceed as it did in reaching the decision that deep sea dumping was the best way to proceed. I would not rule out the option of deep sea dumping for the Brent Spar in future.

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: In view of the fact that, of the 14 reports passed by Shell to the Department of Trade and Industry, only two actually referred to onshore disposal options and, of those two, only one was referred to by Shell in its own best practical environmental option, does the Minister accept that, instead of simply leaving the matter to Shell, what we need to allay public anxiety is a properly set up independent commission to consider onshore disposal options?

Mr. Eggar: I have already made it clear that Shell has agreed to commission a completely independent audit of the Brent Spar situation and I am sure that it will ensure that the results of that independent investigation are made public. I am also intending, subject to the necessary commercial confidentialities—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] That is the way it has to be. I also intend to publish the studies that have been carried out by Shell. It is clear that more studies will have to be commissioned in future months, even years, and I shall do my best to ensure that they also are placed in the public domain. I think that that is what the House would want.

We have a common interest in ensuring that the Brent Spar is disposed of in the best manner possible from an environmental point of view. The hysteria that has flowed from the Greenpeace campaign is not the best basis for taking serious decisions.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: Does the Minister accept that, when Shell in Germany failed to endorse the disposal of the Brent Spar in the Atlantic, it left a massive gap in the Minister's credibility? He was the only one who continued to champion the environmentally damaging option, and he is now commissioning reports that he should have received a long time ago.

Mr. Eggar: That is absolutely typical of the hon. Gentleman. First, he misrepresents the position of Shell (Germany) and, secondly, he clearly prefers the opinion of Shell (Germany) to that of Shell (UK).

Dr. Spink: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is highly unlikely that Shell will produce a compulsive case in favour of dismantling the rig onshore on environmental or economic grounds? If, perchance, there is an acceptable case for disposing of the rig onshore—either vertically or horizontally—will my right hon. Friend ensure that the work is done in our country so that our people get the jobs?

Mr. Eggar: My hon. Friend is right: there are very difficult technical issues concerning the way in which a platform storage buoy, which is designed to be vertical, can be moved to a horizontal position and then towed inshore to shallow water for disposal. That is a major environmental issue on its own.

As to where any work would be carried out if onshore disposal proved acceptable, that is clearly a matter that Shell would have to put to the United Kingdom Government. Shell has made it clear that it will discuss any disposal option with the United Kingdom Government rather than any other Government, and we will examine the type of issues that my hon. Friend has raised.

Manufacturing Competitiveness

7. Mr. Caborn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what measures have been taken to improve manufacturing competitiveness. [32123]

Mr. Lang: The Government's policies since 1979 have contributed to a transformation of the competitiveness of manufacturing industry. We have reformed the labour market and our education system, cut taxes and pursued a vigorous programme of privatisation and liberalisation. The results are clear. Since 1979, manufacturing productivity has grown faster in the UK than in any other major industrialised country—after two decades in which the UK was the slowest.

Mr. Caborn: I thank the President of the Board of Trade for that answer. I do not know whether I am addressing my question to the right person in view of the Government's reorganisation, particularly in the area of competition, but I expect that the President will resolve the matter when he responds to my question.

Has the President seen the 3is report, which was released last week, about investment in small and medium-sized businesses? It underlined the points made by the Select Committee on Trade and Industry in its report about the competitiveness of United Kingdom manufacturing and in its second report about investment in small and medium-sized businesses, which showed clearly that we are yet again falling behind Europe in terms of investment. The 3is report confirms much of that serious evidence.

Does the President of the Board of Trade agree that he should put pressure on the Treasury to provide some fiscal incentives in the next Budget to ensure that there is medium to long-term investment in small and medium-sized businesses rather than to opt for the short-termism that seems to be inherent in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Lang: I certainly accept the hon. Gentleman's point that investment is important in all businesses, large and small. It is important for the Government to encourage a stable economic environment with low inflation in which businesses can undertake such investment. I am encouraged by the fact that investment in manufacturing industry has risen by 8.3 per cent. in the past year. That is a substantial rise, which I am keen to encourage further.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that one reason why competitiveness in manufacturing industry has risen is the 8.3 per cent. increase in investment in the past year, following a 6.75 per cent. increase in the previous year? Does he agree that one of the fiscal incentives that manufacturing industry would like and that was mentioned a moment ago is a reform of the capital gains tax regime to encourage longer-term rather than shorter-term investment?

Mr. Lang: I hear what my hon. Friend says and I have no doubt that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will consider such points, along with all the other issues that he will consider before his Budget. My hon. Friend, and indeed the whole House, will agree that one of the most important ways in which large and small businesses can remain competitive is to keep down non-wage labour costs and resist the minimum wage and the social chapter.

Mr. Miller: On the evening of 6 July, I placed on the board a letter to the President of the Board of Trade and faxed his office asking important questions about competitiveness in respect of the reorganisation of science in his Department. First, will the President of the Board of Trade assure the House that in future we will receive information directly and that the press will not get it the previous day? Secondly, will he give the House an assurance that research councils that are not in the near market area will not be treated as second division organisations within his new arrangements?

Mr. Lang: I am happy to reassure the hon. Gentleman that I have taken careful note of the points that he raised in his letter. I replied to his letter today, as soon as I had announced the disposition of portfolios within the Department. My hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) is taking on the role as Minister for Science and Technology. I hope that between us we will reassure the hon. Gentleman of the importance that we attach to science and technology—alongside the other activities of the Department of Trade and Industry—in its own right and as a way of improving the competitiveness to which we are all committed.

Sir Michael Grylls: Does my right hon. Friend accept that he will have the enthusiastic support of all British industry if he continues to resist vigorously—as the Government have done until now—unnecessary social charges from the continent of Europe that have done so much to ensure that Europe created fewer jobs than either Britain or the United States in the past 20 years? That is crucial to competitiveness.

Mr. Lang: I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend. It is significant that in the past year employment in manufacturing industry in the United Kingdom has risen by no fewer than 31,000 jobs. In the past two and a half years, unemployment across the economy as a whole has fallen by well over 600,000. That is in sharp contrast to many countries in the rest of Europe that are burdened with excessive social costs.

Mr. Skinner: Can the Minister tell us why the Government do not seem to practice a great deal of competition within the Department of Trade and Industry when it comes to handing out contracts, for example, for the refurbishment of No. 1 Victoria street? Can he tell us more about the internal inquiry that is taking place? I assume that he has been informed about the letter that I set him quite recently referring to the fact that top officials at the DTI were gallivanting around the world and being handed big raffle prizes, although they had not entered a raffle, and then some very uncompetitive tenders and bids were handed out to the favoured few. Is it not time that the scandal was sorted out?

Mr. Lang: I can reassure the hon. Gentleman that the new headquarters of the Department at Victoria street were built under the private finance initiative. As for his letter, my hon. Friend the Minister for Science and Technology has sent the hon. Gentleman a full and detailed reply today.

Competitiveness

8. Mr. Jenkin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what responses he has received to his Department's second White Paper on competitiveness; and if he will make a statement. [32124]

Mr. Lang: The White Paper "Competitiveness: Forging Ahead" has been widely welcomed by industry, including major representative bodies, such as the CBI, the Engineering Employers Federation and the Chemical Industries Association, as well as many of our major companies.

Mr. Jenkin: Returning to a theme raised earlier, does my right hon. Friend agree that a suitable tax regime is vital to competitiveness and that Britain currently has the most punitive capital gains tax regime among the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development southern countries? Is it not welcome therefore that noises emerging from parts of the Government suggest that that regime is under review? Will he use his good offices as President of the Board of Trade to push for a sensible reform to reduce the burden of capital gains tax?

Mr. Lang: I shall certainly ensure that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is aware of my hon. Friend's concerns on that. My hon. Friend will, of course, agree that the reduction in corporation tax for both large and small companies has been one of the driving forces behind the successful growth and expansion of the economy in recent years.

Mr. Purchase: Given that the driving force for competitiveness is investment and the fact that investment in this country is at the same level as it was in 1989, does the President of the Board of Trade not recognise that to match the investment performance of Germany this country needs to invest another £42 billion per annum in order that we might become internationally competitive? What plans does he have to tackle that problem?

Mr. Lang: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman did not hear my answer to an earlier question, when I pointed out that investment in manufacturing industry was up by 8.3 per cent. on a year ago. As for his comparison with earlier years, I can tell him that, since 1981, total manufacturing investment has risen by 18 per cent. What guides investment is confidence in the management of the economy. Confidence is there now that was lamentably absent when the Labour party was in power.

Mr. Pickles: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the White Paper builds on many of the changes in the competitive nature of the British economy, one of which has been the creation of a flexible work force? Does he also agree that that can be seen writ large in the Ford Motor Company, which, this month, sees the production of the new Fiesta and which two months ago announced the new diesel plant at Dagenham? Does he further agree that Dagenham, which was once the symbol of all that was wrong with the British economy, is now the symbol of all that is right with the British economy?

Mr. Lang: Yes, I do. My hon. Friend makes the point very well. The Ford Motor Company is going from success to success. It is good to see the United Kingdom sharing so fully in that.

Mr. Bell: May I on behalf of Opposition Front-Bench Members congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on his elevation to President of the Board of Trade? We shall miss the lion's roar from the Conservative Benches, but no doubt the steady purring will continue into the ear of the Prime Minister.

Is it not remarkable that we are dealing with a competitiveness White Paper and the consultation documents on the day when it has been announced, by official figures, that we have the lowest growth rate since late 1993; that our construction orders are at the lowest level since late 1992; that our housing figures, the orders in housing, are down 13 per cent. from what they were a year ago; and that private industrial development is also down? Is not it a fact that the only thing over which the previous President of the Board of Trade presided was insecurity in our industry, the length and breadth of the land? Is not that what the right hon. Gentleman should be addressing?

Mr. Lang: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his welcome, which I much appreciate. Sadly, I thereafter have to disagree with everything that he said. He has been extremely selective with his figures. He might like to know that, overall, GDP, which has been rising for the past three years, rose by 4 per cent. in 1994. I recall that, when the previous Labour Government were in power, they could not achieve growth on average of more than 1 per cent. per annum.

Arms Sales (Licences)

12. Mr. Fisher: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he has taken to improve the scrutiny of applications for licences for the export of armaments. [32129]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Technology (Mr. Ian Taylor): Procedures and practices are under constant review to respond to changing circumstances. Since the late 1980s, there have been a number of important specific changes. These include: a higher staff/licence application ratio; more resources concentrated on sensitive cases; greater involvement of senior management; and wider co-ordination through use of information technology.

Mr. Fisher: Did not the former President of the Board of Trade, in his statement to the House on BMARC, admit that 74 per cent. of export licence applications were not even checked by his Department? Was that caused by sheer inefficiency or was there a more political reason—that the Government wished to turn a blind eye to the export of arms? What are the Government going to do to avoid further shambles like BMARC in the future, which have brought such discredit not only to the Government but to the country?

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman should know that the previous President announced that on a sample basis 74 per cent. did not have full supporting documentation. I have to inform the hon. Gentleman that every application form states whom the applicant wishes to be the end user and ultimate consignee. Therefore, the Department of Trade and Industry was informed by every applicant of where the applicant said that it was eventually sending the goods.

Supporting documentation is not legally required in all cases. However, since the inquiries that were conducted by the Select Committee on Trade and Industry and as a result of the Scott inquiry, the performance of the export licensing department has been significantly tightened. The requirement now is for all applications to have supporting documents and, because of the new computer technology, it is not possible to process a licence unless certain key questions are asked and answered.

Mr. John Marshall: Can my hon. Friend confirm that British Aerospace is a major exporter, that the attack on defence exports could cost many tens of thousands of jobs in British industry, and that the Opposition do not care about manufacturing industry or the jobs in it?

Mr. Taylor: I agree with my hon. Friend. British Aerospace is a fine company, doing an enormous amount for the benefit of the British economy, a considerable amount for employment and, I stress, as Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Technology, an enormous amount for Britain's technological base. It is shameful for Opposition Members to condemn the excellence that is available in that British company.

Mr. Wilson: At the time that the Scott inquiry was set up, the Government had been in possession for some two years of all the BMARC papers which were taken during the raid on the Astra headquarters. If those papers had been made available, the Scott inquiry would not have been just about arms for Iraq and Matrix Churchill but about arms for Iran and BMARC. Why were the papers not made available?

Mr. Taylor: The papers to which the hon. Gentleman refers were obtained as a result of investigations into the company's financial status and have been retained for that purpose by the receiver. They have now been made available to Customs and Excise, and we are delighted that, at our invitation, the Select Committee on Trade and Industry is looking into all those matters. There is no necessary connection in the Scott report between Iran and Iraq. The Select Committee's work will be of great illumination to the House in what the President admitted in his statement to the House was a chapter of incidents which we would have preferred not to have happened but which were in no way a connivance, rather the result of administrative inefficiencies.

Mr. Hawkins: In the light of my hon. Friend's welcome statements about the contribution of British Aerospace, does he agree that the attacks on the defence industry from so many Opposition Members will be widely reviled by the thousands of my constituents whose families' livelihoods depend on their employment with companies such as British Aerospace, and they will not forget the attacks that have been made on their futures by Opposition Front-Bench Members?

Mr. Taylor: I agree with my hon. Friend, who has a considerable constituency interest in the defence sector. If Opposition Members were as assiduous as he is in defending the interests of their constituents, there would be fewer arguments against defence exporters and manufacturers. Britain's defence exports are worth more than £2 billion a year and, as I said earlier, they provide enormous prospects for jobs and Britain's technological base. We should be proud of that record. Nevertheless, we take care to which countries we export, and that is the effect of the answer that I gave a moment ago that we have tightened up significantly on the export control department's activities.

Rural Textile Manufacturing

13. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what further plans he has to provide assistance to textile manufacturing communities in rural areas; and if he will make a statement. [32130]

Mr. Eggar: Both my Department and the Scottish Office are working with the textiles industry to offer practical support and advice from which such rural communities can benefit.

Mr. Kirkwood: Does the Minister accept that there have been some damaging job losses in the textile sector in my constituency recently? Is he aware that the textile sector represents nearly 88 per cent. of the manufacturing work force in the Hawick travel-to-work area? Will he give a commitment that his Department will do all that it can to develop the RETEX scheme for diversification, organised by the European Union to assist the process of diversification? Will he also see what he can do to obtain new export opportunities, particularly for small firms in the region, so that they can replace the jobs that have recently been lost?

Mr. Eggar: I am aware of the importance of textiles to the hon. Gentleman's constituency, and I understand his concern about the recent job losses at Pringle of Scotland.

We are currently taking a number of steps. As the hon. Gentleman knows, RETEX II should start disbursing money in September—£25 million over three years for the United Kingdom as a whole. We want to ensure that that money is spent effectively. I also recognise the need to expand market opportunities for textile manufacturers. The starting point should be an improvement in the relationship between United Kingdom retailers and manufacturers, which should become a "win-win" relationship. My Department has joined the Trade Association in an attempt to bring that about. It recently appointed Mr. Ken Watson—whom I met yesterday—to start an initiative designed to improve the relationship, and we hope that that will lead to many new orders.

Mr. Devlin: Is my hon. Friend aware that companies such as Pringle, and other woollen manufacturers in Scotland and the north of England, import about 90 per cent. of their mohair and cashmere from abroad? The finest cashmere-producing goat in Europe was developed in Scotland, but currently kids are being exported to Spain and Italy, where they receive agricultural support, because no such support is available in England. Why does my hon. Friend not look into that, along with our hon. Friend at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food?

Mr. Eggar: I must confess that I was not aware of the position. I shall make it my duty to become aware of it, and undertake to discuss this important matter with my hon. Friend.

Regional Selective Assistance

14. Mr. Coe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the processing time of applications for regional selective assistance. [32134]

Mr. Page: Processing times vary according to the level of assistance requested. The existing targets are currently under review, and revised target times will be announced in our response to the Trade and Industry Select Committee report on regional policy.

Mr. Coe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his reply. He will know of the long delays that have left many south-western companies, including Cornish companies, in a frustrating no-man's-land. I welcome regional selective assistance, which has changed the industrial landscape in my constituency: it has created some 500 jobs since April, when offers were made. I urge my hon. Friend, however, to look closely at the time taken to process applications in Cornwall and elsewhere in the south-west.

Mr. Page: My hon. Friend has been an enthusiastic chaser of RSA applications into my office. Along with those 500 jobs, there have been 19 applications relating to his constituency since last year. I accept, however, that the position is rather like the curate's egg—good in parts and bad in parts. The average processing time is about 40 working days, but many applications have been delayed, in some cases because of the slow return of information by applicants. A review is taking place. I know that my hon. Friend would not expect me to make any announcement before responding to the Select Committee, but I expect one to be made very shortly.

Mr. Gunnell: As the Minister knows, we are normally in competition for inward investment with our European partners. Is he satisfied that our processing is at least as efficient as that of any other European country, that some of the criticism about our not always conforming to the "level playing field" arrangements are unjustified and that all our European partners are operating such arrangements?

Mr. Page: The hon. Gentleman is jumping from one part to another. The Invest in Britain Bureau has been enormously successful. Last year, we had some 434 investment programmes, which will produce some 100,000 jobs in this country. On regional selective assistance applications, the review is taking place, and, again, it would be wrong for me to bring forward those details, but I can tell the hon. Gentleman that, last year, we made about 1,065 offers, with a value of £158 million, and we hope to create some 25,000 jobs, so one can see that the RSA process is doing a good job for UK Ltd.

Exports (East Midlands)

15. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on export figures in the east midlands for the past five years. [32135]

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Anthony Nelson): Separate regional figures are not provided but nationally, in the past five years, exports have risen by 33 per cent. to £134 billion, with east midlands companies making a full contribution to that growth.

Mr. Tredinnick: I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend on his new appointment and wish him well in the future. Does he agree that an important contribution to that export growth comes from firms, in Hinckley in my constituency and round about, such as Profilex, Nelson Burgess and Triumph Motorcycles, which is the country's second largest motor cycle company? Is it not remarkable that the May Confederation of British Industry survey found that the east midlands was leading Britain's export growth?

Mr. Nelson: First, I thank my hon. Friend for his kind sentiments. It is nice to be released from the Treasury and I am looking forward to my new freedom as Minister for Trade. Secondly, I join him in welcoming the fact that the east midlands is in the vanguard of this country's exports growth. That is a tremendous performance for that region and his constituency; a performance that I am sure will be sustained under Conservative policies of free trade and free enterprise, unlike Labour policies of intervention and minimum wages.

Industrial Competitiveness

16. Mr. Gapes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to improve the international competitiveness of British industry. [32136]

Mr. Lang: The wide range of measures that the Government are taking to promote the competitiveness of UK industry at home and abroad is set out in the recent White Paper, "Competitiveness: Forging Ahead", which has been so well received by industry.

Mr. Gapes: Given the international weakness of the pound and of the British economy, and the fact that this country's growth is the lowest in the G7 and the second lowest in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, does the President of the Board of Trade agree that, if we were to stay out of a single European currency, massive speculation would take place against the pound, necessitating an increase in interest rates?

Mr. Lang: I wonder whether all the hon. Gentleman's colleagues and hon. Friends agree with him in that sentiment, but I wish he and his hon. Friends on the Opposition Benches would desist from talking down the British economy, which is one of the best performing economies in the industrialised world. Since his party left office in 1979, exports have risen by over 90 per cent. thanks in large measure to the remarkable efforts of the former Minister for Trade, my right hon. Friend the Member for Wiltshire, North (Mr. Needham). On inward investment and mobile projects, this country has attracted more manufacturing projects than Germany and France combined.

Mr. Batiste: Given the importance of science and technology to industrial competitiveness, and the new functions of my right hon. Friend's Department, can he confirm that the functions of the Office of Science and Technology will be ring-fenced within his Department and that it will continue its strategic overview of Government research and development conducted across the board?

Mr. Lang: I can certainly reassure my hon. Friend that, by placing responsibility for these matters entirely with my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor), who will be the Minister with responsibility for science and technology, I am clearly signalling the specific and separate importance that I attach to science in its own right and as an adjunct to the Department of Trade and Industry, where so much benefit can be derived for industry. My hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) will be reassured when we are able to let him have more details on the future of the Office of Science and Technology, the technology foresight programme and other projects with which the Government are associated. I think that he will find that his answer is satisfactory.

Privatised Utilities (Regulation)

17. Mr. Burden: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to change the mechanisms for regulating privatised public utilities. [32137]

Mr. Eggar: The mechanisms for regulating the privatised utilities have evolved over time, in response to the practical experience of the various directors general. Independent regulation has delivered real benefits to consumers and to wider market development.

Mr. Burden: Does not the Minister recognise the frustration among the British people who regularly see more and more excesses in the privatised utilities? Today's news about the water industry and share options is just the latest example, but the Government say that they have nothing at all to do with them. When they were forced to listen, they set up the Greenbury committee which offers no guarantee that anything will be done. When will the Government accept that they have a responsibility to enforce decent standards in this area, and when will they establish a regulatory mechanism that puts the consumer first and does not fudge matters in the way that the Government have done?

Mr. Eggar: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman was in the House earlier when we discussed this issue. He should ask his right hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), who led for the Opposition against electricity privatisation, why he did not raise or identify the whole issue of share options at that time. The hon. Gentleman should ask his right hon. Friend why he failed to pick that up. The overall benefits of privatisation are there for all to see—reduced prices for consumers in real terms. Electricity prices are significantly down. They are sharply down for gas and there will be significant additional price reductions for electricity over the coming months.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: My right hon. Friend will be well aware of the considerable success of the public utilities in obtaining international contracts for Britain. For instance, the water industry has obtained £2,000 million-worth of contracts for Britain in the past year alone. How does it help our public utilities to gain such business for Britain if Opposition Members are forever slinging mud at them?

Mr. Eggar: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. British Gas is competing and winning around the world, and a number of our water utilities are doing exactly the same. Our electricity utilities, particularly the generating companies, are investing effectively, and that will bring dividends to the United Kingdom and provide significant employment in supplying companies in the UK and to individuals who are directly employed. That is a good result for Britain, and the Opposition should not drag Britain down in their approach to this important issue.

Mr. O'Neill: Is the Minister aware that there is widespread concern about the quality of treatment received by the regional electricity companies at the hands of the regulator? Is he aware of the frustration at the lack of transparency and accountability shown by Professor Littlechild and his staff? Will he take steps to ensure a more businesslike and more commercially aware approach to regulation by Offer? Does he not realise that the companies and the consumers require a more balanced approach? At present, the regulator has neither sympathy for the consumers nor understanding of the commercial realities of the business in which he operates. Surely he can get the balance right and try to satisfy them. If he cannot, will the Minister take steps to remove him?

Mr. Eggar: I am surprised at the hon. Gentleman. I thought that he had accepted the case for independent regulators. It does nothing for the independence of regulation and the effective operation of the industry for regulators to be under partisan political attack on a personal basis. That does the hon. Gentleman no credit at all.

Mr. Mans: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, when these recently privatised utilities were in the public sector, there was no one acting on behalf of the consumer because there were no regulators? On top of that, those utilities were highly inefficient and were able to invest in their infrastructure only when the Treasury let them do that. Does he further agree that the position is not only better in terms of the money that the public sector has to provide, but better for consumers, who get better value for money?

Mr. Eggar: I completely agree with my hon. Friend, and there is a further point. There is a great deal of transparency in the way in which the regulatory system works. The issues are put on the table for everybody to consider but they were never available for consideration in that way when those industries were nationalised and decisions were taken bilaterally in ministerial offices. The last thing that Labour took account of when it was in government was the interests of consumers. It took account the whole time of its political interests and the interests of the then Labour-run Treasury.

Arms Sales

18. Mr. Mullin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proportion of British manufacturing exports was accounted for by arms or arms related material (a) in 1979 and (b) in 1994; and if he will make a statement. [32138]

Mr. Ian Taylor: In 1979 the value of exports of identified defence equipment accounted for 1.3 per cent. of exports of manufactured goods from the United Kingdom. In 1993 the proportion was 2 per cent. Figures for 1994 will be published by the Ministry of Defence later this month.

Mr. Mullin: Considering that the Minister is a member of a regime which over the past 17 years has presided over the destruction of about a third of our manufacturing industry, does he consider it a disappointment that the one area in which we appear to excel is the manufacture and marketing of arms? Does he think that we should find a more honourable way of making a living? Does his Department have any plans to encourage arms manufacturers to diversify into more productive activity?

Mr. Taylor: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman intended to pay us a compliment by calling us a regime, but judging by his other standards, he was not attempting to be friendly. As for the British manufacturing base, the efficiency and technical application of United Kingdom manufacturing has dramatically improved since 1979 and the defence industry has had a major positive influence on new management techniques and technological application. There is nothing to be questioned about whether this country should be selling manufactured goods. We have only 16 per cent. of the world market. I would like more, but our share shows that many other leading countries are also involved in arms sales. The key question is to whom we should be selling, not whether we should be selling.

Bosnia

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to make a statement to the House on events in Srebrenica.

Srebrenica was established as a safe area by United Nations Security Council resolution in April 1993. This was followed by an agreement on its demilitarisation between UNPROFOR, the Bosnian Government and Bosnian Serb military commanders, signed on 17 April of that year.

In June 1993, the UN suggested that up to 36,000 troops could be necessary to implement the safe areas concept. The United Kingdom, France and the Netherlands responded well, but many others did not. The total committed amounted to only 7,500—a significant shortfall. This has had substantial implications for the safe areas policy. A Dutch contingent of UNPROFOR troops was deployed to Srebrenica to replace the original Canadian contingent.

The reality is that neither side properly observed the provisions on demilitarisation. It is this that lies at the root of events over the past few days. For three months, there have been sporadic attacks by each side against the other. Some 450 Dutch troops were in Srebrenica when fighting escalated over last weekend.

During that fighting, one Dutch soldier was killed by Bosnian Government forces on 8 July, and 30 Dutch soldiers were taken by the Bosnian Serb army as they withdrew from outlying observation posts to a blocking position 1.5 km to the south of the town. On the evening of 10 July, Bosnian Serb troops launched an infantry attack against this position, the Dutch returned fire, and the attack was abandoned.

At about midday on 11 July, however, Bosnian Serb forces launched a further attack, using mortars and tanks. Srebrenica town came under fire, with shells hitting the hospital and the Dutch compound. The Dutch commander requested NATO close air support. Two missions were launched, resulting in the destruction of Bosnian Serb army tanks. Meanwhile, Dutch troops helped to evacuate the hospital and withdrew from the compound, as it was under heavy shelling and undefendable.

The Dutch blocking position was bypassed, and, at about 1800 hours, Dutch UNPROFOR troops withdrew northwards to their compound at Potocari. They took with them some 2,500 displaced persons and some 80 to 100 who are wounded. Latest reports indicate that some 30,000 displaced persons are now in the Potocari area, several thousand of them in and around the Dutch compound, and that Bosnian Serb forces now effectively control the whole of the Srebrenica enclave.

I have spoken this morning to the Dutch Foreign Minister, Mr. Van Mierlo. He confirmed that the Dutch troops remained in their compound. He has no reports of casualties. The compound is not at present under attack, but food and water supplies are running low. Dutch commmanders are in touch with General Mladic, who is now is Srebrenica, about getting relief to the displaced persons.

We are in close touch with our allies and friends about the next step, and I have instructed our chargé in Belgrade to speak to President Milosevic. Our immediate priorities are to get food, water and medical help to the displaced persons in the Potocari area and to offer any help to the Dutch that they need; secondly, to safeguard the other enclaves and in particular the British forces in Gorazde; thirdly, to pursue action in the United Nations Security Council in response to this Bosnian Serb aggression. Our overall objective should remain, despite the difficulties, to restore Srebrenica as a safe area, but on the basis of a genuine implementation of the demilitarisation agreement of April 1993.

On the humanitarian situation, I spoke to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees last night. I understand that UNHCR is seeking to negotiate access to provide help to the to displaced persons and assistance to those who expressly wish to leave. We have offered technical assistance to UNHCR from Overseas Development Administration experts in the area.

On the position in the other enclaves, there is continued sporadic shelling around Zepa, which is guarded by Ukrainian forces. There are no reports of increased activity by Bosnian Serb forces around Gorazde. Hon. Members will nevertheless share my concern about the safety of British troops there.

We are in constant touch with UNPROFOR commanders on the ground about developments, and we shall take appropriate measures to safeguard the security of our troops. Part of the rapid reaction force is deployed in theatre, where it will be able to support UNPROFOR's political and humanitarian objectives.

At the United Nations we, the United States, France, Germany and Italy are co-sponsoring a draft resolution which was circulated yesterday evening. This condemns the Bosnian Serb offensive; demands that the Bosnian Serb forces withdraw immediately from the Srebrenica area, that the Bosnian Serbs immediately release all detained UNPROFOR personnel and that all parties allow unimpeded access for the High Commissioner for Refugees and other humanitarian agencies to the safe area to alleviate the plight of the civilian population; and requests the Secretary General to use the resources available to him to restore the safe area status of Srebrenica. I look to see a resolution along these lines in New York today.

Beyond those immediate priorities, we have to consider the implication of these events for the political process and for the future of the UN forces. I am seeing Carl Bildt, the new European negotiator, immediately after this statement. He has already travelled extensively in the region, and has had three lengthy negotiating sessions with President Milosevic.

I will be discussing with him how he can use his channels to the parties to help stabilise the situation in Srebrenica, as well his broader objective of a negotiated settlement to the Bosnian conflict and mutual recognition between the republics of former Yugoslavia. Later today, Mr. Bildt will meet the contact group to discuss these developments.

On the future of UNPROFOR, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the House yesterday that the continuing fighting in Bosnia was putting the future presence of the United Nations forces at risk, and that the warring parties had to indicate soon that they were prepared to return to the negotiating table to reach a political solution. That remains the position.

[Mr. Malcolm Rifkind]

There is no question about the value of UNPROFOR's work. This is the largest peacekeeping operation in the history of the United Nations. Forty thousand troops are involved, drawn from almost 40 countries. They have saved tens of thousands of lives. Casualties in the Bosnian war have fallen from 130,000 killed in 1992 to 2,500 in 1994. They have contained a conflict which threatened a wider Balkan war. They are providing support for more than 2.7 million people in Bosnia who have been affected by the war.

But to operate, they require co-operation from the parties. UNPROFOR is not configured to fight a war. We must rely on the judgment of UN commanders on the ground as to whether they remain able to carry out their mandate; so withdrawal must remain an option. The structure for a political solution is there if the parties choose to use it, but they have to recognise that negotiating time is running out.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I thank the Secretary of State for coming to make the statement, and congratulate him on his new appointment. I wish that he were here in rather less sombre circumstances.

Clearly, we are in a serious position. The whole House will share the Foreign Secretary's condemnation of the Bosnian Serbs for the manner in which they have ignored the wishes of the civilised world and overthrown a United Nations safe area. It is an outrageous act of aggression, which places the lives of thousands of innocent people in jeopardy, and the world cannot simply sit by.

The continued presence of UNPROFOR is something with which we concur. We still believe that a worthwhile job is being done in Bosnia by British troops and our allies in UNPROFOR and, as long as our troops are there, doing a worthwhile job, we hope that we can support them.

However, our immediate concern must be for the people of Srebrenica, who are being forced out of their homes in their thousands, often for the second or third time. They are experiencing ethnic cleansing, not only once or twice but sometimes three times. Will the Foreign Secretary tell us a little more about his plans and those of the United Nations for ensuring that those unfortunate people are provided with food and shelter? What negotiations are taking place with the Bosnian Serb authorities so that we can get food to the refugees there?

Will the Foreign Secretary also tell the House what consultation he has had with the French authorities? We understand that they favour a much more robust military approach to the retaking of Srebrenica. What consultation has the Foreign Secretary had with the French authorities, and what is the Government's view of the French proposals?

What is the position of the rapid reaction force? We heard a great deal about it when it was announced five or six weeks ago. We understand from the Foreign Secretary's statement that the rapid reaction force is in the vicinity of Gorazde, but why was it not called to be sent to Srebrenica? After all, we had three days' notice of what was happening in Srebrenica. Where was the rapid reaction force? Where were the guns that would have filled the gap between air strikes and hand guns? That question must be answered.

What is the Government's policy towards the other safe areas, especially those in the eastern enclave? What are the Government doing to try to ensure that demilitarisation in those areas is a fact, not a myth? There is no doubt that, unless there is demilitarisation, or unless one has thousands and thousands of troops, one cannot defend the safe areas. Will the Foreign Secretary accept that no action in Srebrenica can be seen in isolation from the rest of Bosnia, especially the two safe areas in the east that I just mentioned?

Of course, the whole House is doubly concerned about Gorazde, because troops from our country are there. What is the position of British troops in Gorazde? Have they got plenty of reserves? Do they have the facilities to protect themselves? Do we have the assurance that the rapid reaction force, which the Foreign Secretary mentioned, will be there in time? It is no use arriving too late in that situation.

May I press the Foreign Secretary on the basic issue of consultation? At the end of the day, both sides agree that there is no military solution in Bosnia; there will have to be a political solution. Will he confirm that there have been no discussions between the contact group and the belligerents in Bosnia for a number of months? Will he say a little more about when such contacts will be renewed, because they are critical?

Finally, what has happened in Srebrenica came about because of a mismatch between the commitments given by the world through the United Nations, and the resources made available by the countries that make up the United Nations. Will the Foreign Secretary impress on other countries through the United Nations that it is imperative that this cannot happen again?

It is no use making pious claims unless other countries are prepared to try to ensure that there is sufficient force to ensure those aims are adhered to. What we have to do in the international councils is say what we mean and mean what we say; otherwise, it is simply not worth doing.

Mr. Rifkind: May I thank the hon. Gentleman for his personal good wishes? I certainly agree with him that, when the Security Council expresses a policy, it is necessary that those who vote for that policy and support it provide the means of implementing it. I am proud that the United Kingdom is one of those countries which has responded, both in the spirit and in the letter of what has been called for.

The hon. Gentleman asked me a number of questions, to which I shall try to respond briefly. Refugees are the immediate priority. There are up to 30,000 or 40,000 refugees from Srebrenica, many of whom were in Srebrenica as refugees. The immediate requirement is their food and shelter. The UNHCR is currently engaged in providing that, and of course we shall give full support to that objective.

The hon. Gentleman asked me whether we had had contact with our French allies. I did indeed speak to the French Foreign Minister last night. The French have indicated publicly their interest in a possible military response to reverse the situation in Srebrenica. We are awaiting more information from them as to the details of what they have in mind.

Clearly any military operation would be complex. Srebrenica is 170 km from central Bosnia, and therefore any forces going by land would have to continue along a very long stretch of road, most of which is controlled by Serb military forces. Within Bosnia at the moment, there are no helicopters of a kind able to transport such military force. Having said that, the French have indicated an interest in a military response. We need to hear the precise details of what they have in, mind and whether that is perceived to be a militarily realistic solution to this matter.

The hon. Gentleman also asked me about the rapid reaction force. At the moment, some 1,[illegible] additional British troops have arrived in Bosnia, as well as the additional French reinforcements. The 24 Airmobile Brigade has not yet been deployed, because we need to get the agreement of the Croatian Government and the Croatian authorities. Much of that work has now been done, but it has not yet been completed. If the rapid reaction force wishes to be involved in Srebrenica, it will have to traverse that route of 170 km of Serb-held territory. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman must reflect on whether that is a realistic obligation to impose upon it.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the safe areas policy as a whole. The key to the Srebrenica area is whether the Serbs can be persuaded to withdraw from Srebrenica in exchange for the demilitarisation of the town. That is not an unrealistic objective, because both sides agreed to that policy two years ago. It is unfortunate that neither side implemented what they had committed themselves to.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about consultation with the various parties. The most recent development, of course, was the appointment of Carl Bildt, who has been working very closely with Mr. Milosevic to seek a solution involving the recognition of Bosnia-Herzegovina and the suspension of hostilities. Some considerable progress has been made, but clearly there is still a long way to go.

Mr. Tom King (Bridgwater): Did my right hon. and learned Friend hear the comments of Dr. Boutros-Ghali on the radio this morning, in which he seemed to imply that the military response in a particular situation should depend on the individual Government to whom the troops belong—in this case, the Dutch Government? Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that, in this very difficult and dangerous situation, it must be the responsibility of the commanders on the ground to determine the correct military response?

In connection with the serious humanitarian situation facing us, is it not clear that the only immediate prospect of help must lie in his last plea: there must be the clearest assurances on demilitarisation, lack of military activity, from within the enclave outwards? We would then be entitled to demand the withdrawal of the Bosnian Serb forces.

Mr. Rifkind: I very much agree with my right hon. Friend's last observation. Clearly, one of the major causes of tension in recent weeks has been military activity from both the Bosnian Government forces in Srebrenica and the Bosnian Serb forces on the outside. That does not excuse the aggression of the past 48 hours, but we must be aware of the background. Clearly, demilitarisation would be a way in which to ensure the continuation of the enclave and the safety of those within it.

So far as Dr. Boutros-Ghali's comments are concerned, I am sure that the Secretary General recognises more than most of us the crucial requirement that any use of military force in Bosnia-Herzegovina must be based on an assessment by the force commanders and their recommendation that the objectives for which it was used could be realised in that way.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): Does not the sad history of Srebrenica, which the right hon. and learned Gentleman has just related, show that to call an area a safe area, without either the political will or the military resources to keep it safe, is worthless? Is it not now time to try to re-establish the last vestiges of the authority of the United Nations in Bosnia, and would that not be accomplished by the creation and maintenance of a permanent humanitarian route into Sarajevo over Mount Igman?

Mr. Rifkind: In answer to the hon. and learned Gentleman's first question, clearly there are two points at issue. There is not only the unwillingness of the international community as a whole to provide the additional forces necessary, but the question of the mandate that would be needed to enforce a safe area if military activity were initiated by any of the parties against it. As for the other matters that the hon. and learned Gentleman raised, I agree with his observations.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): We all appreciate that it is the clear thinking of my right hon. and learned Friend in his new job that is needed in the present agonising situation, rather then more pious hopes and cliches. I applaud his ambition that we should somehow restore the safe area around Srebrenica, and that we should not abandon the refugees.

However, the question hangs in the air: can we really deliver on those ambitions? Can we protect the refugees, as they are not being protected around Srebrenica today? Has the time not come to reconsider, and will my right hon. and learned Friend please reconsider with his colleagues and other Foreign Ministers, the restraints that prevent the so-called Bosnian Muslims from defending themselves more effectively, as they are desperately trying to do around Sarajevo even now?

Mr. Rifkind: One recognises that there are conflicting interests that we are trying to safeguard. I assume that, in the latter part of his remarks, my right hon. Friend was referring to the arms embargo. The fundamental problem remains, as it has always been, the fact that it is not possible to reconcile the United Nations lifting the embargo with the continuing UN presence in Bosnia-Herzegovina. So far, when faced with that predicament, the Bosnian Government have always concluded that they wished the UNPROFOR presence within Bosnia-Herzegovina to continue. I believe that that is a correct judgment, and we must wait to see whether it remains their view.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Looking back on that long and bitter civil war, and from the Foreign Secretary's statement, is it not clear that the most successful part of what we have done has been the humanitarian aid? Many lives have been saved, and many people who would otherwise have starved have been supplied; whereas military interventions, including air strikes, have been the least successful, as has been most recently established.

Can the Foreign Secretary give an assurance that, when we assess what can and cannot be done, the one thing that will not be abandoned is the humanitarian aid, and that what will be considered most carefully is whether it is wise to enter the war as a participant military force?

Mr. Rifkind: I agree with the general thrust of the right hon. Gentleman's remarks. The humanitarian achievements of the United Nations in Bosnia have been of a remarkable, perhaps an unprecedented, kind. It is probable that more lives have been saved in Bosnia as a result of UN intervention than that organisation can claim in any previous UN operation in any part of the world. Therefore, it is crucial that that huge benefit is not recklessly thrown away because of other disappointments and frustrations.

Of course, if the UN can use both its mandate and the forces available to it to achieve other benefits, so long as they do not jeopardise the humanitarian operation, that is well worth striving for, but I entirely accept that there is a limit to what one can achieve unless one is prepared to cross the rubicon and become a combatant in a war. The UN is not prepared to do that.

Mr. John Biffen (Shropshire, North): I warmly congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his appointment as Foreign Secretary.

Does he ever reflect on the wisdom that echoes down the ages in Bismarck's comment that the Balkans were not worth the bones of a single Pomeranian grenadier? In that context, is it not incumbent upon us to make the most realistic assessment of our current military commitment in that part of the world, of what it seeks to fulfil, and of how those two can be reconciled—and to determine that, ultimately, that judgment will be undertaken by a British Government answering to a British Parliament?

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my right hon. Friend for his personal good wishes. On the final point that he raised, I can confirm that any question about the future of the British forces in Bosnia-Herzegovina will be a matter for the Government and Parliament of this country, and we will not seek to transfer that obligation to any other place.

So far as the thrust of his main question is concerned, while we certainly take the view that there is no justification for the United Kingdom becoming involved as a combatant in the war that is taking place in Bosnia, we do believe that there is an obligation upon this country—as upon other countries—to do what can be done to help save lives and to reduce the nature of the conflict. We have national interests which would be seriously affected if the war were to continue indefinitely, or spread to other parts of the Balkan region.

Therefore, if there is a role for British military forces that does not involve them becoming combatants but which can help advance some of those interests, I believe that that objective should be pursued. While recognising the limits of what can be achieved, we must not ignore the very real benefits which are available.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): Is the Secretary of State aware that I have constituents with sons serving in the Royal Welch Fusiliers in Gorazde, and that the fusiliers have been placed by somebody in as exposed a position as the Dutch were at Srebrenica? Can he assure the House that added protection will be provided for the fusiliers at Gorazde? My constituents want to know where the rapid reaction force is, because their impression is that it is neither very rapid nor much of a force.

Mr. Rifkind: I know that the right hon. Gentleman met the Minister of State for the Armed Forces yesterday, and discussed various ways in which we can enhance the protection available to the British troops in Gorazde. So far as the rapid reaction force is concerned, the right hon. Gentleman will recognise that the approval of the Croatian Government and authorities is required if 24 Airmobile Brigade is to use Ploce on the Croatian coast.

It has been suggested that the authorities will agree, but there are some final discussions which must be resolved before the force can deploy. Notwithstanding that, 1,100 British troops have arrived in Bosnia in addition to those who have been there in the past. They are taking part in the multinational brigade part of the rapid reaction force.

Sir Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): I wish my right hon. and learned Friend well in all he does. Does he agree that what is at stake is not just Bosnia and the poor innocent civilians who are fleeing, but the whole credibility and authority of the UN itself? Does he agree that there are occasions when it is entirely proper for the UN to take armed action against those preventing a UN mandate from being fulfilled? Does he accept that, if Karadzic's Serbs—a gang of brigands who do not represent the whole Serbian population in Bosnia—get away with cocking a snook at the international community, it will be a recipe for international anarchy?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend makes his point, and I understand his strength of feeling on the subject. But the UN can only be expected to achieve results if its member states are prepared to provide assistance to the UN. The harsh and unavoidable truth is that there are very severe limits both on the number of forces that member countries are prepared to send to Bosnia and on the mandate that they are prepared to accept should be the basis on which the forces are sent. Given that fact, some of the criticism that the UN has received in the past couple of years has been misdirected and totally unjustified.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is the Foreign Secretary aware that this has been the saddest and most humiliating blow that the UN has suffered since the organisation was set up? Does not the responsibility lie with the leading democracies, for their sheer lack of resolve in dealing with criminal aggression?

Is it not clear that the Serbian military forces were encouraged day in, day out in the past few weeks by the knowledge that there would be no military retaliation on the part of the UN? Those troops knew that they could carry out aggression such as has been committed, and they knew that they could get away with it. The failure lies with the leading democracies. It has been a shameful day for the international community, and the Foreign Secretary should recognise that.

Mr. Rifkind: It is easy for the hon. Gentleman to make bellicose noises, but unless he wishes to advocate the deployment of many tens of thousands of British and other forces to Bosnia in a war-fighting role, I am afraid that his protestations, although no doubt sincerely felt, add little to resolving the real issues before us.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that UN peacekeeping, as opposed to peace-making, can be carried out only with the support of the parties in the area, and that safe zones can be defended only by conventional warfare, which in reality—I believe rightly—the UN Security Council will not authorise? Is not the conclusion that there is a role for the UN in Bosnia seeking diplomatic progress and looking after desperate humanitarian problems, but currently no role for UNPROFOR?

Mr. Rifkind: I agree with part of what my hon. Friend says. Clearly, the United Nations must recognise what it is capable of achieving, and the limitations of that capability. But within that framework, UNPROFOR is continuing to provide a viable asset for the UN, which could not be resolved in its absence. The extent to which convoys have been able to deliver aid would be crucially less without military escorts in many areas. The extent to which the Croat Muslim reconciliation in central Bosnia requires to be monitored needs a military presence and that, too, could fall apart if UNPROFOR withdrew.

In those and a number of other areas, I believe that UNPROFOR continues to be of considerable significance, which implies that we need a military presence, but not at any cost. The balance of advantage and risk must be constantly monitored, and we, along with other contributing countries, are currently engaged in that.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): As the Foreign Secretary twice referred to the need to listen to the judgment of UN commanders on the ground, why has he conspicuously failed to give his full backing to General Smith's plan to relieve the siege of Sarajevo by opening the route over Mount Igman? Is not that failure to give General Smith the Government's backing a green light to the Bosnian Serbs to carry on defying the UN with impunity?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is totally misinformed. We are entirely willing to support any proposal that General Rupert Smith or the force commanders believe is capable of delivering aid to either Sarajevo or any other part of the country that requires it. The hon. Gentleman must not make claims based on a misunderstanding of Her Majesty's Government's position. I know that the force commanders have been looking at ways of using the Mount Igman route. If they conclude that that is a realistic way to deliver aid, we shall be happy to support them.

Sir Cranley Onslow (Woking): In view of what my right hon. and learned Friend said a moment ago about the French Government, is he confident that it understood in Paris that the UN forces are in Bosnia for humanitarian and peacekeeping purposes, not to get sucked into a war?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, I believe that the French Government share our view about the role of the UN forces. They have made a number of clear and unequivocal statements to that effect. They have been quoted in the past 24 hours as asking whether UN forces could be used to relieve or reverse the situation in Srebrenica. Clearly, the priority now with regard to that suggestion is to see exactly what they have in mind, in what way military forces could be used, and whether there would be a prospect of success.

Miss Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): Does the Foreign Secretary agree that, when we strip away all the fine words, conferences and good intentions, the real policy of the international community over the past three years is to drip, drip, drip, and give in to the Serbs time after time? Can he give one example of the Serbs keeping their word? Is it not time to lift the arms embargo and allow the Muslims to defend themselves?

Mr. Rifkind: The sad but undeniable fact is that all the parties to the Bosnian dispute have given their commitment in writing on many occasions and failed to deliver on many occasions—that phenomenon is not peculiar to one side in the conflict. One is entitled to say to the hon. Lady that the main achievement of the UN forces is that hundreds of thousands of men, women and children are alive today who would not be alive but for the UN presence.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): I accept my right hon. and learned Friend's analysis that to withdraw now would be a policy of betrayal and despair, and that to enforce military action would be a policy of folly. I am glad that he has reacted as he has to the French proposal. But does he agree that, if we are to be effective at delivering humanitarian relief and protecting refugees, it is imperative that, when action must be taken, it is taken swiftly, decisively and with conviction, and that too often none of those qualities has been apparent?

Mr. Rifkind: I agree with that observation. It is very important that the force commanders are given the support they require, so that, if they do wish certain action to be taken, they are not prevented from carrying out that action by considerations that are not appropriate or relevant.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Would the right hon. and learned Gentleman accept my congratulations on his achievement in becoming Foreign Secretary? Many of us would regard his new job as a fitting continuation of the admirable tenure of his predecessor. But does he now realise that it is absolutely essential, if he is going to prove himself in his new job, that he has to mount the resolution of the French Foreign Secretary and do something about the criminal activities of the Serbs?

Does he not realise that humanitarian protection cannot be provided without the use of military power? If our forces in Bosnia are to have any meaning or significance, they have to be used. Would it not be perhaps some strength to him to rid the western view of its pusillanimity so far—to ask our chaps in Gorazde whether they want to take action against the criminal activities of the Serbs? If the Government have not got it, those chaps have certainly got the guts and the balls to do it.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is, of course, correct to say that, in order to achieve the humanitarian objectives of the United Nations, the military has a role to play and a contribution to make. It was with that very much in mind that the United Kingdom, France and the Netherlands announced the sending of substantial reinforcements to Bosnia. A significant proportion of those forces are now in theatre and will help the force commanders to protect convoys and get the aid through to those who require it.

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling): Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that the British contingent to UNPROFOR does not have the role, the numbers or the equipment with the surrounding contingents to carry out a war-fighting role in Bosnia?

[Sir John Stanley]

Will he also confirm that it is no part of the British Government's policy that their present role should slide into a war-fighting role in that country?

Mr. Rifkind: It is crucial that the remarks made by my right hon. Friend are observed, not only in the policy that is pursued by troop-contributing countries, but in the rhetoric that their political spokesmen use. One of the great mistakes of the past three years has been for the United Nations, NATO and individual Governments to use a rhetoric that implies a capability that has never been provided.

It does no good service to the people of Bosnia-Herzegovina to create expectations that cannot be delivered. It is far better to concentrate on the real benefits that the United Nations can provide in Bosnia. Those are already significant and substantial, and I believe that that is the way in which we can properly win the trust of the people of that country at present.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): Will the Secretary of State accept my personal congratulations on his appointment, as an old council friend? Will he also accept that there are serious doubts, first, that the rules of engagement that are currently involved are sufficient to protect our forces in theatre, and, secondly, that the rapid reaction force, as it is being deployed, will be able to secure the safe havens? Thirdly, can he explain to the House why, when he spoke about a political solution, the name of Radovan Karadzic, who steadfastly refuses to come to the conference table, was never mentioned?

Mr. Rifkind: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind opening remarks. Regarding the position of Mr. Karadzic, obviously any political settlement must be acceptable to the Bosnian Serbs as well as to the Bosnian Government if it is to have any prospect of being achieved. The efforts that have been made in recent weeks have involved seeking to use the influence of Mr. Milosevic, and that has been beneficial in several aspects—such as in the release of the hostages some weeks ago—so obviously we must be prepared to consider not only that route but any other that might be productive of success.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): It could not be a better time to have a Foreign Secretary with so much experience in defence matters. However, may I ask my right hon. and learned Friend what lessons have been learnt from the Srebrenica debacle that are applicable in Gorazde, where we have deployed 300 Royal Welch Fusiliers and many Sappers?

Following the earlier question about rules of engagement, will those rules change if those troops have to take off their blue helmets and put on brown helmets as members of NATO?

Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that our rapid deployment force would not get anywhere if it were not for the assistance provided by our ally the United States of America,, with its heavy lift capability? Should we not have that capability ourselves?

Mr. Rifkind: I pay tribute to the United States for providing that lift capability. We appreciate its assistance very much, and I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence will consider the question of the United Kingdom's having the same capability.

As to the rules of engagement, we are in constant contact with the force commanders to assess whether the current rules of engagement are sufficient for their requirements. In the past two or three years, the rules of engagement have changed a number of times, and we are always ready to consider fresh changes should they prove necessary in order to meet our objectives in implementing the mandate.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): In addition to the other points of concern rightly expressed by hon. Members, does the Foreign Secretary recognise the impact that the situation in the former Yugoslavia is having on the adjacent newly emerging democracies such as Romania? What discussions are going on with those countries to ensure that their progress towards democracy and a free market economy is not adversely affected by what is occurring?

Mr. Rifkind: I will, as it happens, be meeting the Romanian Foreign Minister in London tomorrow. We are conscious of the fact that, in imposing sanctions against Serbia and Montenegro, we have been required to introduce measures to ensure that there is no damage to neighbouring countries.

Sir Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that the recent incident occurred within a very short period and came as a great surprise to everyone, including those people on the ground? In those circumstances, is it not correct that all we can do is rely on our commanders on the ground to take the right decisions? Is not their room to manoeuvre seriously curtailed by the lack of a back-up force? In view of what might happen in the next two or three months, is it not a top priority to get the rapid reaction force on the ground somewhere, so that it can be deployed if necessary?

Mr. Rifkind: I agree with what my hon. Friend has said, with one important qualification, which I am sure he will accept. It is no part of the purpose of a rapid reaction force to become a combatant in the conflict. Its purpose will be to assist the force commander in the protection of UNPROFOR, and to assist with the delivery of United Nations humanitarian supplies to those who require them.

We must not allow ourselves to believe that the rapid reaction force has either the size or the military capability to become a war-fighting machine. It does not have that capability, and we would be perpetrating a cruel deception if we implied otherwise.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): May I first congratulate the right hon. and learned Gentleman on following his distinguished predecessor as Foreign Secretary?

Was not the entire UNPROFOR operation undermined from the outset by the uneven-handed approach of the international community? Bosnian Serb villages are put to the torch by commando raids out of places like Srebrenica, and Croatian shells land on Croatian Serb villages near Knin, but the Serbs see air strikes whenever they retaliate. Should we not regard the situation as a civil war? The United Nations has no possibility of solving anything by taking sides in a civil war.

Mr. Rifkind: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that it would be unwise for the United Nations to take sides. However, I cannot agree with the tenor of his other remarks. It is the judgment of Her Majesty's Government and other Governments that prime responsibility for the aggression—including the present situation facing the people of Srebrenica—lies with the Bosnian Serbs.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his appointment, just as I congratulate, as ever, our troops on the ground and the staff at land headquarters in the Ministry of Defence on their professionalism.

Can my right hon. and learned Friend assure the House that the mission of our military personnel has a clarity of purpose that is not apparent to everyone in this country, and that the rules of engagement are shared between all of the allied forces on the ground? I assure my right hon. and learned Friend that, when the time comes to withdraw UNPROFOR troops, he will have very wide support.

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my hon. Friend. There is doubt in some quarters about the clarity of the United Nations mission, because there are calls from various quarters for the United Nations to have a different mission. As United Nations troops are constantly called upon to act as combatants without the force structure or the mandate to do so, the confusion in the minds of many observers is more the responsibility of those who call for such action than it is of the United Nations.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): May I assure the Secretary of State that my son has fulfilled his duties in Gorazde and is now safely back in Britain? However, that does not reduce my concern for serving men and women who do our bidding in bloody awful conditions. Anyone who has been there will know full well the complexities of their existence.

The Secretary of State has already alluded to the nub of the problem. Apart from humanitarian aid, our only success in the past 12 months has been in securing the release of the hostages who were held in custody for such an embarrassingly long time. That was achieved unquestionably with the active persistence and involvement of President Milosevic. In so doing, he downgraded Karadzic in everyone's eyes, and that man lost face considerably.

Will the Secretary of State give the House an assurance that the reports that Milosevic needs a relaxation of the sanctions on Serbia before he helps any further will not be heeded, and that the sanctions will become more stringent until he engages himself as energetically as he did previously?

Mr. Rifkind: Another great achievement in the past year has been further normalisation in central Bosnia, where the bulk of the British forces are found. The relationship between the Bosnian Croats and the Bosnian Government in that part of the country has improved radically. It is one of the benefits that we do not want thrown away by the departure of the United Nations forces.

With regard to sanctions, part of the discussions between Carl Bildt and President Milosevic concerned a possible package of measures whereby, in exchange for the recognition by Belgrade of Bosnia-Herzegovina with its present frontiers, there would be a suspension of certain of the sanctions that have been applied against President Milosevic's Government and country. That would be of benefit if it could be achieved. It is too early to say whether we can look forward to the success of that initiative.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Does my right hon. and learned Friend recall that, a few weeks ago, I asked his distinguished predecessor to bear in mind the military maxim that may have been from Bismarck—never reinforce a failure? Has not the attempt by the United Nations to solve the appalling civil war been a total and utter failure? Is not the distinction or the dividing line between the combat activity and the humanitarian activity of our troops becoming increasingly blurred? Will he ensure that the reinforcements will be sent in only to ensure the speedy return of British troops, and the sooner the better?

Mr. Rifkind: I do not believe that it has been a total and utter failure. While there have been massive disappointments in certain aspects of the policy, there have been equally great successes. A few moments ago, I mentioned the huge progress that has been made in central Bosnia. When I first visited that area, one had to travel around in an armoured vehicle. When I was last there, one was able to walk about without a flak jacket or any protection in large parts of central Bosnia, where civil war had been raging only 12 months earlier. That continues to this day. It is a large benefit.

It is precisely for that reason that we are reluctant to see the withdrawal of the UNPROFOR forces, as that would be bad news for the enclaves and the rest of Bosnia. We are concentrating our attention today on the problems facing the enclaves, but they are five relatively small areas in a much larger country, much of which is at peace. It is important, if at all possible, that it should remain at peace, and not return to the bloody conflict of 12 months ago.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): What does the Secretary of State, who in his previous job had quite a line in bellicosity, say to the charge on the lips of hundreds of millions of Muslims around the world this morning, that, if oil was flowing in the streets of Srebrenica rather than just blood, 29 countries would quickly have assembled a vast armada of armies and air forces to come to the rescue of a sovereign state and a member of the United Nations that is being invaded and subjected to brutal aggression?

If he does not think that that is a fair question, let him answer this one. Precisely why has the sovereign state of Bosnia-Herzegovina not been defended in the same way as the sovereign state of Kuwait?

Mr. Rifkind: I have to say to the hon. Gentleman that, although I respect the strength of his feelings, the contribution by western countries to the UNPROFOR force is very similar to the contribution made by a number of distinguished Muslim countries, such as Malaysia, Turkey and others, which have also sent forces, which are part of the UN force and which are carrying out similar work.

The reality is that there is a fundamental distinction between Bosnia and the other examples that the hon. Gentleman uses. As he well knows, those who are fighting within Bosnia are Bosnian Serbs, Bosnian Croats or Bosnian Muslims. We have a situation which, whether or not we choose to call it a civil car, is a war between people who all have their homes in the same territory.

[Mr. Rifkind]

That makes it a fundamentally different situation from the invasion of a country by a foreign army, and therefore to suggest that the solution that was appropriate in Kuwait is relative in Bosnia is simply unpersuasive and does not commend itself to the British Government or any other Government of which I am aware.

Sir George Gardiner (Reigate): Since it seems increasingly likely that British forces will have to be withdrawn from Bosnia, will my right hon. and learned Friend undertake—in close co-operation, of course, with his colleague the Secretary of State for Defence—total contingency planning, covering almost every detail, to ensure that no British soldiers' lives are lost in the inevitable and eventual withdrawal?

Mr. Rifkind: I can say to my hon. Friend that, over the past few months, NATO has been completing a substantial plan that would involve it being responsible for supervising the withdrawal of the UN force, if that should prove necessary. Virtually all the matters relevant to that plan have now been resolved, and therefore, if withdrawal, sadly, became necessary, I am confident that not only British but UN forces could be withdrawn in good order.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Has it occurred to the Secretary of State that things would have been very different if the United States had shown a fraction of the commitment that the Netherlands has given to the United Nations effort in Bosnia? As, I presume, the attack against Srebrenica would have been resisted had the new United Nations rapid reaction force been in place, will the Secretary of State now tell us whether that pre-emptive strike will be rewarded with success? Are we going to do anything about it?

Mr. Rifkind: The United States Government have made a major contribution, both in the air and at sea, to the policy of the United Nations. With regard to the rapid reaction force, we can make no criticism of the United States Government, who have made clear their determination, with all the power at their disposal, to provide their contribution to the financial support needed for that force, and also to provide lift facilities to transport the forces to Bosnia-Herzegovina, and in a number of other ways to enhance the equipment available to the force commanders.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on his new job, which he got on merit.

Will he confirm that the safe areas were never realistically able to be defended by the troops deployed there; that the rapid reaction force is not a military force capable of conducting aggressive warfare; and that it is there to defend the troops who are there on humanitarian aid? Will he also confirm that, in the event of any redeployment, of whatever kind, including withdrawal, that force will be used to ensure the safety of the troops already there? It is about time we told those who are calling for aggressive action that we have neither the numbers nor the assets to carry out any realistic aggressive action in that country.

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my hon. Friend for his opening remarks.

With regard to the safe areas policy, the United Nations made it clear, when the safe areas resolution was passed, that to be confident in enforcing the safe areas resolutions would, in their judgment, require an additional 36,000 troops. Britain, France, the Netherlands and one or two other countries responded to that additional call for extra support. I have to say that the vast majority did not, so from that moment onwards, there was no way in which one could ensure, by military means, the defence of the safe areas.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): Will the Foreign Secretary resist calls from the bombers and the "do something" brigade, and calmly consider the situation and the realities? Will he also go back to the Security Council and get it to adopt a more sensible policy in future—not calling for safe areas which are not and never can be safe, but agreeing, before adopting such resolutions in future, the resources necessary to realise them, rather than afterwards hoping that something will turn up?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, there are times when United Nations resolutions or statements can have a persuasive effect on a course of action, and therefore one recognises that the language used can sometimes be beneficial. I certainly share the hon. Gentleman's anxiety that, if specific commitments are being given by the Security Council, the United Nations or any national Government, they should be given only when there is a clear will and ability to ensure the implementation of such decisions if they should be called upon to do so. That is perhaps where the problem has been most apparent in recent times.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): Many years ago, during a very undistinguished academic career, I wrote a bit of a paper about international relations between the wars, with special reference to the League of Nations. All I can say is that I have a feeling of deja vu at the moment. Is not the reality that we pass these resolutions at the United Nations, the Americans are not keen, the Germans show a distinct lack of enthusiasm, and, to an extent, the whole thing is a waste of time? If we want to be an International Red Cross or a Salvation Army, fine, but that is as far as we can go, and that is the reality.

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is right to emphasise the limits of what can be achieved by the United Nations. But if one compares what has been achieved by the United Nations during the past few years with what was achieved between the wars by its predecessor, the League of Nations, one sees that the world has moved on, and that the UN has far more to its credit than the League was ever able to achieve. It may be that there are opportunities yet not fully exploited.

Mr. John Austin-Walker (Woolwich): I welcome the Foreign Secretary's response to the question by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing), but earlier he referred continually to the "warring parties". Will he now acknowledge that the legitimate multi-ethnic Government of Bosnia-Herzegovina has consistently shown its willingness to reach a negotiated settlement, whereas the Serbs have not?

Why does the right hon. and learned Gentleman find it surprising that Bosnians in UN safe havens who are totally unprotected should seek to defend themselves? How many of the rapid reaction force, to the deployment of which he has referred, remain in Britain and the home countries that have agreed to send them?

Mr. Rifkind: I think that the hon. Gentleman in the latter part of his question is referring to 24 Airmobile Brigade. We are ready to begin the deployment of that brigade, but we require the agreement of the Croatian authorities, because it is necessary to use the town of Ploce on the coast in order to receive them. Much progress has been made in that area, but some formalities remain to be completed; we hope that they will be completed literally during the next two or three days.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Vulnerability is not of itself a virtue, either for our troops in Gorazde or for the rapid reaction force. If my right hon. and learned Friend and his counterparts from Holland and France want to influence the situation on the ground, they may well have to use the only effective instrument that the alliance possesses, which is its air power. If it is not to be used as a mere pinprick, as a demonstration, it will have to be used in a sustained, concentrated and precise manner; otherwise, the Serbs will simply be goaded to further action. As I said, vulnerability is not a course of action that can be approved by the House.

Mr. Rifkind: I have listened carefully to my hon. Friend, and I know his great expertise on the use of air power. I would add that an additional requirement if air power is ever to be used is that it must be used in a way that does not endanger the safety of the many thousands of UN forces on the ground. That is an important factor, which is bound to be relevant as long as the UN is in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Even if the UN withdrew from Bosnia, there would be substantial limits to what we could expect air power alone to achieve. In the past, it has been useful in softening up an enemy, if those in charge were then prepared to complete the process on the ground—which is what happened in Kuwait. By itself, however, it is unlikely to achieve the objectives that my hon. Friend and I share.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Have not the Bosnian Serbs realised the truth—that trading of hostage-taking against air strikes works, because the western powers give in? Is not the reality that the Bosnian Serbs are now running amok? They are running rings around us, and making us all look like fools.

Mr. Rifkind: The reality is that air power has been used within the past 48 hours. It is available whenever the force commanders recommend its use. I do not believe that, in the first instance, the hon. Gentleman or any other politicians should decide whether to use air power on a particular occasion; in the first instance, such a decision must be based on a recommendation from those with responsibility for the well-being and safety of their forces. They must make their judgment in the light of the circumstances.

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): My right hon. and learned Friend has implied that the active good will and assistance of President Milosevic is an essential ingredient in the achievement of any political solution in Bosnia. What thought has been given to the conditions that Serbia would need to satisfy should it seek any future association with European institutions such as the Council of Europe, the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe and the European Union, from which it has rightly been excluded so far?

Mr. Rifkind: Of course we look forward to the day when such an association might be possible, but it clearly cannot be considered at a time when the international community deems it appropriate to impose sanctions against the Government in Belgrade because of their support for the aggression in Bosnia-Herzegovina. A change in that position is clearly a precondition for the normalisation of relations with President Milosevic's Government in respect of other matters.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): May I echo the Foreign Secretary's earlier words, and say that surely the Rubicon has been crossed? By invading the safe haven of Srebrenica, the Bosnian Serbs have declared war on the United Nations. In the event of their not meeting the various requirements that have been communicated to them, what action will be taken? Has any time span been imposed?

Mr. Rifkind: I am not sure what action the hon. Gentleman is advocating. It is easy to use expressions such as "declaring war on the United Nations", but the hon. Gentleman must reflect on whether he wants much larger numbers of forces to be sent to Bosnia-Herzegovina to become involved in combat with the Bosnian Serbs, for however long, and with whatever consequences. If that is not the hon. Gentleman's objective, he must, in all fairness, recognise the limits of what he can expect the United Nations to be able to deliver.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that, if the United Nations does nothing about the fall of Srebrenica, its credibility is completely gone? All we will be able to do then is accept that we have got it wrong, take our troops out, and either bring them back in some other guise—with a proper command structure and a proper objective, perhaps under European control—or leave them at home in their barracks, where at least they will not be killed by a bunch of bandits.

Mr. Rifkind: As I said earlier, I believe that the objective over the next few days should be to bring about circumstances in which the Bosnian Serbs agree to withdraw from Srebrenica, and the Bosnian Government accept the need for the town and the enclave to be dimilitarised. That is not unreasonable; after all, in 1993 both parties agreed to implement just such a policy.

It is unfortunate that, over the past two years, neither has felt able to comply with that commitment. If they felt able to do so now, it is still possible that a solution could be achieved that would enable the enclave to continue to provide a haven for those who live within it, and enable the Bosnian Serb forces to withdraw. That is, at least, an objective that we should pursue.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Can the Foreign Secretary conceive of any circumstances in which air power could be used without creating a real threat to United Nations forces on the ground? Can the House of Commons have the assurance that Her Majesty's Government are advising all others, particularly the Americans, not to use further air strikes?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, I believe that there are circumstances in which the use of air power could be beneficial, particularly with regard to what is called close air support, where air power is used to provide added protection for UN forces that might be under attack, as we have seen in recent times. There are therefore circumstances in which it is appropriate, but clearly it must be used in a way that does not jeopardise the safety of the forces on the ground; that is why the dual key procedure has been evolved in the past three years to take account of that fact.

Mr. Jim Marshall (Leicester, South): May I ask the Foreign Secretary to reconfirm that peacekeeping operations will be successful only if they have the consent of all the warring factions involved in the dispute? Does he further accept that, if that consent, whether total or partial, is seen to be withdrawn, withdrawal of troops is not a humiliation but could well be a necessity?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is correct to say that, at the very least, peacekeeping in any country, not just in Bosnia, requires a minimum degree of co-operation from the parties concerned, or the only option available is to use peace enforcement, which is a different concept, requiring different military capability and a different mandate. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right: if a peacekeeping force does not receive a minimum degree of co-operation, to withdraw is in no way a humiliation; it is a recognition that those we are trying to help refuse to provide the co-operation that is essential to the UN doing its job.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Given the terrible inevitability of this tragedy, what excuse can be left for denying arms to Bosnian Government forces to defend their people and territory from external Serbian aggression? Will the Foreign Secretary confirm what I understood him to say today—that Her Majesty's Government will support a lifting of the arms embargo, but that that rests with the Bosnian Government formally requesting a withdrawal of the UN protection force?

Mr. Rifkind: Her Majesty's Government continue to believe that the lifting of the embargo would be foolish and is unwise, and we do not propose to support such a proposal. I was referring to the statement of fact, that the Bosnian Government have said that they would rather that the UN remained in Bosnia than that the embargo should be raised and the UN withdraw. That remains the choice that is available to them. I can see no circumstances in which it would be appropriate for the UN to remain in Bosnia if the UN was authorising the supply of weapons to one side in this war.

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Leeds, South): With the benefit of seven weeks' hindsight, does the Foreign Secretary not agree that the hostage crisis and the safe areas crisis are part of a pattern of pressure from the Bosnian Serbs to bring about withdrawal? In those circumstances, are not the suggestions of withdrawal from hon. Members on both sides of the House music to the ears of Bosnian Serbs, and would not a withdrawal lose much of the benefit of which the Foreign Secretary has spoken? Would it not mean just the prolonging of life, not the saving of life, and would it not be the biggest blot on the 50-year history of the UN?

Mr. Rifkind: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, but both he and I must acknowledge that the circumstances might arise that would make withdrawal inevitable. We cannot say that the benefits are of such an order that we can justify the continuation of British and other UN troops in Bosnia, regardless of the threat to them, of the loss of life that they might incur, and of other such factors, so it must be a balanced judgment. At this moment, we still conclude that the benefits of their presence outweigh the disadvantages, but that argument becomes increasingly difficult to sustain if we see developments of the sort that have arisen in recent times.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): What is the Foreign Secretary's view of the growing campaign, led by Senator Robert Dole, which seeks to end American support for the arms embargo on the Bosnian Government? Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman entirely dismissive of the growing belief that a powerful Congress could force such an initiative on a President who is not known for his decisiveness?

Mr. Rifkind: It may not be irrelevant that the sort of views that Mr. Dole is reported as holding were held by many in the American Administration before they took office, but, faced with the realities of the circumstances in Bosnia, and having been required to carry out analysis as to the likely consequences of lifting the embargo, the United States Administration, including President Clinton, have come to the unequivocal view that the lifting of the embargo and the withdrawal of UNPROFOR would be an extremely foolish initiative, and should not be supported.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North) rose—

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth) rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. Mr. Tredinnick, do I understand that you heard the Secretary of State's statement but left the Chamber for some 20 minutes during questioning?

Mr. Tredinnick: That is correct, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: In that case, I do not know how I can call you to ask a question, because you do not know whether your question has already been answered; therefore, to put it might be an abuse of the House's time. Does the same apply to you, Mr. Marlow?

Mr. Marlow: I was out of the Chamber for three minutes, Madam Speaker, but I was here for the whole of the rest of the statement.

Madam Speaker: In that case, I call the hon. Member to put a question to the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Marlow: Is it not the case that, as long as they are having a worthwhile effect and the risks are tolerable, Her Majesty's forces are, for several and various reasons, enthusiastic to remain in Bosnia?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, I believe that to be the case. Certainly, on each of the five occasions when I have been in Bosnia and met members of our armed forces serving there, I have noted considerable enthusiasm for the work that is being done, because they can see the benefits to the people of Bosnia whom they are trying to help. Of course, occasionally, when they are in a location where they cannot help and are being prevented from distributing aid or escorting convoys, there is some frustration. But throughout Bosnia they believe, and rightly so, that the work being done is of enormous importance, and is directly contributing to the saving of life and other objectives of that kind.

Points of Order

4.40 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I do not know what plans you have for the weekend but if you are staying in your official residence, I fear that your peace will be sorely disturbed by a rave party that is being organised and is advertised in the current edition of Time Out in county hall. Given that the House has taken a decision about illegal rave parties, could you make inquiries to ensure that the Japanese owners of county hall do not proceed with that rave party? It would be an insult to the House and it could result in severe damage to county hall. Will you please make some inquiries and get it stopped?

Madam Speaker: I shall certainly give no such commitment to the hon. Gentleman, but I can tell him that I have been disturbed before, whether by rave parties I am not certain, by the activities at county hall.

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I would appreciate your guidance on some remarks in the Chamber yesterday evening during the debate on rail privatisation. During my speech, I drew attention to the poor attendance on the Liberal Benches for the debate on a motion that the Liberal Democrats had inspired, and I mentioned their failure to seek to catch your eye in that debate. A Liberal Member intervened and said:

"in a three-hour debate such as today's, we are not entitled to more than one speech at the beginning and one at the end. We could not intervene even if we wished to do so."—[Official Report, 11 July 1995; Vol.263, c.787.]

I would appreciate your clarification, Madam Speaker, that while they are entitled to open and close their debate, they are perfectly free to catch your eye, as five successive Conservative Back-Bench Members did yesterday. Is not the real reason for their absence that they were just not interested in the debate, and does that not show an appalling lack of gratitude for your championing of the rights of Back-Bench Members?

Madam Speaker: All Members know that, if they wish to intervene at any time on someone else's speech, it is for the Member who has the floor to decide whether to give way. Quite a number of Members wished to speak in both the debates that were sponsored yesterday by the Liberal Democrats.

Perhaps we might get on. I have an inordinately long list of Members who wish to speak in the debate today, and I shall have to limit speeches by Back Benchers to 10 minutes.

Mr. Luff: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. It was not a point of order for the Chair. We have enough business without petty points of order from all parts of the House. We have business to conduct

BILL PRESENTED

Fair Employment (Duty on Northern Ireland Departments)

Mr. Michael Connarty presented a Bill to make it a duty of every Northern Ireland Department to promote equality of opportunity: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon 14 July, and to be printed. [Bill 163.]

Youth Service

4.43 pm

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to establish the Youth Service on a statutory basis.

I seek leave to bring in the Bill in the full knowledge that hon. Members in all parts of the House have, over a long time, sought to bring in such a measure to establish the youth service in such a way. The reason seems self-evident. It is that the youth service is an extremely cost-effective way to deal with the many problems that young people face.

That great watershed, the Education Act 1944, set in motion a train that was reinforced by a number of reports commissioned by the Government. They were the McNair report, the Jackson report and the Fletcher report. Interestingly, when we reached about 1957, the Albemarle committee was set up in response, ironically enough, to the Notting Hill riots. Its work added substance to a national consensus towards establishing the youth service on a statutory basis.

Sadly, in recent years the youth service has shown a marked decline. I would argue that Government action has subverted its role. It is also interesting that the last time that there appeared to be a major Government interest in youth service provision was after the 1981 riots. I hope that it will not take another round of riots before we interest the Government again in the state of the youth service and the lack of resources it faces.

The youth service most certainly faces a lack of resources. I mentioned that it was a cost-effective service. The cost works out at roughly £10 per annum per youngster who uses it. More than 5 million people use the youth service. Those 5 million young people who are actively in contact with the service are serviced by only 6,000 full-time youth workers in England, Scotland and Wales combined. They are assisted by thousands of part-timers, and more than 2 million volunteers who give of their time and energy. Those people obviously recognise the value of the work that is done, not only in the local government sector but—the vast majority—in the voluntary sector.

If nothing else, both the voluntary and the statutory sectors recognise the community of interest they have in having the youth service placed on a statutory basis. There are now fewer full-time youth workers than in 1978. The voluntary sector has suffered in the same way in terms of Government cuts. NABC-Clubs for Young People, a charity, has reported that its funding from central Government has fallen by 40 per cent. Its funding from local government has fallen by 10 per cent.

The reason is not too hard to divine. As the youth service is not on a statutory basis, when Government cuts are forced through in education throughout the land, it is always one of the first services to suffer. I would argue that that is untenable, given the situation our young people face today.

I remind the House that 750,000 young people between the ages of 16 and 24 are outside work, outside education, outside training, outside benefits and outside Government statistics. Those 750,000 people are our own disappeared, disengaged and alienated section of the population. If that does not trigger a response from Members of Parliament and Conservative Members in particular, they should remember that, at the last general election, 2.5 million first-time voters—the self-same young people—did not bother to exercise the franchise. That was almost 47 per cent. of the total.

We talk about the alienation of our young people from the political process. It is not too hard to see why they are alienated, given that they are in a changing world, facing different problems from those that the vast majority of hon. Members on both sides of the House knew when they were young.

Let us think back to our own years in that age group. The majority of people in the House were in that age group in the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s. In those days, there was open access to education. One could look for a job of whatever sort. They were the halcyon days of apprenticeships for huge numbers of our young people. They were days when people felt engaged. They had hopes and aspirations that were achievable.

That has sadly changed. A whole group of people are shown in survey after survey to have no inclination towards what we would call orthodox society. They are turning their backs on it, for the simple reason that they perceive that we have turned our backs on them.

There is one vital difference between the experiences that we all had and those of young people today. They do not have recognisable rites of passage or know that there is a flow to their lives with regular markers that they can follow, such as going into the work force as an apprentice and getting qualified, having access to education, knowing that at the end of it one can get a job or access to something as simple as benefits. Many of our young people—about 160,000 16 and 17-year-olds alone—have been taken completely out of the benefits net.

One of the few agencies that is actively involved with engaging young people in a debate about their interests and future is the youth service. It deserves all the support and encouragement we can give it. We have to say to young people, even if it is by proxy through support for a statutory basis to the youth service, that we are concerned about delivering to them. After all, they are our future. We only steward the country for their generation and for generations to come. Our stewardship is failing them badly.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Peter Kilfoyle, Mr. Greg Pope, Mr. Alun Michael, Mrs. Jane Kennedy, Mr. John Heppell, Mr. David Jamieson, Ms Ann Coffey, Mr. Keith Vaz, Mr. Kevin Hughes, Mr. David Hanson, Mr. Tony Lloyd and Mr. Mike Hall.

YOUTH SERVICE

Mr. Kilfoyle accordingly presented a Bill to establish the Youth Service on a statutory basis: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 14 July, and to be printed. [Bill 164.]

The Economy

[Relevant document: The Minutes of Evidence taken before the Treasury and Civil Service Committee on Wednesday 5th July and Thursday 6th July (House of Commons Papers Nos. 650-ii and iii.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): I have to inform the House that Madam Speaker has selected the amendment standing in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

4.51 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I beg to move,

That this House welcomes the publication of the Government's latest forecast, which shows growth continuing at a steady and sustainable rate, inflation remaining low, exports rising and Government borrowing falling; and recognises that this favourable outlook for the economy is a result of the Government's firm commitment to the healthy and sustainable recovery of a modern and competitive industrial economy.

On Monday, Welsh Labour and Liberal Members failed to turn up at Welsh Question Time. I can only assume that they could not think of anything that they wished to say or ask. I am rather surprised that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) has turned up this afternoon, because he can never think of anything to say that resembles an economic policy. In fact, he comes to debates only when he has to. Once a year at the Budget, and once a year for the summer economic forecast, he hears me describe the progress of the recovery and I set out the encouraging framework for the year ahead. The hon. Gentleman gets up, tells us a few jokes, gives us a few grumbles and platitudes and then he is away again.

All the parliamentary days that the Opposition have allocated to them during the year are problems for the Labour party. It has to cast around for subjects that it wishes to raise. Never once in my time as Chancellor of the Exchequer has it asked for a debate on the British economy. This is a debating Chamber, but so far I have had two years of debating with a tartan Trappist monk.

Why can that be? Why has the hon. Gentleman suddenly become such a diffident shadow Chancellor? The summer forecasts, which we are debating because they are statutorily produced at this time of year, show why. They show that the British economy is doing well and that it will carry on doing well. Anything that is good news for Britain is very bad news for the Labour party.

With every quarter that goes by, this country creates more wealth and more jobs and wins more export markets. The day steadily gets nearer when most people will appreciate from their daily lives that this healthy recovery is delivering rising living standards, more secure employment and more secure family finances.

How can the hon. Gentleman make a speech as shadow Chancellor when he cannot even say whether he agrees with me on interest rates? How can he face the House when he does not have an inflation target? How can he criticise the public finances when he will not say whether public borrowing is too high or too low? He only sets himself a borrowing target that is about as rubbery as an elastic band.

Mr. Alan Milburn (Darlington): Will the Chancellor give way?

Mr. Clarke: It is a little early. I usually give way frequently and shall do so in due course if Mr. Deputy Speaker allows it.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): On the precise matter of the borrowing target, given that the Prime Minister said in 1988 that he would balance the Budget every year, will the Chancellor tell us the first year when he will be able to balance the Budget—is it this century or the next?

Mr. Clarke: There is a forecast which shows that we are well on course to balance in the medium term. Recalling the Red Book, I think that we show balance in about 1998-99, or something of that kind. We are certainly on course towards balance in the medium term.

Mr. Brown rose—

Mr. Clarke: I shall give way again in a moment. In the two years in which the hon. Gentleman has failed to raise the subject of the British economy in the House, he has seen us cut the forecast borrowing requirement, from £50 billion when I took office, to £23.5 billion next year. We have halved it. We are reducing public borrowing and controlling public spending despite all the hon. Gentleman's votes against us. We are well on course to balance in the medium term.

Mr. Brown: Given that the Government have broken all their promises on tax and are now breaking their promises on spending, will the Chancellor confirm that he is breaking the promise made on the balanced Budget? The Prime Minister said that the Budget would balance every year. Will the Chancellor tell us in which year the Budget will balance, and confirm that in 1998-99 there is a deficit of £5 billion in the Budget forecast and that he is wrong?

Mr. Clarke: It is my recollection that the Government's policy—in contrast to the Opposition, who have not had one—is to move towards balance in the medium term. That is all I can recall. I do not recall the 1988 quotation and I do not rely on the hon. Gentleman's recollection of it. We have always made it clear that we believe in balancing the public finances over the medium term. It has always seemed to me obvious that public finances go into deficit in times of recession and recover at the top of the cycle. We are on course for that. Indeed, we have been controlling public borrowing very effectively for the past two years in the teeth of the votes and opposition of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East.

Mr. Milburn: Will the Chancellor give way?

Mr. Clarke: No, I must press on to the summer economic forecast, which is what we are debating and which the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East must have forced himself to read. No doubt he read it through tears and while concentrating ground his teeth, because the summer economic forecast shows that 1994 was an excellent year for the British economy. Output grew by around 4 per cent., which was faster than in any other major European economy; inflation had its best run since the early 1960s; exports grew by more than 8 per cent.; and unemployment fell by more than a third of a million in 1994 alone.

[Mr. Clarke]

The combination of healthy growth, low inflation, strong exports, rising incomes and employment and a falling budget deficit is set, as the forecast shows, to continue in the years ahead. These are the best economic prospects for future growth and prosperity that I have seen in my career in politics.

Partly due to the policy measures that I have put in place, growth has slowed to a more sustainable rate this year. That is deliberate and desirable. The British people want greater economic security and they want to be sure that this time growth will last. The Government are working hard to deliver an economic recovery on which the public can rely—[Interruption.] I shall return to the amendment signed by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and his economic policy in a moment. I was delighted to see it on the Order Paper and I shall give it its fair measure of attention when I get there.

The hon. Member for Bolsover has far more by way of clear economic policy than members of the shadow Front Bench. The contrast between the two is interesting and enlightening. Although it was not called, I propose to speak to the hon. Gentleman's amendment if I can do so and remain in order.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North) rose—

Hon. Members: Give way to him.

Mr. Clarke: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman—my hon. Friend—in a moment. Surrounded by a range of opinions on this subject, the Government are delivering a healthy economic recovery, which will not be derailed by inflation, as it so regularly has been in the past.

Mr. Marlow: My right hon. and learned Friend knows that the list of wonderful and desirable things he is talking about could well be affected by whether at some stage the United Kingdom joins the single currency. There was a vote last week in the Conservative party and 89 of his colleagues signified their support for a platform of no single currency. Does not that mean that there is no possibility in the near future that a Conservative Government could ever seek to put a single currency before the British people? If so, would not it be wise to advise the Europeans that there is not going to be a single currency in Britain? [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the Chancellor answers, the House must settle down. I remind hon. Members that interventions are supposed to be brief and to the point.

Mr. Clarke: I shall stick to the summer economic forecast. We have come here to debate the summer economic forecast, yet those on the Opposition Front Bench have nothing to say, Opposition Back Benchers wish to put forward a very socialist programme and my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) brings up one subject, regardless of what we are debating, on each and every occasion. Judgments about the single currency will be made in the interests of the British economy and in the best judgment of the House if and when the issue arises. At the moment we have a strong, steady recovery, which must be sustained.

The Treasury summer economic forecast shows that we remain on course to deliver sustainable growth. There is no need to react too strongly to the recent slowdown in activity. The reason why I am confident that this is merely a change of pace on a continuing running recovery is that the fundamentals of the economy are now in such sound shape. We expect the economy to grow by around 3 per cent. this year and by 2¾ per cent. next year. That growth will continue to be led by exports, supported by business investment. We expect the current account balance to continue to narrow from £2 billion in 1995 to £1 billion in 1996.

One important feature of the recovery has been that inflation has stayed low as the recovery has matured. Underlying inflation has now been below 3 per cent. for the past 20 months. That is the best performance on inflation that this country has seen since 1961. We expect underlying inflation to rise temporarily to around 3 per cent. by the end of this year, as some of the effects of the recent depreciation of sterling and the worldwide increase in commodity prices feed through into the price change. We then expect inflation to fall back to 2½ per cent. by the end of 1996.

The forecast also shows that Government borrowing is on a clear downward path. We expect the public sector borrowing requirement to have halved between 1993-94 and 1995-96 and to fall to £16 billion—just 2 per cent. of gross domestic product—in 1996-97.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) rose—

Mr. Clarke: Britain's budget deficit is falling faster than that of any other major European country.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Clarke: I think that the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) was first.

Mr. Bruce: I appreciate the fact that the Chancellor wished to finish that point. Does he believe that the forecast of a public sector borrowing requirement of £16 billion for next year would be a favourable background against which to cut taxes, or that he should be continuing to fulfil the golden rule of achieving a balanced budget?

Mr. Clarke: I have always refused to set a figure at which we would cut taxes and a figure at which we would increase them. Budget judgments are far more complex than that. However, it is absolutely essential that public sector borrowing is on course to achieve the balance over the medium term, which is the Government's clear target. Other than that, it is not as straightforward as the hon. Gentleman states, or merely a matter of saying that the PSBR is a particular figure this year and that taxes go up or down.

Mr. Milburn: Will the Chancellor explain why the summer forecast has revised the PSBR upwards from £21 billion to £23 billion? Will he answer the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), the shadow Chancellor: on which date does he expect there to be a balanced budget?

Mr. Clarke: I have explained to the Treasury and Civil Service Committee why we have revised the figure up slightly. The tax take is somewhat lower than we expected for a variety of reasons, including our success with inflation. When wage inflation and other inflation is kept down, the tax take is reduced. It is an irony that, on the margins, low inflation is bad for the PSBR. Our taxes are affected by a low level of inflation, but we set the spending budgets of the Departments in cash so that they spend up to the cash figure set on higher estimates of inflation. That is why we have changed the figure.

Mr. Milburn: What about the target?

Mr. Clarke: The target is to move towards balance over the medium term. I do not believe that, some time in 1988, we made a different promise. I seriously doubt that, but I shall check.

Mr. Gordon Brown: On balancing the budget and tax cuts, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman confirm the following statement in the Conservative party economic brief for this debate? It states:

"The Prime Minister has announced that it is his objective to reduce capital and inheritance taxes, and if possible, abolish them altogether."

Is it the Government's policy to abolish capital gains tax and inheritance tax at a cost of £3 billion?

Mr. Clarke: I heard the Prime Minister last give that long-term objective in a recent speech. In the longer term, I know that the Prime Minister believes that it should be reasonable to get rid of capital gains tax and inheritance tax as well. Inheritance tax is extremely uneven in the way that it falls. Capital gains tax in this country bears quite heavily on some forms of investment, but the Prime Minister has given no sort of commitment about when we might achieve such an ambitious objective. [Interruption.] I heard the speech, unlike the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East. The Prime Minister set out those objectives as a long-term aim for the Conservative party.

Mr. Brown: It is becoming very revealing that the Prime Minister is announcing the Chancellor's decisions in advance of the Chancellor, but will the right hon. and learned Gentleman further confirm that it is now the Government's policy to tax executive share options as income? Having resisted it in three separate Budget statements, but given that it is now being supported by the Tory members of the Employment Select Committee and—I understand—by the Deputy Prime Minister, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman admit that he has been wrong and that it is now the Government's policy to tax executive share options as income and get millions of pounds into the Exchequer as a result?

Mr. Clarke: For a shadow spokesman who has not got a tax policy and cannot even say whether he thinks that taxes are too high or too low, the hon. Gentleman really must not mess about with his press cuttings in that way, trying to find interventions to make in a debate such as this. On share options, he must wait for the Greenbury committee report. [Interruption.] It was this Government who invited the setting up of the Greenbury committee and this Government who invited it to make recommendations. At the right time, we shall respond to Greenbury. Today, we are talking about a summer economic forecast, about which, for all the reasons that I have just been setting out, the hon. Gentleman does not want to talk. He is trying to change the subject from the British economy.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Clarke: No, I am not giving way.

Mr. Brown rose—

Mr. Clarke: I will of course give way to the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman, but not for faffing about trying to get soundbites out of this morning's newspapers. I would like him eventually to address the strong and healthy economic recovery on which he has no comment and for which he has no alternative policy.

Mr. Brown: It appears that the Government's tax policy has been handed over, not only from the Chancellor to the Prime Minister, but to the Greenbury committee. Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman support the principle of taxing executive share options as income? Has he now changed his mind?

Mr. Clarke: The Government are a low-taxation Government. We believe that the economy is more efficient as a low-taxation economy. We have already introduced the lowest corporate taxes in the world, we have a long-term aim of tackling inheritance tax and capital gains tax, we have committed ourselves to considering the Greenbury committee's response and everybody knows that we shall continue to reduce taxation as and when we can afford it and when it is in the best interests of the economy, which is in stark contrast to the total silence on the subject from the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Doug Henderson (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): Will the Chancellor give way?

Mr. Clarke: I have given way far too often. I shall be criticised shortly for having given way too much.

Sir Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Clarke: I shall in a moment. This debate is becoming a dialogue with a man so unwilling to give a speech on the subject before us that he is praying for 10 o'clock tonight and trying to find other things to talk about.

I have just described an extremely healthy economy. Why are we having this debate, except for an opportunity for the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East to try to follow up his morning's reading of the newspapers? One of the curious complaints that some people make about this recovery is that it is too virtuous. They say that, because it is led by manufacturing and exports, the British people have not felt any immediate impact on their spending pattern, and they say that because it is free of inflation, people with heavy debts are not seeing their debts eroded by a fall in the value of the pound.

All that tedious political chat about the feel-good factor at the end of last year has not made anybody believe the sort of rubbish that I have just been describing. The well-being of the people depends on wealth being created by a successful and competitive industrial economy. Secure prosperity cannot be created for families by short-term fiscal gimmicks or by letting prices and incomes rip. First, we must allow the economy to create the wealth and then the economy will distribute it. It is a virtuous recovery and virtue brings its rewards in confidence, security and prosperity for people once they are satisfied that the Government will deliver sustained performance.

[Mr. Clarke]

The strength of the British economy at the moment has not come about by chance. We now have the potential to enjoy the elusive goal of sustained, low-inflation growth because the Government have followed a determined and purposeful path. We have pursued the long-term interests of British industry and therefore of the British people.

The decisions that we have taken are now beginning to deliver real benefits to more and more people. Living standards are forecast to grow by £5 a week for households on average this year, and we forecast that they will rise by rather more than that the following year. Sticking to the policies that have pulled us out of recession can now ensure that living standards will rise not only this year and next year but the year after that and the year after that, and, I trust, for many years to come. That is economic security of the best kind. That is what families, pensioners, home owners, business men and everybody else in Britain today want.

Right hon. and hon. Members have the opportunity today to debate the latest Treasury forecast, and the excellent prospects for the economy and for our people, who expect to benefit from it. But of course forecasting is difficult, and the Government do not claim a monopoly of wisdom in that activity.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East used to come to the House with different forecasts of his own. Hon. Members will remember the unemployment forecast that he made in the House following the March 1963 Budget—[HON. MEMBERS: "When?"] I mean, the 1993 Budget. The hon. Gentleman must wish that it had been so long ago, but it was only two years ago that he said:

"I make one Budget forecast—that after the Budget, unemployment will rise this month, next month and for months afterwards."—[Official Report, 17 March 1993; Vol. 221, c. 289.]

What happened? Unemployment fell that month and the next month, and it carried on falling for months afterwards. It has fallen by more than 600,000 since the hon. Gentleman made that disastrous forecast on behalf of the shadow Treasury team.

It is not fair to say that the hon. Gentleman is never cheerful. He used to smile a little when giving his very gloomy forecasts of disaster for the British economy. In September 1993, even more recently, he said that the balance of payments deficit would worsen over the next two years. What happened? The balance of payments improved; export growth outstripped imports.

The shadow Chancellor can make extremely cheerful forecasts. He was most optimistic about the economic prospects for Mexico. Only last September, in a speech at the National Film Theatre—a suitable setting—he singled out Mexico as a country that had "pursued the right kind of economic policies".

Only three months later the peso collapsed, the economy went into crisis and the International Monetary Fund was called in to stump up the biggest loan in its history. Perhaps the Mexicans, like the British, appreciate today's silence, the absence of forecasts and of any serious economic commentary by the hon. Gentleman.

However, the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East is capable of being clear about some things. In September 1994, he entirely dismissed his political party's principles and past. He said:

"The Old Labour Language—tax, spend and borrow, nationalisation, state planning, isolation, full-time jobs for life for men while women stay at home—are equally inappropriate to the demands of the future as they were to the needs of the past".

So much for the 1983 manifesto, on which the hon. Gentleman and the present leader of the Labour party were first elected to the House.

New Labour language is all platitudes and gobbledegook, and it is no longer I alone who says that. On the Order Paper there is an alternative amendment tabled by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) and 15 other Labour Members. They have set out an alternative Labour party economic policy. [Interruption.] I am sure that that amendment can be spoken to later within the rules of order. It talks about the "gap between rich and poor . . . and the damage being done . . . under capitalism".

It says that we are "controlled by market forces which transfer power from the electors and their governments to unaccountable bankers and speculators",

and

"calls for . . . the maintenance of universal benefits"

at a dignified level, and

"reforms to restore the rights of local authorities and trade unionists and to liberate the people"—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That amendment is not the amendment that we are to debate.

Mr. Clarke: I accept your judgment, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but that amendment has a lot more content than the one that we shall debate.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield) rose—

Mr. Clarke: I shall give way in a moment—[Interruption.] I usually describe Labour Members in the House as sitting in baffled silence like stuffed ducks behind the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East, but now some of the ducks are quacking, and they are setting off in different directions.

I shall give way to the right hon. Member for Chesterfield; he and I are conviction politicians in our different ways. Labour Back Benchers and I agree on one thing: new Labour is a hollow sham—empty, vacuous and devoid of any principle or purpose. Hon. Members on both sides of the House want to hear no more lists of strategies and no more endogenous growth theory. They wish to know what is the economic policy of a party that wants to form a Government.

Mr. Benn rose—

Mr. Clarke: I give way to the right hon. Gentleman, with his distinctive views on the matter.

Mr. Benn: If the Chancellor of the Exchequer reads the book that Harold Macmillan published in 1938, he will find that Macmillan called for a planned economy to deal with unemployment. It is a sign of the change in the Tory party that it should have abandoned some of those principles that drew it in with the Labour party behind the idea of full employment, a national health service and a huge house-building programme after the war. The Chancellor should look at his own past and find out how far he has moved from it.

Mr. Clarke: I have read "The Middle Way" by Harold Macmillan, and I know that what the right hon.

Gentleman says about it is true. But between 1938 and 1995, the Conservative party has evolved its policies. At the moment, a modern industrial economy is best managed as we are managing it, producing growth, falling unemployment, rising employment and low inflation.

The right hon. Gentleman's party has also evolved since 1938, but not in the same way. He would not espouse all the positions held by the Labour party in 1938, but at least he has a core of conviction and principle behind his policies. He saw those policies evolve all the way to the late 1980s, when suddenly they stopped. The people elected with him on the 1983 manifesto now spend their time denouncing those principles to academic audiences. The right hon. Gentleman and I agree that what is before us now is a public relations creation with absolutely no content.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Clarke: No, I shall press on for the moment, before I am in danger of being brought back to the single European currency. I do not believe that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East has ever expressed any views on that, either, but he may have some; there may be more hope for him there than I thought.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East knows perfectly well what my questions to him are. Are interest rates too high or too low? Is the Government's inflation target too high or too low? Is public spending too high or too low? Are public borrowing and taxation too high or too low? Those are my questions, and we cannot have a serious debate with such a formidable Opposition unless they answer them. Until the hon. Gentleman can answer any of those questions, his party has no official policy on the economy and is not fit to be regarded as an alternative Government.

It may help the hon. Gentleman if I set out some of the basic principles behind the Government's economic policy, upon which the recovery so far has been based. First, we are the only party in the House that believes in the economic benefits of being a low-taxation economy. We also know that low taxation depends on firm control of public spending and borrowing. In my two Budgets, public spending projections have been reduced by about £45 billion, and as a result the budget deficits are on a clear downward path.

When we can afford it and when the economic conditions are right, we shall return to our tax-cutting agenda. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East has no right to criticise our tax history when he opposed all the spending reductions that I have described.

Secondly, we believe that firm control of public borrowing is essential because public borrowing is actually taxation deferred. Under the Labour Government, the public sector borrowing requirement reached 9.4 per cent. of gross domestic product, and averaged almost 7 per cent. of GDP every year between 1974 and 1979. Since 1979, the PSBR has averaged 2.5 per cent. of GDP and, as I said, it remains back on course to move back towards balance over the medium term.

Thirdly, low inflation is necessary for growth to be sustained. Last week, the Labour leader made a speech marking the 50th anniversary of the Attlee Government. Today I shall make a brief reference to inflation, to mark the 20th anniversary of the time when inflation reached 26.9 per cent. under the last Labour Government.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East claims to be committed to low inflation, and says that a Labour Government would set an inflation target—he simply is not minded to say what that target is. He refuses to say whether he agrees with the Government's inflation target. I write to him—he will not speak to me—but he has still not replied to my letters of 12 May and 14 June, which asked him for his views on interest rates and inflation.

The fact is that the hon. Gentleman has nothing to say at all on the substance of monetary policy. He has no view on inflation, so he has no view on interest rates. I cannot recall any shadow Chancellor expressing no opinion on interest rates. That is quite an important subject, but I have not heard him express an opinion upon it for at least six months.

I am anxious to make our monetary framework and anti-inflationary policy one of the most open and transparent in the world. The hon. Gentleman is now saying that he agrees with my changes in procedure and openness. His only suggestion is to form a committee to which he will appoint all the members as, he claims, that will somehow reduce the political influence on the Bank of England. I do not quite understand that.

As a result of my changes, the hon. Gentleman now has all the information he requires. He has the minutes of a meeting that I had a few weeks ago, at which I had a difference in judgment with the Governor of the Bank of England. It was a matter of finely balanced judgment. The Governor and I have no difference in aim, and we share a strong personal commitment to making the British economy a low-inflation economy. The Governor and I must weigh the balance between the activity data on one hand and price pressures on the other. The Governor inclined one way; I inclined another. I decided that there would be no interest rate rise that day.

The shadow Chancellor has had weeks to study all the data that were before the Governor and me when we took that decision. He has even been able to read the minutes, see the arguments and read and consider the Governor's advice. He even has the benefit of hindsight, and he can look back now and say what his opinion might have been. Can this aspirant to high Government office say today whether he agrees or disagrees with my decision? The hon. Gentleman may be a slow decision maker, but if he is posing as a would-be Chancellor, he must show that he is capable of making a decision or having an opinion. But he is not capable. The hon. Gentleman does not have a view at all.

Let us hear it. Interest rates—too high or too low? What about my judgment on interest rates? The hon. Gentleman is meant to shadow my decisions. He is meant to say when he agrees with me and criticise me when he does not. He is a tartan Trappist monk with nothing to say on the key features of economic policy.

Most importantly, we believe that businesses, and not Government, create prosperity and jobs. The supply side reforms that the Government have put in place in the past 16 years have transformed the British economy for the better. All those reforms were opposed by the Labour and trade union movement when it held to its old principles.

[Mr. Clarke]

During the 1980s, Britain moved from the bottom to the top of the international league table for growth. There are now 50 per cent. more active businesses in Britain than in Labour's last year in office. Last year and the year before that, Britain had the fastest-growing major economy in Europe, and this year we look set for a repeat performance.

The hon. Gentleman and his party are still wedded to some old-fashioned approaches that would saddle British business with Government-imposed costs and make it more expensive to create jobs in this country. The minimum wage would cost thousands of jobs and would add billions of pounds to businesses' costs. The social chapter would destroy Britain's reputation—a reputation that matters to us—as the best place in Europe in which to invest and do business in the European single market.

The Government have set out clear objectives for our economic policy. We have an inflation target, a public borrowing target, clear plans for public spending and a longer-term commitment to reduce the basic rate of income tax to 20 per cent. Those are clear and decisive policies that are delivering the goods, and a forecast today shows that the economy is in the best shape for decades.

The British public want an economic recovery which lasts, which is for keeps and on which they can rely to bring rising living standards to them and their families to the end of the decade and beyond. Only modern Conservative economics can deliver that goal, and the summer forecast shows that, between now and the next general election, we can take the message of growth and hope from house to house and town to town in this country. Ours is a clear message, a Conservative message, and a message that is succeeding in making Britain an economic success story again, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'notes not only the Government's forecasts but the recent White Paper on competitiveness showing Britain lagging behind its major competitors in its preparations for the challenges of the future; regrets that living standards are still falling for millions of people as a result of the biggest tax rises in Britain's history and the recent rise in the costs of being a home owner; deplores the levels of long-term unemployment and youth unemployment still prevalent in Britain today; calls for an end to complacency over the levels of investment in technology, employment, training and skills and a recognition of the importance of higher levels of investment in new employment opportunities and in long term sustainable growth consistent with low inflation; and calls for a fairer Britain, including immediate Government action to tackle the excesses in the boardrooms of the privatised utilities.'.

Let me begin by welcoming the three new members of the Chancellor's Treasury team, and congratulating the Chancellor of the Exchequer on—how should I put it—holding on to his job. He is now confirmed as the Chancellor of the Exchequer; one of the second Secretaries of State.

The starting point of the debate is that the country needs real policy changes to prepare it for the great technological, global and financial changes that were barely mentioned in the Chancellor's speech. To bridge the investment and prosperity gap with our competitors, we need these changes.

First, we need detailed measures for new investment in the economy and for stability, including the new monetary framework that I have set out. Secondly, we need measures to ensure that there is a revolution in skills, with new policies—not just a new Department—for education, training and employment. Thirdly, we need measures to tackle long-term youth unemployment and to encourage a fiscal regime and policy with rewards and incentives that are fair and seen to be fair, and that means tackling many of the abuses in the privatised utilities.

We are faced with those great new challenges, and we are faced also today with unacceptably low levels of investment in the economy. The Government's own competitiveness White Paper said only a few weeks ago that an enormous task was yet to be faced, and there were more reports this morning of difficulty in the housing market and the labour market, and a report that manufacturing output is down yet again.

Given all that, the complacency of the Chancellor's speech—and, indeed, his whole attitude and approach—is breathtaking. It is remarkable that the Conservatives talk to the country about change when they are trying to occupy Labour's ground. They talk of intervention in training and education, and suggest that they will act to stem boardroom pay abuses.

The Chancellor was incapable of bringing anything new to his speech. He did not even have scant recognition of all the implications for his economic policy of his new next-door neighbour at No. 10a Downing street.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): The hon. Gentleman has mentioned a matter to which he has referred in a number of his sound bites—investment in training and education. That will require more money. Will the hon. Gentleman now say whether that money will be raised through higher taxes or through higher borrowing? If, as is inevitable under all Labour Governments, it is through higher borrowing, in what way will the hon. Gentleman's Government differ from the experiences of every Labour Government since the war—borrowing too much, spending too much and finally collapsing into the arms of the IMF in abject surrender?

Mr. Brown: First, I would stop talking about new initiatives for training and education while cutting the budgets of training and enterprise councils, as the Government have done, in such a way as to downgrade the importance of training. Secondly, I would say yes, we need a statutory framework for training—not the voluntaristic approach adopted by the Government—and yes, I do believe that employers will have to contribute more to the training of the work force if we are to have a successful economy in the future.

The whole theme of the Chancellor's speech—if I heard him correctly—was that we have the best prospects that he has seen in 30 years. He said that we have "excellent prospects—the best in a generation." Tell that to the millions of home owners in the country; tell that to thousands of small business men who are worried about what is happening in the retail market; tell that to the construction industry, which reported only yesterday that it is in its worst position for three years in terms of new orders; tell that even to some members of the Conservative party, such as a well-known Tory fund-raiser who has lent the Tories thousands of pounds.

He has not said that we have the best prospects for 30 years—he has said that conditions are as tough as anything he has experienced in 26 years of business.

If the Chancellor wants to give home owners better prospects, having forced up their bills by 20 per cent. by cutting mortgage tax relief, why does he not agree that on Monday he will withdraw the proposal that will remove help for homeowners on income support when they are unemployed?

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): I appreciate the brilliant speeches that we have heard, but will the hon. Gentleman give some guidance to the people of Britain who want to know whether it is the basic aim of the Government, and the Opposition as an alternative Government, to seek to rejoin fixed exchange rates? May we have a brief answer to that question from the Government and the Opposition, as it would be of immense value and help to people outside?

Mr. Brown: We have no such proposal. The Government talk about a strong pound, but they should consider what has happened since 1979. Set against the deutschmark, the pound is now worth half what it was in 1979. The Chancellor told the Treasury Select Committee that economic conditions were bound to be reflected in what was likely to happen to the pound over time. It is a sad indictment of Government policy that the pound is now worth half what it was when the Conservative party came to office.

The Chancellor says that we face the best outlook for 30 years and that prospects are the best for a generation. I recall another statement that he made:

"We face the best economic outlook that most people of today's working generation have ever faced in their lifetime."—[Official Report, 20 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 424.]

Today he makes the same claims with the same confidence, complacency and certainty, but when he made it in 1986, it was just before the Conservative party let inflation get out of control and interest rates rise, causing the worst recession for 60 years.

The Chancellor asks whether growth will last, and answers by telling us that this time of all times it will. Does he recall telling the Welsh Conservative party conference:

"There is no doubt we are now enjoying quite extraordinary growth. The real question is: will it last?"

"Yes," he said, "it can last." That was in 1988, just before the Conservatives drove the economy into recession. He praised, not the current Prime Minister but the work of Lady Thatcher, for all those achievements. Inside a year, that growth was to develop into a recession.

We have heard all the Chancellor's predictions and statements before. They are familiar boasts. The reason why they do not make sense is that the Chancellor and his colleagues have failed to tackle the underlying weakness of the economy.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We were enjoying a strong recovery in 1986-88, of a kind that was utterly unprecedented, as it was a recovery from the Labour years. Monetary policy and inflation went wrong in the late 1980s and the whole recovery was brought to an end.

I am now taking interest rate decisions to ensure that this recovery is combined with low inflation and that it lasts. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that monetary policy is crucial to that? Does that therefore mean that interest rates are crucial? What are his opinions on the interest rate decisions that I have taken in recent weeks?

Mr. Brown: It is because we think that monetary policy is important that we have made proposals for a new approach to monetary policy. Does the Chancellor support, as we do, the creation of a monetary policy committee within the Bank of England? Does he support, as we do, strengthening the Bank of England's advisory function? Does he support opening up the Bank of England to greater scrutiny of the advice that it gives, as many Conservative Members do? I see that the majority of Conservative Back Benchers present in the Chamber are supporters of the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), so the Chancellor should listen.

Does the Chancellor support, as we do, widening the scope of the group of independent advisers to the Treasury? Does he support the changes in monetary policy that would make it far more stable and consistent and end the uncertainty that occurs every time he meets the Governor of the Bank of England, which creates an unstable framework for the future of monetary policy?

While he is answering my questions, will he say which is his inflation target: 2.5 per cent.; 3 per cent., which he said is a triumph; or 1 to 4 per cent., which he announces to the public? Or would he, as he said to Conservative Back Benchers, reach 1 to 4 per cent. only on some but not on all occasions? Which is the Government's inflation objective?

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It is no good the hon. Gentleman appointing a committee of his friends and cronies with the idea that that will tell him what to do about monetary policy. He says that I must make advice from the Bank of England more open. I have made it more open. The hon. Gentleman can read the advice of the Governor of the Bank of England. Were the hon. Gentleman ever Chancellor, he would have to decide whether he agreed with it. My inflation target is 2.5 per cent. or less. I set policy month by month to deliver that target until the end of this Parliament and beyond.

What is the hon. Gentleman's inflation target? He does not have one. His list of procedural changes is vacuous rubbish to try to cover the fact that he has no policy. He has just conceded on the critical policy judgment at the end of the 1980s.

Mr. Brown: The Chancellor has not answered my questions: what is the status of the 1 to 4 per cent. range? What is the status of the paper that he sent to Conservative Back Benchers saying that 1 to 4 per cent. was applicable most of the time but not all the time? What is the status of his statement that 3 per cent. would be a triumph? What is the Governor's advice on whether the Chancellor will meet the inflation target of 2.5 per cent.?

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The target is 2.5 per cent. or less. As my speech made clear, it is not possible in the real world to hit the same figure month by month, because inevitable variations take place, so setting policy at 2.5 per cent. or less will in practice lead to inflation of between 1 and 4 per cent. The Governor and I agree on pursuing that target, which is set by the Government, and he advises me on monetary decisions that I must take to deliver it. That could not be clearer. It is ridiculous for the hon. Gentleman to make comments based on getting hold of a central office brief, which is perfectly open, and then to say that that somehow alters the absolutely clear text of the speech that I had made, which the document simply purports to describe.

My inflation target is clear. What is the hon. Gentleman's? What is his current policy? How dare he come here and talk about monetary policy and interest rates when he has not a serious word to say on the subject?

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Brown: I shall deal with interventions from both sides of the Conservative party in a moment.

The Chancellor says that he is setting policy to reach an inflation target of 2.5 per cent. He has refused to answer my question as to what advice the Governor has given him.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Gentleman can read the Governor's advice for himself. Thanks to the changes that I have made, the Governor's opinions on this matter will appear at monthly intervals, but the hon. Gentleman will say nothing in response. He can read the minutes that I have published. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where are they?"] I do not have them with me, but hon. Members can read them. One can take a horse to water but one cannot make it drink. For the guidance of Opposition Members, I have published an accurate account of the Governor's advice. What does the hon. Gentleman do but come along and ask me what it is? He should go away and read it and then tell me whether he agrees with it.

Mr. Brown: The Chancellor will not tell us what the Governor's advice, is because the Governor has said that he will not meet the Chancellor's inflation target of 2.5 per cent. The reason he will not meet his inflation target is because the Chancellor has not addressed the underlying weaknesses of the British economy.

Mr. Budgen: Will the hon. Gentleman explain a little further his proposals for extra committees within the Bank of England? Is he really proposing that there should be some form of independence in the Bank of England, or is that just a bit of window dressing? Does he agree with the Government that, ultimately, any Government must take political responsibility for interest rates and be responsible to the House for them?

Mr. Brown: No, I do not propose independence for the Bank of England. But the demerits of the personalised system of the Chancellor meeting the Governor, which is the basis of setting monetary policy, without strengthening the advice to both the Chancellor and the Governor, has been exposed this afternoon by the Chancellor's failure even to remember what the Governor said to him.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Let us have a little clarity and common sense. The hon. Gentleman has just said that he believes that the Governor does not think that we shall hit our target and has implied that he agrees with the Governor. That means, I take it, that he would have put interest rates up.

Mr. Brown: What I said was that, under existing policies, the Chancellor would not meet his target. The reason that I said that he would not make his target—and the Chancellor should not try to misrepresent what I said—is that the Government have not tackled the underlying weaknesses of the economy, which are the barrier to long-term sustainable growth.

If the Chancellor—[Interruption.] Every time that is mentioned, the Chancellor laughs, but investment in manufacturing is 25 per cent. less than it was in 1989. Investment in the real economy is 10 per cent. less than it was in 1979. The Chancellor says that we are making an excellent recovery from the recession, but investment has increased by only 3 per cent. in the first years of what he calls a recovery, whereas it increased by 30 per cent. in the 1970s and by 20 per cent. in the 1980s.

We have a lower increase in investment out of recession than even in the 1930s. What some countries achieve by way of investment in a recession, we cannot even achieve in this country in a recovery. The failure to tackle the underlying weakness of manufacturing and general investment in the economy is the reason why, every time we expand as an economy, we run into inflationary pressures, we have to increase the amount of imports and interest rates have to be raised; and we are reaching that point at an earlier stage of the economic cycle than previously.

The idea, therefore, that the Government can offer the country the best prospects for 30 years based on a failure even to acknowledge the underlying weaknesses of under-investment in the economy is a myth that will be exposed cruelly as events take their course in the next few years.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington) rose—

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (Surrey, East) rose—

Mr. Brown: I give way to the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman), after which I shall move on.

Mr. Forman: I seem to remember, having attended several of these debates in which the hon. Gentleman has sought to make these rather vacuous speeches, that his policy rests essentially on increasing public investment in education and training and other forms of human capital. Indeed, the Labour party waxes lyrical about that. The hon. Gentleman goes on to say—he said that last year and he said it recently—that he would finance that by increasing public borrowing. How can he possibly come to the House and claim that he would increase public borrowing without taking a risk on interest rates and the likelihood that, under Labour, interest rates would be higher?

Mr. Brown: It is the Chancellor who has increased the amount of borrowing in his forecasts, from £21 billion to £23 billion—from £12 billion to £15 billion next year—and still tells us that he will achieve tax cuts. I want borrowing to be cut, and the first way to cut borrowing is to cut unemployment in the national economy.

The reason that the Conservatives cannot solve those long-term problems of an economy that generates inflation as it expands and of an economy that requires higher interest rates as it moves forward is that they have not tackled those underlying weaknesses, which require an investment-led recovery. That is what the people of the country need.

Nothing has changed under the Government. Nothing has changed since the Prime Minister said that he had to have his re-election guaranteed by his party. Nothing has changed in the policies for education and training, for manufacturing, for investment and for the infrastructure of the economy. All that has changed is that we have the Prime Minister's announcement of what he calls a reconstruction of personnel in his Government.

It is not a reshuffle. It is not the refreshing of the Cabinet that took place last year, although the two members that he brought in then—the Chief Secretary and the Conservative party chairman—have now gone. It is what he advertised as a reconstruction of his Cabinet—a reconstruction, I suspect, only in the crudest motor trade sense, an attempt to salvage one passable vehicle from the wreckage of two.

What does that reconstruction add up to?

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding) rose—

Mr. Peter Ainsworth rose—

Mr. Brown: I am not giving way again.

It adds up to a new Minister in charge of presentation, a new Minister in charge of information, a new Minister in charge of competitiveness—and those are only a few of the titles that the deputy Prime Minister has insisted on for himself.

What is that new job of Deputy Prime Minister all about, and what is its connection with the economic policies that the Chancellor must now make? How will the new Deputy Prime Minister define the purpose of his job? What will be his rallying call at the Conservative party conference in October in the new slot that must be taken away from the Chancellor for the Deputy Prime Minister?

Remember that famous conference speech that followed his ascent to the presidency, when he promised that he would intervene and intervene and intervene? When he stands up at Blackpool this year, will he echo that famous speech with a new promise of his purpose more in keeping with his new role, a new pledge to delegates of what he will personally do—interviews before breakfast on the "Today" programme, interviews before lunch on "The World at One", interviews before tea on "PM", interviews before dinner, and get up next morning and start all over again on an interview on the "Today" programme, complaining about bias against the Conservative party by the BBC? In spite of all the new titles that he has, the most important of his new responsibilities is as the Minister for keeping up appearances.

The Deputy Prime Minister is the new man at No. 10a and, to the Chancellor, Downing street looks a bit more crowded this week. We have that great new triumvirate of neighbours in Downing street, at Nos. 10, 10a and 11; the most powerful men in the country forming the new Downing street residents association.

There are some difficulties for the Chancellor and a distinct risk to his position in what is happening at No. 10a. Look at the remit for the work of the new man at No. 10a. He now chairs the Cabinet Ministerial Sub-Committee on Public Sector Pay—it sounds as though that should be the Chancellor's job. He chairs the Civil Service Employers Group—it sounds like the Chancellor's job. He chairs the Senior Civil Service Group—it sounds like the Chancellor's job. When Professor Peter Hennessy said that the Deputy Prime Minister would reach for the parts that no previous deputy had managed to reach, he presumably meant encroaching on the Chancellor's job at No. 11.

Mr. Peter Butler (Milton Keynes, North-East): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am as happy as anyone else to enjoy a joke for a minute or two, but may I invite you to consider whether this has anything at all to do with the motion?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is a bogus point of order, and the hon. Gentleman knows it. If it had been out of order, it would have been ruled out of order.

Mr. Brown: I am talking about the conduct of economic policy and the way in which it will be managed in future.

I know that the Chancellor did not read works as trivial as the Maastricht treaty, but perhaps he should read the book that was written by the new Deputy Prime Minister entitled "Where There's a Will"—his clearly stated ambitions laid out as early as 1987—for the First Secretary is now doing everything that he signalled in that book.

The new Deputy Prime Minister said in his book that his ambition was to preside over what he now calls a transgovernmental machinery, chaired, naturally, by himself. What are the tasks? The promotion of Britain's strategic wealth-creating interests—it sounds remarkably like the Chancellor's job to me. The flow of incentives—it sounds a bit like the Chancellor's job to me. In his book he then says:

"This committee must also deal with another important issue—the tax system."

It sounds remarkably like the Chancellor's job again. What is the Deputy Prime Minister trying to do? It sounds remarkably like the Chancellor's job to me.

Indeed, if the book is pursued, the criticisms of what has gone wrong in the British economy are laid at one door by the Deputy Prime Minister—the door of the Treasury. He says:

"The weakness is that there is not sufficient challenge to Treasury judgments", which may frustrate the strategic industrial objectives of the Government. Therefore one may expect some action in Downing street about that.

Of the Treasury, he says:

"What is interesting is how often the Treasury can fail to see the big defect in its conduct of affairs".

Is that not a formula that the Prime Minister has invented for serious conflict—indeed disorder? Already this morning, we had the divergence of opinions on executive pay.

What can we expect during the summer and the autumn? How will things settle down? What can we expect from this new Downing street residents association? Let me draw the Chancellor's attention to some of the problems that his new neighbour is likely to bring; the new hazards that threaten the once respectable residential cul-de-sac and have just been dumped on his neighbourhood.

Is the Chancellor prepared to put up with a neighbour giving loud radio and television interviews at all hours of the day and night? Is he aware of his neighbour's insatiable ambitions, which he is showing already, for home improvements, with a succession of new extensions at No. 10a encroaching on No. 10 and No. 11?

How will the Chancellor feel when he looks nervously out of his back window each morning and sees yet another unannounced Portakabin, so much so that the Downing street garden is at risk of being so encroached on that there will be standing room only for the press the next time that the Prime Minister resigns as Conservative leader?

How will the Chancellor feel when he walks out, that November day, with his Budget red box and finds his parking space blocked by the Deputy Prime Minister's Jaguar, and his own car cannot come in because the entrance is blocked by the media because the First Secretary is giving yet another interview in front of the cameras?

It is the familiar formula for trouble on the street—the build-up of tensions, noise, pushy and aggressive behaviour, territorial disputes, the long hot summer ahead in Downing street and aggressive men with not enough to do, men whose future employment prospects are bleak, with no long-term stake in society. Even the constant police presence will not provide reassurance. Appeals from senior community leaders, such as the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), Lord Archer or the chairman of the 1922 Committee, will not be able to restore calm. As the Chancellor will discover in Downing street, two's company and three's none. By the autumn, he will become a convert to Labour's new solutions for curbing persistently anti-social neighbours.

I am glad that the Deputy Prime Minister is now in post, because the former President of the Board of Trade was far less complacent and he had a far greater appreciation of what is fundamentally and structurally wrong with the economy. The Chancellor will know that, in his previous works, the Deputy Prime Minister proposed a statutory approach to training—about which I was asked this afternoon—development agencies for England, which the Conservative party brief now criticises; signing the social chapter; new monopolies and merger legislation; and an industrial policy for the country.

The Government cannot implement those policies—even though they are right for the country—because they are so divided, from top to bottom, between right and left, about what must be done that there is paralysis at the centre of Government. They cannot adopt the industrial policy because the right oppose it; they cannot privatise the Post Office because the left oppose it; they cannot reform the City because Lord Hanson has threatened to withdraw his money; and they cannot stop the mad policy to privatise the railways because of the right wing.

People will remember that the big case made in support of the Prime Minister only a few days ago was not that he could lead the country and prepare us for the future, but that he was the only person who could unite the Conservative party. He was the least worst option, as the Minister of State for Transport said when putting his case. The Prime Minister has not introduced any new policies except for the one revealed by the Chancellor this afternoon when he failed to answer properly the question that I put to him.

The Prime Minister issued a manifesto, in that desperate period between wobbly Monday and wobbly Tuesday when he returned from Cannes, which is simply a group of uncosted spending promises. That is what the Conservative party has been reduced to in order to encourage its members to vote for the Prime Minister. The abolition of capital gains tax—one of the Prime Minister's objectives, as stated in a fax to the Evening Standard when it carried an article listing what the Prime Minister believed in—will create £1.6 billion, rising to £3 billion. The Chancellor should know that 50 per cent. of that will go to only 2,000 people in this country. It is a straight handout from people who are poor to people who are very rich.

Another aim of the Prime Minister is the abolition of inheritance tax. The Chancellor will know that, while there is a strong case for raising the threshold, the abolition of inheritance tax will create £1.4 billion, of which 50 per cent. will go to only 2,000 estates in the country. I can well understand that the Prime Minister is embarrassed. At the last election, he promised to do something about inheritance tax, but he never did. He broke his promises not only to the living, but also to the dead; such was the Government's failure to honour their tax promises from the election campaign.

There are other uncosted spending promises, such as the promise of tax relief for home owners—which has been signalled today in the press—and the promise of tax relief for community care. The Conservative party made £11 billion of uncosted spending promises in 11 days—that is £1 billion a day just to secure the Prime Minister's re-election as leader of the Conservative party. That is not a failure of Government; it is a failure of opposition. As the Chancellor prepares for opposition, he will have to learn the importance of not making uncosted spending promises.

The Prime Minister's proposals are targeted: they will target all the wealth on a privileged few. When a choice must be made about spending priorities in this country, it should not be in favour of tax cuts that are geared to the very wealthy, based on the abolition of inheritance tax and capital gains tax. If any Government are to be serious about justice and fairness, they must deal with the problems of education, health and our public services, while providing a proper tax deal for middle and lower income Britain.

The Chancellor must also realise that the case for taxing executive share options as income—the one proposal that the Prime Minister did not mention, but which is apparently favoured by the Deputy Prime Minister—should be accepted now. When everyone else pays income tax on all their income, apart from personal allowances, how can the Chancellor justify top executives in privatised utilities having the privilege of escaping paying income tax on their earnings and simply paying capital gains tax? How can the Chancellor justify the millions of pounds that have been lost to this country through his refusal to implement our policy in the past few years?

The Government have broken their promises on tax and on spending. They have broken all the promises that they made at the last election. The Conservatives said that they were committed to the biggest investment in transport infrastructure in our history; that promise was broken. They promised to invest in the railways, but that promise was broken. They promised to invest in housing, but that promise was broken. They promised to invest in law and order and environmental protection, but those promises were broken.

The Government promised substantial assistance in the area of heritage, but instead they cut 5 per cent. from the budget. They promised to invest in the railways, but they cut the railway investment budget. They are now having to subsidise the franchise companies, not to improve the rail stock, but in order to make them saleable. The Conservatives have betrayed their promises on tax and spending, and this afternoon they betrayed their promise of a balanced budget.

Despite the Prime Minister's claim in 1988 that the Government would balance the Budget, the Chancellor cannot tell us the year in which he will do that. The Conservatives promised an economic miracle and they did not deliver it. They promised us zero inflation and they failed. They promised that the pound would replace the deutschmark, but that did not happen. They have broken promises everywhere.

The debate puts on record the fact that all the Chancellor's central economic promises have been broken, and the electorate will draw their own conclusions. The Conservatives can talk all they want about what the Prime Minister calls "reconstruction", but the trust that has been thrown away with 16 years of broken promises can never be reconstructed. People will never trust the Conservative party again. After 16 years of broken promises, while other countries move ahead and prepare for the future, the Chancellor must recognise that, along with the devaluation of our currency, we have seen a devaluation of the office of Chancellor and the integrity of the Government. The only way to ensure that there are no more broken promises is for the Government to go, and to go soon.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next hon. Member to speak, I remind the House that Madam Speaker has placed a limit of 10 minutes on all speeches by Back Benchers during the debate.

5.57 pm

Sir Peter Lloyd (Fareham): The speech by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) contained some very good jokes, but the content was extraordinarily thin. At one stage, it seemed that he was about to relaunch Harold Wilson's white-hot technological revolution, but even that went rather cold.

Time is short and many hon. Members wish to speak in the debate, so I shall confine myself to making only one major point. Many of my hon. Friends and some distinguished commentators have urged the Chancellor to make dramatic cuts in the Budget this autumn. They argue that it is essential to provide an extra stimulus to the economy, which, after a period of impressive growth, has recently begun to show some signs of sluggishness. They also believe that the policy would prove popular with electors, who need to be reminded that the Conservatives are on the electors' side when it comes to their take-home pay.

I do not know how much room for manoeuvre the Chancellor will have in November—I do not suppose that he is sure himself yet. However, I hope that he will view the advice about the sure-fire economic and political efficacy of tax cutting with the same shrewd scepticism that he displayed some months ago in response to Mr. Eddie George's recommendations that interest rates should rise.

I hope that the Chancellor will find that he can safely reduce some taxes and, if he does, I hope that he will use the opportunity judiciously, and remove impediments to economic growth and job creation. I hope also that he will remedy particular unfairnesses in the system, rather than spread largesse thinly and promiscuously across the board in an attempt to please everyone. But it does not appear that he will have very much scope for tax reductions in the autumn, unless he finds a way of reducing public spending much more thoroughly and speedily than any of his predecessors ever managed to do.

Public sector borrowing is still too high; what is more, it is higher than my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor forecast last year. Some of my hon. Friends might point out that that is because tax and other receipts are lower than forecast. Some of that may be due to lower inflation, but clearly there is an argument that economic activity is less than expected and needs some stimulus.

We have, however, had three years of tax increases, and it is easy to under-estimate the novel and tonic effect on the public of not being hit over the head with another round of tax increases. Unemployment continues to fall, and wage increases are in the pipeline. There are also some building society flotation windfalls that will add to consumer purchasing power.

It seems to me that the chief impediment to consumers actually spending more remains a lack of confidence in the future, and I do not believe that that will be alleviated by tax cuts this year. It will certainly not be by tax cuts trumpeted loudly as a spectacular break with the past three years. With the overshoot in public borrowing last year, this year and next year, I fear that any tax cut, large enough for the Chancellor to boast about it, would rightly undermine confidence in the City and abroad in his consistency and good housekeeping, and would leave taxpayers thoroughly unimpressed to boot.

The latter would no doubt willingly put the money in their pockets; they might even spend some of it, but they would certainly assume that it was a tacit admission that the Government had got it wrong again when they raised taxes last year. They would note that the election was getting closer, and they would ask whether it would not have been easier all round not to have hiked up taxes last year just to lower them this year. They would conclude simply that the Government did not know their own mind.

I believe that that conclusion would be confirmed when interest rates had to go up, as they surely would. Higher interest rates would not be good for investment, and the historically low rate of investment is probably our most persistent economic problem and the greatest threat to economic growth in the longer term.

Higher interest rates would not be good for consumer confidence, which has to be fortified if recovery is to continue. Keeping interest rates as low as possible is the one major piece of assistance that the Chancellor can give home owners who are caught in negative equity and first-time buyers who are keen to take advantage of comparatively low house prices. Avoiding higher interest rates is far more use to them than any of the expensive, ineffectual schemes that are being pressed upon the Treasury. Ill-timed and unjustified tax reductions will do them no service.

The Chancellor is an entertaining and interesting man, but I hope, that when he presents his Budget in November, he will have the courage to be boring. I also hope that his colleagues in government have the nerve and wisdom to support him in that. If he presents a Budget that is consistent with what he said last year and the year before and that is quite clearly not constructed with the next general election in mind, he will do much to sustain the healthy, export-led, low-inflation growth of the economy that we have managed to secure since we were liberated from the ERM. He will also have begun to restore in the public mind the Government's tattered reputation for good economic management, which they will need to recover if they are to win their next election.

6.4 pm

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): The last time that the Chancellor debated economic matters before the House was 13 December 1994. It is quite disgraceful that we have just two economic debates a year. [Interruption.] It is no use the Chancellor protesting that it is up to the Opposition. We used to have debates on the Budget and the Queen's Speech, the expenditure debate, the Finance Bill debate and the regulator, as well as the summer forecast. All those debates were in Government time, and it is a scandal that we no longer have them.

Not only can we not question the Chancellor and find out his thinking, but we do not have the benefit of understanding what hon. Members have in mind and their views on economic matters. Many newer Members of Parliament have never made a proper economic speech. It is a major scandal, and it has to be put right by next year.

I start with our obsession with the one-club approach. I am sorry that the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath) is not here. He used to advocate the need for having rather more weapons at our disposal than the one club that is now a standard feature of economic policy. In the 1960s, we had the one club of the exchange rate. In the 1970s, we had the one club of sterling M3. Now we have the one club of interest rates. It is peculiar that so many of the cleverest people in the Government and the City have tunnel vision, and seem able to concentrate only on one variable at any one time.

In practice, the Chancellor has to balance many claims. Growth, unemployment, the balance of payments, inflation and investment are all important factors. The Bank of England can afford the simplicity of concentrating on one variable, whereas politicians cannot. If the Governor of the Bank of England is proved wrong, he can always say that the position is not yet known. He can say that the jury is out, and that next month will prove him right, or that we will have to wait a few months or even until next year. The jury can stay out until the patient dies, but any Chancellor of the Exchequer has to make a proper decision.

The prime consideration of economic policy cannot be just inflation, inflation, inflation; the prime consideration of any Chancellor of the Exchequer must be growth and the long-term improvement in living standards. Everything else involves the means of bringing that about. Any Chancellor is right in asserting his vision of the requirements of economic policy. In any standoff with the Bank of England, he needs to assert the concern for the accountability of Government, in which we all have an interest.

It is a pity that the Chancellor's meetings with the Bank of England are not copied in meetings with industry. Why does he give such priority to the Bank of England and the view of bankers, without being able to compensate for that view with those of the people who are actually producing the goods and the real wealth of our economy?

Our prime economic task is to rebuild our industrial capital and our manufacturing industry, so much of which was shamefully destroyed in the first dogma-driven years of the Thatcher Administration. The most important means to long-term growth are investment in manufacturing, education and training, which has been put out repeatedly by my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown).

There are differing time lags involved. Investment in plant and machinery is necessary to improve the efficiency and capacity of our industry. That can be encouraged within the lifetime of a Parliament. Training can be achieved on a similar time scale if the will is there. Education, however, is for the longer term.

The need for training and vocational education has been urgent for a long time. We have been down that road repeatedly from the last century, when the skills gap was discerned, to the third tier of the Education Act 1944 and the technical schools that were devised by Rab Butler, to more recent developments. Our weakness is well documented. The education establishment does not like it, and by a long process of inactivity it has repeatedly hijacked proposals to produce technical and engineering skills that other countries regard as normal. So long as we were wealthy, we were able to tolerate that bias against industry. We cannot under-estimate it now.

I note the merger of the Department for Education and the Department of Employment. I very much regret the Government's declining interest in unemployment. We have to do something about that. Meanwhile, in other areas, there is now an opportunity to bring about a coalescence of education and training, where 150 years of effort have produced one of the greatest failures of Government over that long period.

There needs to be a seamless transition from academic to vocational education to training. Vocational training does not mean the nonsense thought up by those who are trying to recreate in technical education the academic theories, which have only a limited role to play.

I am surprised at the decision to have two permanent secretaries as the joint heads of the new Department. Sir Tim Lankester at the Department for Education and Michael Bichard at the Department of Employment are two civil servants who have much impressed the Public Accounts Committee, but we need to take seriously the concern of Sir Geoffrey Holland, a recently retired, most distinguished, public servant who calls for the new Department to be properly integrated.

That is a task that must be undertaken. A Department with two heads will not produce the integration between education and training for which we have waited too long. Having taken the decision, it is essential to get it right.

The involvement of Government in industry has similarly been disappointing. From the Department of Economic Affairs under George Brown to the efforts of Denis Healey, we have been faced with failure after failure. Faced with those failures to understand industry rather than the City, Denis Healey appointed within the Treasury Alan Lord, a very able second permanent secretary. He had it in mind to give greater prominence to industrial matters.

Alan Lord left the Treasury somewhat saddened. The ethos of the Treasury was against such involvement. The control of public expenditure is the one area of expertise where the Treasury is, understandably, dominant. Other considerations fall well behind that.

We must have a stronger involvement with industry. The City of London is valuable, but it does not properly represent industry, on which we all ultimately depend. The high profile that is given to discussion with the Governor is not mirrored by discussions with industry, which should have even greater prominence. We cannot solve these matters just by dealing with the Governor on a monthly basis. There are much wider issues than that.

We need to recall what the Labour Government did about investment incentives. I had been a strong supporter of investment grants for plant and machinery, which were introduced later in 1966. I believe that they were a major encouragement to investment. The time may have passed when such measures could be reintroduced, but I am a firm believer in a high level of investment allowances.

At 25 per cent., investment allowances are, in many cases, a disincentive. Plant and machinery is rarely worth 75 per cent. at the end of the first year. As far as the loss to the Revenue is concerned, it is a question only of delayed payment of corporation tax. If we are serious about investment, about replacing the capital stock in our industry, about capacity constraints, clearly some sensible investment incentives need to be introduced.

I look forward to resource accounting, which I strongly support. The PAC has examined progress, and work is proceeding on the expectation that, at the end of the century, it will be in place. Our declining infrastructure is concealed by the failure to take note of the capital depreciation in our national accounts.

It is possible to ignore the deterioration of our roads, our housing stock and part of the railway network by ignoring the depreciation of these fundamental parts of the economy. For the past 50 years and more, we have been living off so much of our capital. These decisions should have been recorded and quantified, and open to everybody to criticise.

On economic and monetary union, I note the vital precondition of convergence of real economic performance of the entire European Community. My own view is that a satisfactory convergence between such disparate countries is unlikely to happen. Countries do have differing customs and different traditions. Attitudes do vary.

I have known politicians who have pointed to the way in which those attitudes should be changed. If someone asked me how I can change attitudes, I would hold up my hands. If one said that billions of pounds are required, then there are certain conditions that might be acceptable. Changing attitudes will be more difficult.

If the Chancellor of the Exchequer really wants to make an impact on the future of our economy, he must turn to investment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order.

6.15 pm

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): I am pleased to follow the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), who, if I may say so, made a much better speech than his colleague on the Front Bench.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) referred to the underlying weakness of the economy, but there was a certain underlying weakness in his speech, too—notably his absolute failure to pronounce on anything to do with the economy and what he would do about it in respect of interest rates, spending or anything else.

Ms Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West): The right hon. Gentleman was not listening.

Sir Peter Hordern: I did listen, and I was greatly entertained by the amusing parts of the hon. Gentleman's speech. Now perhaps the hon. Lady might listen.

I wish to say a word or two about investment, since it plays such a large part in the Opposition's terminology. What the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne said about the importance of training and education is, of course, absolutely right, but, in parentheses, it is astonishing that, in the United States, where there is no federal system of training, more money is spent on training by individual companies than any of the Organisation for Economic Development countries, so far as I am aware, and without any form of Government investment or attraction.

There is one important question to which the Opposition will have to address themselves, and I believe that it underlines the weakness of successive Labour administrations over many years: the double meaning that is given to the word "investment". There is, of course, investment in the sense of a rapid return, but there is also long-term investment, to which the right hon. Gentleman was referring, in education and training. The difficulty lies in the fact that that investment must be paid for.

The Opposition believe in public investment. They are talking here not about private sector investment, but about education and training and public sector involvement in it. The difficulty they have to face—just as they always have to—is that the money has to be raised, either through taxation, and they are reluctant to say how that money should be raised, or through borrowing. The further difficulty they have is that they are notorious borrowers.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor referred to the previous Labour Government's record on borrowing. I think that I am right in saying that, in 1976, the share of gross domestic product occupied by the public sector borrowing requirement was 9.5 per cent. It has never been higher under a Conservative Government than it was three years ago, when it was 7 per cent., and that, I have to say, was far too high. It was, however, the 9.5 per cent. that brought in the International Monetary Fund.

Whatever the Opposition say about the merits of training and education, they have to say how it will be paid for. It is no use thinking that the markets, people in this country or electors will be satisfied with the general appreciation of the word "investment". They will want to know, rightly, how it will be paid for.

We shall go on asking how that money is to be raised. I believe that the Opposition have a duty to say how it will be raised. It is no use their talking about the merits of investment, as though there has been no public investment in training in this country: the record on higher education is excellent, with more young people going into it. They must now come clean on how they propose to pay for the investment, which no doubt is worthy.

There is one thing of which I am quite certain: the position today is very different, so far as the capital markets are concerned, than it was when the Labour party was last in office. Everybody in the House knows the speed at which money goes across the exchanges. There is no question about it: if the Labour party was ever in government and pursued a large investment programme without spelling out how it was going to be paid for, there would be a run on the pound, as has always happened.

Mr. Benn indicated assent.

Sir Peter Hordern: The right hon. Gentleman nods in agreement. There would be a run on the pound, and it would have to be met by higher interest rates. That is the problem that the Opposition face.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Peter Hordern: The hon. Gentleman will have to forgive me, because I want to complete my brief speech.

All I would say is that there is another aspect to investment, and that is the aspect that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor and the Government are pursuing—attracting foreign investment into this country. They are able to do so because we have low tax rates. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne referred to investment incentives, but I recollect a corporation tax of 52 per cent. under a Labour Government. It is very much lower now. That is what brings in investment: not only particular incentives but the fact that we are a low-tax country, with no difficulties about labour costs.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East, in perhaps an unguarded moment, said of training that he would make companies pay by means of a statutory training scheme. If one adds to that the cost of the social contract, the training levy and the minimum wage, will Britain be such an attractive country to invest in for overseas countries? I have to say that I do not think that it will be.

That again will reverse an important factor in the success of the economy to which my right hon. and learned Friend rightly alluded—the attraction of substantial funds from abroad. We shall obtain improvements by attracting investment and the further progress of the technological revolution which has occurred in the United States and many other countries, not least Britain.

The Opposition talk about large public sector investment. One has only to consider the motor industry and its export record now to see what a transformation has come about because of the attraction of investment into Britain. That is the right way to go about the matter. Any suggestion that there will be massive public sector spending for any reason, no matter how worthy, will cause great difficulties in the capital markets. If the Opposition were ever to win an election and come into government, they would shortly find that difficulty spelled out for them.

I simply add that it is essential to have a low public sector borrowing requirement. That is what dictates low interest rates. It is interesting how some people say that the great thing is to have the sovereign right to manage one's own currency. Yes, I regard it as a sovereign right to devalue. They say that that is what helps manufacturing industry. If that were so, we would be the richest country in the world, because we have tried if often enough.

Look at the Germans. When I first entered the House, there were DM12 to the pound. Now there are two point something or other. What is the basis of German wealth if it is not manufacturing industry? Why have the engineering companies not suffered from the depreciating deutschmark? They have managed because of the quality of their investment, and that quality is there because of low long-term interest rates. They can borrow easily for 10 or 20 years ahead. Contrast that with Britain's oscillating interest rates and the difficulty of ever making any long-term investment.

I remain an optimist. I am sure that, if my right hon. and learned Friend pursues his policies, we shall have the benefit of extra capital investment in Britain and the fruits of that investment which we so thoroughly deserve.

6.23 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I am a little disappointed that the Liberal Democrats, who are allowed only one contribution to this major debate on the economy, should be confined to just 10 minutes, especially as, unlike Her Majesty's official Opposition, we have a distinctive economic policy.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is aware that the Liberal Democrats are not limited to 10 minutes.

Mr. Bruce: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I had not been advised of that fact. I should have appreciated it if I had been so advised. Nevertheless, I shall not detain the House unduly.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has an opportunity to decide whether he will be a consistent, coherent, disciplined Chancellor who sets out a policy and follows it through, or whether, as seems to be becoming apparent, he has to trim it according to the pressures of political expediency and the requirements of his party to have something to offer the electorate in times of desperation. That is how he will be judged, not just by his colleagues but by outside commentators over time.

The salient point of this year's summer forecast is that every economic indicator projected from last November has turned out to be less favourable. Inflation and public borrowing have been revised up, growth has been revised down and the investment growth estimate has had to be more than halved. In just six months, the Government's forecasts have moved in the wrong direction.

I share with the Chancellor a genuine welcome for the better economic news that we have had in the past 18 months. I agree that low inflation is necessary and needs to be sustained in the long term if it is to create the long-term investment climate that Britain needs. The upturn or recovery in the economy is welcome, as is the rise in exports and the decline in unemployment, despite the fact that it is from a high base and that there is a question mark about the quality of the jobs being created compared with those that have been lost.

Mr. Forman: The hon. Gentleman has just said that he welcomes the Government's determined approach to controlling inflation and keeping it low. If that is so, how does he defend the important phrase in the Liberal Democrat amendment, which has not been selected? That amendment

"deplores the recent moves by the Government to relax its fiscal and monetary disciplines".

That can only be taken as a plea for a tightening of policy.

Mr. Bruce: As a matter of fact, the hon. Gentleman is correct. We have criticised the Chancellor, as he is aware, for having two inflation targets rather than one inflation band and for creating confusion by insisting on the one hand that his policy is to keep inflation below 2.5 per cent. while on the other hand implying that it might rise above 4 per cent. The Liberal Democrats' policy is to have one inflation target of between 0 and 3 per cent., agreeing with the Chancellor that variation must be accommodated, but suggesting a simple and clear target without the element of confusion which creeps in when there are two targets.

There is common ground here. There is recognition of the need to be disciplined and to stick to the broad policy. My question, as I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will appreciate, is whether the Chancellor will have the courage of his convictions as political expediency beckons.

It is also interesting—the circumstances of the Chancellor's elevation to his present post will not be lost on him—that the success over which he has presided has been a direct result of the failure of the Government's previous policies. The boost to our exports, to which reference has just been made, has come as a result of the devaluation of sterling following our ejection from the exchange rate mechanism. There has also been a suppression of domestic demand and a need for record tax rises. That has kept growth under control and helped to keep the Chancellor's inflationary objectives under control.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): The hon. Gentleman spoke of tax rises—I do not find any answer to this point in the Liberal Democrats' amendment—but does he stand by the remarks that he made only on 3 July in a speech, I believe, to Liberal Democrats in the City, when he spoke approvingly of a 50 per cent. higher income tax rate?

Mr. Bruce: As is our party's policy, I made it clear in that speech that, in the interests of fairness and justice, we believe that people earning more than £100,000 a year should pay a 50 per cent. tax rate. I also said that the yield on that money should be used immediately to take 500,000 people at the opposite end of the scale out of the tax bracket. I know that Conservative central office will conveniently edit that reply to include the first half but not the second half, because, objectively, fairness, justice and balance are not a distinguishing feature of the scriptwriters at Conservative central office. However, the answer is on the record.

We cannot claim that what has happened in the past few years, or the recovery that we are seeing, is the economic miracle that some members of the Government seem to wish to adduce from it. Last year's improvement in the balance of trade was based mostly on a one-off surge in oil exports and net property income from abroad. Manufacturing investment is up—a little—but it has only just passed the peak of five years ago, and the figure is not much higher than it was 21 years ago when Denis Healey was Chancellor of the Exchequer. Manufacturing investment as a percentage of gross domestic product is currently at an all-time low.

There is no room for talk of an economic miracle. There is a basis for improvement on which success can be built, if the current position can be sustained, but we have not reached that stage yet. Even after an active life in politics, I am still astonished that we can now find politically acceptable unemployment levels twice as high as the rates that would have brought down Governments 15 or 20 years ago.

We are currently enjoying a temporarily benign set of economic circumstances, brought about by the failure of the Government's own policies. The Chancellor has recognised that fact and has told the Treasury Select Committee and others that according to his advisers the sustainable growth rate of the British economy is only about 2 to 2.5 per cent. After 16 years of economic experimentation, 16 years of putting British industry through the mangle, the Conservative Government cannot hold out the hope of sustainable growth at a rate of more than 2.5 per cent.—exactly the rate which obtained before they came to power.

Those of us who have dealt with other economies know that in some of the developing economies—which are no longer backward or primitive, but quite mature—there is talk of a recession when the growth rate falls to 8 or 10 per cent. Slow recovery from a long recession is not an economic miracle. To deliver long-term success, we need sustained investment—and the only way to deliver that is to ensure that we invest in education and yield the goods to ensure that we can maintain the health and public services that people want. Any economic commentator would say that that was necessary, but no British Government—Labour or Conservative—have managed to achieve it.

One aspect of the Chancellor's policy is right. My disagreement with him lies in the fact that he seems to think that only a low inflation rate is required to deliver economic success. He is entirely right to accept that long-term, sustainable low inflation is a precondition of success, but he is wrong to assume that it is the only precondition. The problem is this: is the Chancellor sticking to that objective, which is the only basis for his entire policy? Will he be prudent and resist unjustifiable tax cuts? Then will he listen to the advice of the Governor of the Bank of England, who clearly feels that interest rates need to rise now if the Chancellor's inflation target is to be met?

The Chancellor is currently relying on the short-term view that the markets appear to have taken it calmly, but he knows that today's decisions will affect the inflation rate in 18 months' or two years' time. Short-term factors are irrelevant.

The Chancellor has changed his inflation target. At any rate, whatever his arguments to the contrary, most commentators believe that he has relaxed that target. He is becoming a little more difficult to pin down on his borrowing targets than he was even a year ago. I will remind him of one or two of his statements. In his 1994 Budget, he said:

"My objective remains the same: to balance the Budget over the medium term. We remain on course to eliminate Government borrowing entirely by the end of the decade."—[Official Report, 29 November 1994; Vol. 250, c. 1082.]

At the same time, he stated in the Red Book:

"The objective is to bring the PSBR back to balance over the medium term."

What does the Chancellor say now? I could not find it in the main report, but in the Treasury summary the following words are now used:

"the objective is to bring the public sector borrowing requirement back towards balance over the medium term."

"To" and "towards" are rather different words, as the Chancellor well understands and, no doubt, as the Treasury draftsmen understand. That is a clear indication of a much less rigorous and disciplined approach to borrowing control than the Chancellor's public utterances would suggest.

The PSBR, however, is a fairly crude measure. The general Government financial deficit is, for instance, the measure for convergence for the purposes of economic and monetary union—the benchmark for the 3 per cent. ceiling—because it excludes privatisation receipts. What is the Government's estimate of that? It is fully £21.4 billion for 1996-97, and that is just the Government's current forecast—they have already had to revise their forecasts in the wrong direction over the past six months.

That estimate has been made at what many regard as the peak of the economic cycle, when the Government's estimate of their net investment is £11.3 billion. That means—according to the logic that the Chancellor has expounded during his term of office, and against a discipline that is gaining wider acceptance across the parties—that the Government will be at least £10 billion away from being able to make any responsible tax cuts while maintaining their stance of fiscal prudence and responsibility.

The test is whether the Chancellor has the nerve to do the job of economic policy management, or whether he will succumb to the pressures of political expediency. So far, the Chancellor has ignored the Bank of England's advice that interest rates need to rise. At the Mansion house, he moved the goal posts on inflation; he has left the position more unclear and uncertain than it was before. I speak as one who has admired the stance taken by the Chancellor when his own party has tried to push him off course, as it so often has. As I said in response to an earlier intervention, we suggested a range of 0 per cent. to 3 per cent. No doubt the Labour party will take a view at some point, but thus far it seems reluctant to express one.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Gentleman anticipates me. Would he care to state, on behalf of his party, whether he thinks that we should raise interest rates now, or whether we should have done so a month ago?

Mr. Bruce: I think that the Chancellor will understand my reply. We believe that the Government should set the targets, but that the Bank of England—or the central bank—should implement them. The answer is simple: if the Government believe, or the Bank of England believes, that the inflation target that the Government say should be adhered to requires an increase in interest rates, the Bank should make the decision. We in the House do not know who is right, and we shall not know for 18 months. I do not think that the Chancellor should be smug in the short term. Our position is clear: the Bank should have been allowed to make the decisions that it considered necessary to implement policies set out by Government.

Mr. Budgen: Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that it must always be the Chancellor's duty to decide how quickly the inflation target should be met? He must take into account wider social and economic considerations than the Bank can ever take into account.

Mr. Bruce: That is an argument in favour of political intervention, but too often Chancellors cannot be relied on to take such objective measures, and their decisions have been made for short-term political reasons which cut across the economic requirements of the time. I believe that the fact that the German economy has built itself on the basis of an operationally independent central bank is one reason for the success of Germany's economic policy.

It must be understood that we are not talking about the Bank of England setting policies. The Government set policies and the Bank implements them. The decisions, however, are removed from the political arena. It has been argued that such action would lead to a lower overall level of interest rates, because it would remove the factor of political uncertainty, leading to a cut of between 1, and 2 per cent. on the prevailing rate of interest.

An item that I have raised in the past week has not been addressed by the Government, or even picked up by the commentators: the moves, following the merger of a number of building societies, to offer substantial bonuses to their members, which will feed into the economy over the next 12 to 18 months. According to the press reports that I have read, they could amount to between £5 billion and £8 billion. The Chancellor—and, indeed, the financial authorities—must keep a close eye on that.

It seems extraordinary that we can debate whether tax cuts of £5 billion are justified in terms of keeping economic policy on course, when building societies over which the Government have no control can suddenly inject between £5 billion and £8 billion into the economy, completely altering the Government's inflation forecast. I do not know what the answer is, but the Government should give some indication of how they intend to respond to that issue.

We need a responsible fiscal policy, not just short-term tax cuts, which, as people know from bitter experience after the last election, would have to be reversed immediately after an election. We need a sensible target for inflation and a reformed central bank given operational independence to enable it to pursue those targets free from short-term political interference.

We need a European policy crafted in the country's and not the Tory party's interests, and we need a macro-economy which recognises the importance of investment to create a climate which can sustain public services, at a reasonable taxation level and at a reasonable share of gross domestic product.

The Liberal Democrats have made it clear that education is the single most important investment that this country needs for the long-term success of our economy. Unlike other parties, we have said not only that we will spend more on education, but where we will get the money from. The Labour party has tabled an amendment which continues to say nothing about how it intends to deliver anything. It contains blandishments, statements of good intent and a rosy glow of change, but no substance.

It is necessary to have credibility in economic debate, to be prepared to put some facts on one's proposals, to put some costings to one's commitments and to give some indication as to how one would create the mechanism which would deliver the results that one regards as desirable. The Liberal Democrats have done and are doing that. We shall continue to challenge both the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to whether he has the resolve to stick to his commitments, and the Labour party to demonstrate whether it can put forward a coherent programme that will not finish up putting it in exactly the same position as the Government, who are split from top to bottom.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): I will say this for the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce): unlike the official Opposition, he has just a smidgen of policy but, alas, I fear that it will be purely hypothetical and academic in the extreme.

The prime economic task of any Government must be to control inflation without wrecking the industrial base. We have heard a great deal about investment, especially from my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The trouble is that the international market believes that in this country, under our political system and in the way in which we conduct ourselves, the will to control inflation is weak. That is why there is what is called short-termism compared with Germany and Japan.

Investors, usually international ones, suspect that political parties, and particularly Labour, will take a short-term political view, so those investors take a short-term financial view: it is as simple as that. The trouble is that with Labour in power the result would be not short-termism but minuscule-termism. It is to the Government's credit that they have maintained low inflation better than their predecessors.

An encouraging and seldom noticed trend among banks is the tendency to move to fixed-term lending rather than the overdraft system. In that sense, an encouraging sign exists that we are moving more towards the European or German system. That will give us more long-term investment, which industry requires.

The battle against inflation, however, is a continuing one. It is affected by matters entirely outside local control, such as commodity prices. Handling inflation in a modern economy is like sailing a giant tanker: it goes on for about five miles after being put into reverse, by which time the other hazards of recession have swamped the decks. Cool pragmatic judgment rather than obsessional dogma is therefore needed.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer is right to resist perhaps the more orthodox Bank of England view on interest rates. I hope that he will continue to take that pragmatic view as what industry and the economy want more than anything else is some degree of stability. I am glad that he has given stability on the interest rate front so that people can plan for the future.

The other thing that we need is export-led growth. As I have said before, after the 1967 devaluation by the Labour party, on becoming Chancellor of the Exchequer Lord Jenkins of Hillhead—now a member of the party of the hon. Member for Gordon—said, "We must have export-led growth. That is the solution." Unfortunately, he never achieved it, but he was right and my right hon. and learned Friend the present Chancellor has achieved it.

When considering future interest rate policy, I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will bear in mind two vital sectors: the housing market and construction industry, and the small firms sector. In the 1980s, reliance exclusively on interest rates to curb inflation was catastrophic for both home owners and small firms. I agree with the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), who is Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, about that. That reliance was the cause of the anxiety, the lack of confidence and the absence of the feel-good factor that everyone is seeking.

Added to that, there was the fear of unemployment and the uncertainty about future employment, which happily is now easing. When considering his Budget, however, I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor will have special regard for that especially unfortunate and burdened sector. In addition, I hope that the wise proposals in the Latham report on the construction industry will be attractive to the Government.

The future does not lie with vast companies or supermarket fat cats. A healthy and flourishing small firms sector is the vital undergrowth for survival in the economic jungle. Bit by bit, much has been done to help small firms, but there is an awful lot more to be done.

I want lower taxation. Decades ago, I advocated a shift from direct to indirect taxation because one is a tax on work and the other is a tax on spending. I am glad that that trend has taken place, but taxes can be reduced only if public expenditure is curbed. The only way in which public expenditure can be substantially curbed is by reducing unemployment. I am delighted at the way in which that is going. Otherwise, as my right hon. and learned Friend says, the solution is a hike in interest rates, which is the last thing that industry, and especially small industry, wants.

We are a parliamentary democracy and we and the public are entitled to know what is the policy of Her Majesty's official loyal Opposition. We shall ask them that again and again and again. What is their policy? As the hon. Member for Gordon said, their amendment is clearly a mass of platitudes. Would they increase or reduce taxation and, if so, by how much and which taxes? Would they increase public expenditure, as their spokesmen nearly always imply, or reduce it? Would they raise or lower interest rates? Or do they really believe, as I do, that the Chancellor has got it about right?

I used to be fond of the previous Leader of the Opposition. I thought that anyone who was keen on rugger could not be all that bad, but I am not sure about the present one. At least one knows where the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) stands, even if one disagrees with him. We are not allowed to refer to an amendment which has not been selected, and its non-selection must be a great relief to the official Opposition as it contains two fairly dirty and obscene words which may send a shudder down their spine. It refers to "socialist policies". The terror that that must have struck in the Opposition's hearts is awful to consider.

[Sir Anthony Grant]

I will say this about the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), the Leader of the Opposition: he has a nice smile—but I question what lies behind it and what policies, if any, lie behind it. He reminds me very much of the Cheshire cat in "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland". Poor little Alice was rather like the electorate. Lewis Carroll wrote:

"she was a little startled by seeing the Cheshire Cat sitting on a bough of a tree.

The Cat only grinned when it saw Alice. It looked good-natured, she thought: still it had very long claws and a great many teeth,"— that is the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and his friends—

"so she felt that it ought to be treated with respect.

'Cheshire Puss,' she began . . . 'Would you tell me, please, which way I ought to go from here?'

'That depends a good deal on where you want to get to,' said the Cat.

'I don't much care where—' said Alice.

'Then it doesn't matter which way you go,' said the Cat.

'—so long as I get somewhere,' Alice added.

'Oh, you're sure to do that,' said the Cat, 'if you only walk long enough.'

Alice said 'I wish you wouldn't keep appearing and vanishing so suddenly: you make one quite giddy.'

'All right,' said the Cat; and this time it vanished quite slowly, beginning with the end of the tail, and ending with the grin, which remained some time after the rest of it had gone.

'Well! I've often seen a cat without a grin,' thought Alice; 'but a grin without a cat! It's the most curious thing I ever saw in all my life!'"

In 30 years in Parliament, I have sometimes seen a policy without a grin, but a grin without a policy is the most curious thing that I have ever seen. To end with the immortal words of Private Eye, which I hope will get a response from the Opposition, "I think we should be told."

6.49 pm

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): I and some of my hon. Friends have tabled an amendment which, in a way, acquits the Chancellor of the main responsibility for what has happened because it says that the problems confronting this country are inherent in a system that puts profit above people. If I distributed the Chancellor's speech to my constituents, they would not believe that he lives in the same world as they do.

There is mass unemployment in Chesterfield because the pits were deliberately closed. Unemployed people come to my surgery and say, "What about a job?" Other hon. Members must have the same experience every week. People say, "My daughter is getting married. What about a house?" Another constituent will say, "My son wants to go to college. What about a grant?" I am told, "My auntie cannot get a hip operation. Granddad cannot live on the pension."

Anyone who thinks that the Chancellor's speech, in which he scored debating points about quotations—an absolute waste of time—will carry any weight, is making a grave mistake. Conservatives boast that the number of days lost in industrial disputes has dropped, but 2.5 million days are lost every day because of unemployment. Unemployment is the policy. It lowers wages, undermines the unions and boosts profits. Homelessness does the same. Someone who sees a person in a cardboard box on the embankment will say to himself, "If I had a row with my employer and cannot keep my job and am dispossessed of my house, I will be in a cardboard box on the embankment." The Government have not an economic policy but a political strategy to put a handful of rich people at the top and the rest in fear.

Has anyone ever asked how many home owners have mortgages? There are a great many home buyers, but not a great number of home owners who have paid off their mortgages. Another term in use nowadays is "customers" and those who have no money are not "customers". They have found a word that dehumanises and depersonalises the poor so that they do not have to think about them. People in cardboard boxes are not on the electoral register. How can anyone say, "Put me down on the register as being in the cardboard box behind Marks and Spencer"? Those people do not vote, and that is part of the political strategy.

The Government should not think that anxiety has not spread up to the middle classes because many professional people are on short-term contracts and many people are on low pay. If the Chancellor ever has a discussion about why there has been a shift in political opinion in this country, he will find that it is because the anxiety of the capitalist society has spread to layers of people who thought themselves exempt. Of course the policy is based on fear.

We hear much about how marvellous is the German economy, but there are 20 million unemployed in the European Union. Does not anybody relate that to what happened before the war? I am old enough to remember Hitler coming to power. I bought "Mein Kampf" when I was 12 years old and I still have my copy. The 6 million unemployed in Germany produced Hitler, and when there is unemployment, people turn on each other. Sir Paul Condon, the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, has issued one of the most disgraceful statements that has ever been made. He is building up the feeling that, if there is a crime problem, it is due to blacks. When people are unemployed, they turn on others.

The breakdown of the social fabric is much more important than the feel-good factor. I do not know who feels good or why, but if we break down the social fabric and turn people one against the other, we will pay a much higher political price than we would in dealing with the problem that is before the House or the aspirations in my amendment. The second world war was the cost of monetary policies, which are the same as those that are now being pursued. It cost us 50 million lives and God knows how many billions of dollars.

The right hon. Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) says that, if Labour gets in, there will be a run on the pound. What he told us is what the left has been saying for years—that this House does not decide anything. Decisions are made by international gamblers. Every night, I listen to the world economic news on the BBC and there is mention of the Dow Jones industrial average. I have never met Mr. Dow Jones, but by God I have to give him credit for keeping at it. Night after night, when we are all in bed, he is working on his bloody averages, and they decide what happens.

Sometimes, we are told that sterling has dropped three points of decimals against a basket of European currencies. I have never had such a basket of currencies, but I would not mind taking one on holiday. As a result, the Health Secretary closes three hospitals and the pound rises again because all policies are now determined by international capital demands. That is why my amendment is a little more fundamental. I should like to make fun of the Chancellor's earlier speeches but that would be difficult because I confess that I have not read them. Let us try to face the reality, which is that Parliaments and Governments do not control anything any more.

There was an article in the Financial Times recently by the BBC's economic correspondent in the World Service saying:

"In Africa it would be better if the countries were run as commercial enterprises rather than Governments."

Later, in order to answer a question that might be asked, he said:

"What room does that leave for democracy? That question can be asked everywhere in a world where bond markets dominate much of the decision-making process in the world. Democracy is in a sense on the way out."

Without trying to provoke individual responses, I am trying to say that we must face the fact that the globalisation of world markets has destroyed the value of the ballot box as a link to political and economic power. That will happen to an incoming Labour Government, although I will not go into that. Everybody knows that that will happen. It happened to Healey in 1976. He has now decently written a book saying that he made a mistake about the IMF, but that does not matter.

Wherever we look, the triumph of capitalism is being celebrated, but if it is so triumphant, perhaps we should look at some of the figures. One fifth of the world's population of 5.6 billion live in extreme poverty. The richest fifth in the world have incomes that are 30 times higher than those of the poorest people. Poverty-related diseases claim the lives of 35,000 children every day, and 500,000 women die each year from causes related to pregnancy and inadequate health care. Some 1.3 billion people have no clean water. That is the result of the capitalism that has triumphed. Communism has gone and the capitalist world is not stable: it is inherently unstable.

It is democracy that is being attacked, not socialist ideology. They do not want the common people without the cash to use the vote to buy collectively what they cannot afford individually. The huge achievement of the chartists and the suffragettes was to get some grip on economic policy through the ballot box.

I am not the first person to quote Harold Macmillan. I did so when I intervened on the Chancellor and perhaps I may read the quote to him again. In his book, "The Middle Way", published in 1938, Harold Macmillan said:

"We have lived so long at the mercy of uncontrolled economic forces we have become sceptical regarding any plan for human emancipation. Such a rational and deliberate reorganisation of our economic life would enable us out of the increased wealth production to establish an irreducible minimum which might progressively be raised to one of comfort and security."

The Labour manifesto of 1945 did not attack the Conservative party because in those days we did not have abuse, we had argument. That manifesto stated:

"The great inter-war slumps were not acts of God or blind forces: they were the sure and certain result of the concentration of too much economic power in the hands of too few men."

Gaitskell, one of our more moderate members, when he spoke in the House on 5 December 1945 after Churchill had moved the first motion of censure on the Labour Government, said:

"We believe . . . that the present capitalist system is inefficient, that it produces insecurity and that it is unjust. Can anyone deny those things?"—[Official Report, 5 December 1945; Vol. 416, c. 2364.]

Therefore, no one should think that my amendment, which, alas, has not been called but which may be studied, contains new ideas. They are rooted in human aspiration and no one can tell me that they cannot be implemented. If there can be full employment in wartime, it can be had in peacetime. If every youngster of 17 could be put in uniform to kill Germans, surely young people could be recruited to build homes or to become nurses or teachers or to clean up the environment or look after old people. Of course that could be done, but it is not profitable, and that is why it is not done.

Until this society—in that I include my Front-Bench colleagues—addresses the question of whether to put profitability above people or people above profitability, these problems will not be resolved. Do not think that the Chancellor, with his triumphalism, is convincing anyone. More and more people are learning what is happening. If they cannot express themselves through the ballot box, do not be surprised if we have the riots. That is not the right way to do it, but a disfranchised nation will not accept the injustice forced on it by a policy of the kind that we have had.

Sir Thomas Arnold (Hazel Grove): The current monetary framework has been in place for three years. The inflation rate during that time bears healthy testimony to the wisdom of the policy that the Government have chosen to follow. I support what my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor said in announcing the new inflation target one month ago. He said in answer to a written question:

"Beyond this Parliament I propose that our aim will be to continue to achieve underlying inflation—measured by the RPI excluding mortgage interest payments—of 2½ per cent. or less. Monetary policy will be set consistently to achieve this target. This should ensure that inflation will remain in the range 1 to 4 per cent."—[Official Report, 14 June 1995; Vol. 261, c. 517.]

That statement showed confidence in the future and confidence in the present policy.

It is absolute nonsense to suggest that the goalposts have been moved or that policy has become more discretionary or relaxed. On the contrary, the Government have repeated what policy has been for some time now. That has done wonders for confidence. It shows exactly what the Government intend to do in respect of monetary policy.

The monetary framework that the Government put in place three years ago consists of three components: the inflation target, to which I have referred, the inflation report published by the Bank of England and the published minutes of the monthly monetary meeting. I should like to deal with the two latter items in turn.

The great advantage of the inflation report is the transparency that it confers on the decision making within the Bank of England. It shows carefully and clearly the intellectual influences at work. It makes absolutely no attempt to hide any of the forces which are taken into consideration. I was particularly impressed in that regard by the evidence given to the Treasury Select Committee recently by Mr. Mervyn King, the chief economist at the Bank of England. He described in some detail what was taking place in the labour market. The facts and figures are there for all to see in the inflation report.

Mr. King referred to what he called the tale of two cities. Most of us can see what he meant when we consider what is taking place in our constituencies. The sectors directed towards the export or net trade sector are growing rapidly. In those sectors, one can see evidence of capacity constraints. The sectors directed primarily towards domestic retail spending are weak. In housing and construction they are extremely weak. There is no sign of any capacity constraints.

So we are seeing a recovery the pattern of which is very different from anything that we have seen for a long time. Net trade, although volatile, is the main driving force behind the recover. My view is that there is still plenty of capacity in the economy and that we should take account of that fact in deciding whether to raise interest rates. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor has been right to take a robust stand on interest rates and to make a fine judgment which so far has won the backing of the markets. That brings me to the published minutes of the monthly monetary meeting.

The meeting represents a considerable step forward, once again, in the transparency with which economic policy is now made. I hope that the Labour party sees fit to applaud the publication of the minutes, which means that, for the first time ever, it is perfectly obvious to everyone what specific arguments are put forward by the Governor of the Bank of England and by the Chancellor. There can be no doubt whatever how the decision not to raise interest rates at the celebrated meeting on 5 May was reached.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor made it perfectly clear that there were conflicting pressures which had to be accommodated and conflicting arguments that had to be addressed. There were clearly cost pressures arising from increased commodity prices and a weakening exchange rate. On the other side, there was clear evidence that demand pressures within the economy as a whole were not so great as to warrant an increase in interest rates. My right hon. and learned Friend took the decision not to increase interest rates. I applaud him for that decision. I applaud the transparent way in which he showed to the world his internal thought processes, how he reached his decision and why on that occasion he did not accept the advice given to him by the Bank of England.

The transparency of policy within the new monetary framework is serving both the Government and the country well. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will persist in his policy and keep his nerve.

7.4 pm

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): There is no question but that the most important problem that Britain faces today is unemployment. It is important not only because of the direct effect on families whose members are unemployed, with the effects of poverty and everything else that goes with unemployment, but because it represents a waste of resources. Even within the Government's narrow vision, unemployment should be seen as important, because it represents a cost to the Treasury.

My greatest condemnation of the speeches of Government Members this afternoon is that they paid so little attention to the importance of unemployment. All my right hon. and hon. Friends have drawn attention to unemployment and rightly argued that the immediate and urgent priority is to increase investment and training. Of course, the two go hand in hand. They are essential.

To be fair to the right hon. Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern), he referred to training. He drew attention to the fact that, in the United States of America, more was spent on training than in Britain. He said that the money was spent not by the federal Government but by private companies. He could have added that more is spent on training in many other European countries than in Britain. I suspect that much of that money is spent by private companies. However, the right hon. Gentleman did not face the logic of his statement. The fact is that, in Britain, private companies are not spending money on the essential training that we need, so it is a job that the Government must undertake.

The right hon. Member for Horsham asked how training would be paid for. The answer is that we certainly cannot pay for it if we take the earliest possible opportunity to reduce taxes. We could provide for investment, through either investment allowances, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) suggested, or some system of investment grants, which I personally prefer—we can discuss the details, but the important thing is to boost investment. We could provide training. Yet we cannot do those things at the same time as reducing taxes. We did not get from the Chancellor of the Exchequer any consideration of those points.

Instead, we had a speech which consisted mainly of a series of jokes. The biggest joke was when he described himself as a conviction politician. I wondered whether I heard him right. It seems to me that what we had this afternoon was a complacent politician. His speech had throughout it a thread of complacency about the economy. We have a reduced forecast for growth, a higher forecast for inflation and a lower forecast for investment. If he had given us a forecast for unemployment, which he refused to do, he would have given us in the medium term a higher one than was previously forecast. Yet, against that background, he described the slowdown as a change of pace. I suspect that, when the economy goes into its next recession, the right hon. and learned Gentleman, if he is still the Chancellor of the Exchequer, will say that we have simply gone into reverse gear. He does not understand the effects of the present economic policies and his forecasts.

The Chancellor says that the economy is doing well. He says that it is on course for steady recovery, which will continue in years ahead. He says that living standards will rise this year, in 1996 and in 1997—that sounds to me like a significant year—in the year after that and, the Chancellor trusts, in the years after that, too. However, if he had been more open, if he had given us some of that openness of which he boasted, he would have told us the undisclosed truth, which is that he expects the recovery to come to a stop in 1998 or 1999. It will probably be then, because the effect on employment and living standards always lags behind the rest of the economy.

Indeed, the Chancellor gave it away when he told us that the Budget will be balanced at the top of a cycle, which suggests that the economy will next go into recession. That is the problem in this country: recovery followed by recession followed by recovery followed by recession. It is the business cycle. The Government simply do not want to change that sequence.

Increasingly, people are conscious that recoveries are going to be followed by recessions. That is one of the causes of the insecurity that people feel. They do not expect recovery to last. They know that the economy is going to the top of the cycle and then, as it goes down, unemployment will go up.

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Davis: I have not got time. There should not be interventions when speeches are limited to 10 minutes.

At the end of each recovery, unemployment is left higher than it was at the end of the previous recovery. Every time that we go into recession, we start with a higher level of unemployment than we had at the start of the previous recession.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer told us that the tax take, as he calls it, was lower than forecast. He blamed that on lower inflation. The fact is that the tax take is lower than expected because unemployment is high. It is employment—people having jobs and paying income tax—that affects the tax take. The Chancellor left that out of his speech.

The Government are concerned about reducing taxes in the next 18 months. They have not even pretended this afternoon that they are using some theory of trickle-down economics. They do not suggest that tax reductions will reduce unemployment. They will reduce taxes to spread the message. The Chancellor of the Exchequer gave it away when he said that they would spread the message of rising living standards and falling unemployment between now and the general election. The issue is what will happen after the general election. We know what will happen: the economy will go into another recession.

The Government should use the money that they will use to reduce taxes for investment, training and creating jobs. That does not mean creating work. There is no need. The need for work is everywhere to be seen around us in our constituencies. It is a matter not of creating work but of employing people to undertake the work in front of our eyes: the housing shortage, the terrible provision of care in the community, social services. They are all labour-intensive. That is what we should use the money for if we are serious about reducing unemployment.

People who are employed pay taxes. The Chancellor of the Exchequer gave no forecast or target for unemployment. He told us that he had a target for income tax—20p in the pound; he told us that he had targets for capital gains tax and for inheritance tax—zero. What is the target for unemployment? A Government worth their salt who justified the confidence of the country would face the fact that it is unemployment that people care about most. The economy is not good enough. We have to a find a better economy. We have to find an economic system that will deal with the problem of unemployment. The biggest condemnation of the Government's complacency is that they do not understand the need for a new economy.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): Ever since Mr. Soros blew us out of the exchange rate mechanism, our economic situation has got better and better. In retrospect, even most members of the Government would admit that he did us a good turn. To their credit, the Government have taken full advantage of that opportunity. Despite the fact that the value of the pound has dropped by nearly 15 per cent. and that everyone forecast that that would feed through into inflation, the Government have kept inflation consistently down. We should congratulate the Government on the skill with which they have operated monetary policy and which has made that possible.

Despite the gloom of the Opposition, the economy has been growing for three years. What has been so pleasing is that it is the first export-led recovery in my lifetime. I believe that the prospects for non-inflationary sustainable growth are very good. Because of the success of our exports, the balance of payments deficit has dropped dramatically. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) talked about unemployment. That has also dropped dramatically—in the last fiscal year by no less than 372,000. That is a pretty good record. The budget deficit is also falling.

Why then is there a feeling among much of the public that things are not getting better? I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Hazel Grove (Sir T. Arnold) put his finger on the main problem. It is that we have almost got two separate economies: the successful manufacturing export industry, which is doing very well indeed, and what could be classed as the home-based industries. The housing market in many places is still drifting downwards. The construction industry is flat. Consumer spending is weaker than we expected. The leisure, hospitality and drink industries are not doing well. I speak from some experience of those industries. The figures in June were generally very poor. The retail trade has undoubtedly been affected by the enormous amounts of money being spent on the national lottery and the fact that the draw is held on a Saturday night.

In many areas, business confidence is falling. After a very buoyant last quarter in 1994, in the first quarter of this year growth slowed. I expect that, in the second quarter, as a result of the Budget, it will slow down further. Inflationary pressures are almost all imported due to high raw material prices. There has been no upward pressure on wages during this recovery. Indeed, I believe that at long last we are moving slowly into a low-inflation culture. While increased raw material prices have forced up manufacturers' costs, manufacturers have not been able to pass those costs on to wholesalers and retailers. When retailers have tried to pass them on, the public have refused to buy, and discounting and sales have followed.

Manufacturers have undoubtedly been much helped by our supply-side reforms and increased productivity and efficiency. In the private sector, strikes are virtually unknown. I think that the large increases in raw material prices will now ease off. Indeed, in the past few weeks there has been a significant drop in the price of coffee.

[Mr. John Townend]

Investment has been somewhat disappointing overall, but if we consider the figures carefully, we see that investment in buoyant manufacturing industry is quite good. All the factors that have caused pain and lack of confidence in the non-exporting sector have a bright side, in that they make the necessity or likelihood of raising interest rates much less, especially taking into account the lead of the United States, which has recently reduced interest rates. It was followed by France, and I think that other countries will follow. It seems likely that the United Kingdom is near the top of the interest rate cycle.

I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor on not putting up interest rates last month. He had the right feel. A further rise now would be bad for the Government, the housing market and the internal economy. I would like to see the second and third quarter figures before any change was made.

There is one factor which, more than anything else, has prevented the Government from getting the feel-good factor from that outstanding economic performance. Increases in taxation are, without doubt, the Government's Achilles' heel. Last week, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said that he wanted to lead his party from the centre-right and reduce taxes as soon as possible. In the spirit of reconciliation and unity that is sweeping our party, which was illustrated by the Cabinet reshuffle, it behoves us all on the Back Benches to help the Prime Minister achieve his aim to reduce taxes and fulfil his election commitments.

The task before us is very demanding. Since the previous election—we cannot deny it, it is in the Red Book—the tax burden has risen enormously, almost to the level that it reached under the last Labour Government. The Chancellor told the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee that his tax increases were equivalent to roughly 7p on the standard rate. Under the present plans in the Red Book, we can cut taxes only if one or more of three things happen. First, the economy could grow faster than planned in the Red Book. This year's forecast for growth was 3.25 per cent. and has already been downgraded to 2 per cent., so that is not likely.

Secondly, we could slow down our budget deficit reduction programme, which the summer book shows will be £16 billion in 1996-97. I would personally not be prepared to cut taxes by increasing the level of borrowing. I do not think that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer or my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister would want to either, because it would cause the pound to come under pressure and be likely to force us to increase interest rates.

We are therefore left with the final option, which is to cut public spending. We should aim to cut the control total this year by some £10 billion. If we manage to cut it by only £7 billion, we can reduce by half the burden that we have imposed on the taxpayer since 1979.

Anyone who has to make cuts in industry and has done so in a recession knows that, to make cuts, one has to be tough and courageous, have the will power to force through one's cost reduction programme and pay attention to detail. One rarely achieves the objective with a few big cuts in a few areas; what is needed are thousands of small reductions in every area. I hope that events prove me wrong, but I sometimes—only sometimes—doubt whether the Government have the will power to take the action required.

I could talk for an hour about ways to cut public expenditure, but I know that you would not let me, Madam Speaker. However, I shall run through a few ideas. According to the Red Book, we are aiming to increase—not cut—real expenditure next year by 0.5 per cent. If we said that there would be no real growth, we would save £1.3 billion. I have mentioned the reduction in unemployment. That would save us around £800 million and, in addition, the extra people in work would be paying tax and national insurance contributions. We could cut half a billion pounds off the overseas aid budget. We have the sixth largest overseas aid budget in the world, but we are certainly not one of the six wealthiest countries.

We could cut £200 million from the heritage fund, as the lottery is pouring more money into sport and the arts. We should declare war on waste in the public sector—wherever we look, there is waste and overmanning. There should be a recruitment freeze on all staff except police, teachers, nurses, doctors and the armed forces. To be fair, some Departments have made savings, but in the past, any savings have not gone back to the Treasury but have immediately been re-spent by the Departments in question. Those savings should be used to cut taxes.

We should remove the cap on local authority spending, but cap the funds provided by national Government and go back to the old definition of public spending. We should put the squeeze on local authorities and force them to address the problems of waste and overmanning. My hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) has a very good suggestion: we should penalise local authorities that do not collect council tax and rent arrears. Some local authorities have millions of pounds outstanding. We should reduce those councils' grant by a certain percentage, which they could make up by being more efficient.

If inflation comes down faster than forecast, instead of the Departments being allowed to spend the money saved, it should be clawed back. We should abolish the national health service's stores department, apart from the buying office, and thus save £50 million. We should also cut down on consultancy expenditure, advertising and glossy brochures. Personally, I do not think that we are achieving anything in Bosnia—we should bring the troops home.

The cost of illegal immigration is very high—45,000 immigrants are costing us £210 million a year. There should be quicker repatriation, so that people who have no right to be here are not able to string out the procedures and draw social security while they are here. We should make further savings in the social security budget, and I am pleased that the Government are making moves in that direction.

One of the most disturbing results of our generosity with social security is the fact that the number of young girls—not widows or divorcees—who have just left school and caught on to the idea of gaining benefits by having a baby, although they are without a proper relationship or a husband, has increased threefold.

I could go on—

Madam Speaker: I know that the hon. Gentleman could go on for a long time, but his 10 minutes are up.

7.22 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Hoon (Ashfield): I was somewhat relieved when the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) embarked on his usual diatribe and called for public expenditure cuts, because until then I had agreed with some of his analysis of the British economy, especially his comments about the two economies. I am surprised, however, that, given his analysis, he does not draw the obvious conclusion, which is that the two economies—the export-led economy and the domestic economy—are clearly products of the one policy that the Government have pursued since September 1992—devaluation.

The reason why the export economy is relatively successful is that it has benefited from something like a 20 per cent. cut in the value of the pound since September 1992. There is no evidence that any of that benefit has fed through into the domestic economy. That is precisely what the hon. Gentleman was describing and precisely why I suspect that Opposition Members will agree with such an analysis.

Any assessment of the Government's abject economic performance shows clearly how they have failed to tackle the central weakness of the Conservative-controlled British economy. We have low growth combined with high unemployment. Since 1979, Britain has had the lowest growth rate of any European Union or G7 country. The Conservatives' record means that we are firmly in last place in the growth table. That is the longer-term perspective but, even in the short term, there is precious little sign of improvement.

The Treasury's summer forecast for growth, inflation, borrowing and investment reveals that the outlook for the economy has worsened since the November Budget. The forecast implies that the average growth for 1988-98 would be no higher than 1.7 per cent., which is the average growth rate in the United Kingdom since 1979. It is the slowest rate among all EU and G7 countries combined.

The forecast for underlying inflation has been revised upwards from 2.5 per cent. at the end of 1995 in the Budget to 3 per cent. in the summer forecast. The Treasury hopes that inflation will fall to 2.5 per cent. by the end of 1996, but the City and the Bank of England anticipate underlying inflation in the range of 2.5 per cent. to 4 per cent. The public sector borrowing requirement is forecast to be £2 billion higher, at £23.5 billion for 1995-96.

In the Budget, the Treasury forecast that business investment would increase by 10.7 per cent. in 1995, but that forecast has now been halved to 4.75 per cent. It is a doubly depressing picture—a significant reduction in the level of investment combined with some pretty poor forecasting. If we cannot rely on Treasury assessments of the performance that we can expect in the economy, it is difficult to rely on other Government statements.

The deteriorating position of the British economy requires action that only a Labour Government can offer. We have repeatedly heard Conservative Members complain that Labour has no economic policy, but we have debated the fundamental principles of our economic policy in public. It is not often that the new clause IV has been quoted since we had our debate to change Labour's constitution, but we set it out for all to see. It states that we believe in > "a dynamic economy, serving the public interest, in which the enterprise of the market and the rigour of competition are joined with the forces of partnership and cooperation to produce the wealth the nation needs and the opportunities for all to work and prosper."

[Interruption.] I am sorry that Conservative Members are scoffing at principle. One needs principles to start with, and principles are precisely what the Government's economic policy lacks. We have no idea where it is going because the Government simply switch from one principle to another as the need arises.

In my opening remarks, I mentioned the devaluation that has occurred since September 1992. Before then, we were told that the Government's economic policy was based entirely on maintaining our position within the exchange rate mechanism. Miraculously, since September 1992, Ministers have been boasting about the success of their economic policies, success achieved only because the Government were forced out of the ERM. There was no principle involved, so to accuse Labour of lacking policy is to miss the point. We have principles, and it is on those principles that we have built an economic programme aimed at high investment, high growth, high skills and high productivity in order to rebuild our economy, raise living standards and promote the creation of a fair and just society. That is our objective, and I have outlined the starting points.

Labour is committed to the goal of the 1944 White Paper, which stated:

> "The Government accept as one of their primary aims and responsibilities the maintenance of a high and stable level of employment".

Is that one of the present Government's primary aims? Is it something that they see as one of the important features of their economic policy? If so, why have they so singularly failed to achieve it over such a long period?

We have specific policies aimed at tackling the problem of unemployment which, as my colleagues have rightly said, is crucial to the success of our economy. Our first priority will be to tackle the problem of job creation. To increase the number of jobs in the short term, we have talked about the phased release of capital receipts, so that local authorities can build homes. We have proposals for public-private partnerships, at national and local level, to boost infrastructure investment and create jobs. We have called for environmental initiatives to create jobs through a nationwide programme of energy efficiency, to provide better insulation and improve household energy conservation standards. All those proposals would create employment. We have also talked about an expansion scheme for small businesses, to enable them to invest and meet the needs of a modern economy.

Alongside those proposals, we believe that central to the task of promoting employment in the last part of this century will be our determination to invest in the skills of our people. We are committed to a programme of lifelong learning for all. We can achieve that only by raising standards in our schools and by improving access to colleges and universities. We want every young person to be encouraged to remain in mainstream education and training. We want to develop a system of training and education for 16 to 19-year-olds, which will combine academic and vocational qualifications.

We have talked about specific training schemes for women and the ethnic minorities. We have talked about introducing a national skills audit, to identify skill shortages and to target resources to provide training, which will lead to employment. [Interruption.] Conservative Members are scoffing, but they should not simply rely on their Conservative central office briefs telling them that Labour has no policy. The things that I mentioned are Labour's policies. They have been set out and debated in public. Conservative Members should consider them before they simply repeat the chorus that central office wants them to repeat in such a debate.

We want to establish a university of industry. We shall provide new opportunities for retraining, to ensure that the skills that companies already have are improved to meet the challenges of the modern economy. Those are published policies that Conservative Members can read instead of relying on the material supplied to them by central office.

The strategy that I have outlined is crucial, because the Bank of England's February inflation report pointed to Britain's lack of capacity and the slow response of investment in the recovery as a threat to that recovery's sustainability. There is not any significant evidence—again, this is pretty much what the hon. Member for Bridlington was saying in his analysis of Britain's economy—that the recovery is being sustained. We shall sustain that recovery only if we recognise that the Government have an important role to play in encouraging higher levels of investment.

Government cannot second-guess commercial judgments of investors and managers, but we can change the system of corporate governance to give greater incentives to longer-term finance and opportunities for business to secure start-up capital. We must look at the ways in which we can adjust the corporate tax and financial system to encourage that longer-term investment.

We have talked about encouraging the capital gains tax system to promote that longer-term investment. What has been the Government's response to that? The Prime Minister announces that he wants not only to abolish inheritance tax but to eliminate capital gains tax. No Conservative Member has offered an explanation of how that would be achieved; or where the £3 billion—the cost of such abolition—would come from. If any Labour Member made such a commitment, there would be hysterical outrage on the Conservative Benches about where the money was to come from. We need a Minister to answer that question. Where will the £3 billion cost of the abolition of inheritance tax and capital gains tax, which the Prime Minister announced, come from?

In stark contrast to the Government's laid-back, laissez faire policy, we have a specific series of policies designed to meet the needs of the British economy in the last part of the 20th century. We believe that, by investing in our future and by investing in the skills, training and talents of all our members of society, this country can face up to the difficulties of an increasingly competitive global economy, to ensure that Britain and its people can prosper in the next century.

Mr. Barry Legg (Milton Keynes, South-West): We have just heard an audacious speech from new Labour, by the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon). The audacity of his speech takes some believing. He had the gall to mention the exchange rate mechanism and Britain's exit from it. His Front-Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), will not even answer a question on whether he believes in fixed exchange rates.

The hon. Member for Ashfield also had the audacity to mention the European Union. As a socialist—I use that term very loosely—he failed to mention that there are more than 20 million unemployed people in the European Union. He then went on to talk about spending capital receipts. He was really talking about increasing spending and increasing borrowing, and we have been down that route before—under old Labour. What we have heard from the hon. Member for Ashfield is not a prescription for a successful economy.

In recent weeks, we have had quite a lively debate about the merits of tax cuts, especially on the Conservative Benches. I do not intend to spend much time talking about tax cuts and where they should be focused. We face more immediate economic issues, particularly in the areas of monetary policy and public expenditure. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) commented on the new timetable for debates on economic affairs that has arisen since the unified Budget was introduced. We tend to have rather long gaps between economic debates now, but that can be helpful if it enables us to take a longer perspective on our economic affairs.

On reading the summer economic forecast produced by the Treasury, we find that some quite significant changes have taken place since the Budget in November. The estimated tax revenues for the current year are forecast to rise by around 11 per cent. compared with the financial year that ended in April. Since the last Budget, we have also had two increases in interest rates. They have risen by 1 per cent. and there has been a consequent tightening of monetary policy.

The effect of those changes is shown in the economic projections in the summer forecast. The economy is starting to slow down fairly significantly in certain areas. First, the forecast of the growth in domestic demand for the current year has dropped since the Budget, from 2.75 per cent. to 2 per cent. The forecast for manufacturing output has been reduced from 4.25 per cent. to 3 per cent. Indeed, the figures for manufacturing output announced yesterday showed a fall of 0.1 per cent. for May and of 0.4 per cent. since April. We are seeing a marked slowing down in manufacturing output.

Growth in consumer expenditure is also forecast to be at 2 per cent.—not 2.5 per cent. as in the Budget forecast. The forecast for fixed investment has been reduced from 5.75 per cent. to 3 per cent. At the same time, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hazel Grove (Sir T. Arnold) remarked, retail sales have been flat over the past 12 months. There is clear evidence of a marked slowdown in the UK economy. I think that in 1995 we shall see a growth pause.

I have no doubt that the Chancellor's decision on 5 May not to increase interest rates was correct. Many hon. Members have remarked on that decision in the debate. I consider that we may now have reached the peak of the interest rates cycle. The next move in interest rates is likely to be down, and that could be more significant for the UK economy than adjustments in taxation levels in the November Budget.

The prospects for the world economy as a whole have also somewhat diminished in comparison with what we were considering six months ago. The prospects for growth in Germany, the United States and Japan are not as great. The international inflation risks have also been reduced. There can—I think—be no case for higher interest rates in the UK economy in 1995.

The other interesting changes in the summer economic forecast are those of the projections for the public sector borrowing requirement. The projected figures for the next two years have worsened by some £6 billion, which is mainly due to a fall in income tax receipts in the current year of some £1 billion, and a fall in VAT receipts from that projected at the time of the Budget of some £3 billion. Receipts from taxes are falling and that is also a sign that the economy is slowing down. Monetary policy should not be tightened further.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor has set a new target for inflation for the coming years and beyond the end of this Parliament. He is right to have medium-term targets for inflation and he is right to aim for inflation in the region of 2.5 per cent. My only criticism of the Chancellor is that he suggested that inflation might go over 4 per cent. due to events beyond our control and he referred to commodity prices.

I thought that we had learnt the lesson of the 1970s: it is not commodity prices that cause inflation, but Governments who cause inflation. If we looked at what happened with commodity prices in the 1970s, we would remember the hike in oil prices. That did not cause inflation. We have only to look at the comparative performance of the UK and German economies at that time.

In 1975, German inflation increased by 5.9 per cent. In the United Kingdom, it increased by 26 per cent. The following year, United Kingdom inflation went up by 16 per cent., whereas German inflation increased by only 4 per cent. Commodity prices cannot affect inflation unless Governments produce monetary policies that accommodate increases in commodity prices. I offer a word of caution to the Chancellor if he still believes that commodity prices can throw his inflation controls out of the window. It is essential for a responsible Government to have a firm monetary framework and for there to be an intelligent analysis of that framework.

My other area of concern in monetary policy is that the Governor of the Bank of England seems over-concerned about the level of sterling. At his meeting with the Chancellor on 5 May, one of his main reasons for wanting interest rates increased was his belief that sterling had weakened significantly, which could cause inflationary pressures.

I do not think that that is so, and I feel that what the Governor said in his previous meeting with the Chancellor on 5 April better describes the implications:

"The fall in the exchange rate"— that is, the fall in sterling—

"was a side effect of the international exchange rate turbulence—the weakness of the dollar, or related to non-economic domestic factors".

To take too much notice of movements in sterling against a basket of currencies or against particular currencies at present would not be a sensible way in which to decide monetary policy. It is essential that we have a flexible exchange rate, because British business is trading across the world and needs the right exchange rate with all its international trading partners, not just with one or two.

What the Chancellor does on monetary policy will be vital for our economic success. My hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) set out an agenda for public expenditure reductions, and I hope that the new Chief Secretary to the Treasury will prove a ruthless cost cutter and deliver the savings in public expenditure that are required over the coming three or four months, so that we can reduce the level of taxation. I am sure that in that endeavour, the Chief Secretary will have the support of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister.

In his November Budget, the Chancellor will have an opportunity to set out a programme of tax reform, and that will help to reinvigorate the Conservative party and to show that our policies are continuing to move forward. Capital gains tax is certainly one area in which reform must take place—indeed, an area in which reform could even achieve higher levels of tax revenue. But I would be more cautious about inheritance tax. We must also consider changes in reliefs, thresholds and personal allowances, so that those on whom tax increases have borne too heavily in recent years will have the prospect of some reduction in what they pay.

7.42 pm

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): I envied the speech by the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg) for its certainties. He certainly fashioned some alibis for his Government. The Chancellor of the Exchequer made a speech of genial ruthlessness, but he had nothing to say, so he attacked his shadow. In contrast, my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), the shadow Chancellor, spoke for the people of our country. I am glad that he called for investment in our industries and for the rescue of our social services.

There is a daunting agenda. First, 180,000 young people aged 16 and 17 are currently not in work, training or education. About 2.5 million of our fellow citizens are out of work, with little prospect of further meaningful work in their lives. At least 800,000 of our fellow citizens are classed as long-term unemployed. We have also seen the disappearance of apprenticeships.

Hundreds of thousands of our fellow citizens live in homes blighted by negative equity, and there are at least several hundred thousand council homes in desperate need of modernisation—the basic civilised essentials of modern windows and new doors—to make them at least warm and draught-proof. That is a blight on our society.

The Conservative Governments who have held office since 1979 have enjoyed the realisation of about £78 billion-worth of assets from privatisation—a colossal sum. They have also received about £120 billion-worth of North sea oil revenues. I cannot be the only person who finds it incredible to set all that treasure and wealth that Conservative Governments have received, those staggering sums, against the colossal scale of the problems in our society. Those problems are so colossal that we know that, even if there were a change of Government, they could not be righted in the new Government's first term.

[Mr. Barry Jones]

A worse feature of the analysis is that about 2.5 million manufacturing jobs have disappeared since 1979. Real well-paid manufacturing jobs have been lost to our nation. We must acknowledge that Mrs. Thatcher, Sir Geoffrey Howe and Sir Keith Joseph decided on an industrial policy that allowed all those manufacturing jobs to go to the wall. We now know that our nation lacks the capacity of a truly broadly based set of manufacturing industries. That is a wounding reality, and it bodes ill for the next century. I do not think that we can criticise that troika of crazed ideologues too much for what they did to our manufacturing base.

My own priorities remain with aerospace and steel, and here I think I can claim the backing of the whole House. I shall speak in detail about one aerospace project—the airbus. More than 25,000 British people go to work on an airbus every day, and more than 300 British businesses are involved in the airbus project. There are 1,250 airbus airliners in service with 120 airlines throughout the world. Further orders, if they are realised, will be worth up to $52 billion. Furthermore, more than £1 billion a year is contributed by the airbus project, through British Aerospace plc, to the United Kingdom's balance of trade. That must be good.

I am proud of the fact that 2,300 of my constituents make the wings of the airbus—of every airbus—in my constituency. The Government must as a matter of urgency give British Aerospace grants for technological research, specifically for research and development in wing technology. I worry because, in Hamburg, there is now a factory assembling nothing but a variant marque of the airbus. It is clear to me that the Germans covet our wing technology expertise. They want to make wings, so it would help if the British Government gave British Aerospace those grants, by way of reward.

My other local industry is steel, and I acknowledge the work that the Government are doing to try to eliminate the cheating that goes on in some continental steel-producing countries. At the moment, British Steel plc is going great guns, and its profits are high. But everyone who knows steel knows that the day will come—sooner rather than later—when the cyclical trade in steel will dip, and dip horribly. Our British steel industry will then be hit, because our competitors on the continent are cheating by means of illegal subsidies for their steel companies.

We in Britain, in Wales and in my constituency have made enormous sacrifices, with de-manning and with the closure of steel mills. Having created what is arguably one of the world's finest steel industries—with brilliant production and quality—we should not have to suffer that kind of competition from the continent. I ask the Government to look carefully at the matter.

Time is short tonight, and I conclude by saying that I do not think that the Government have any strategic sense with regard to economic policy. It all seems to be tactical, short-term and hand-to-mouth, and that is not good enough for a nation facing major challenges. The Government never exhibit any sense of urgency in their plans related to large-scale unemployment, but such large-scale unemployment in the long term destroys the fabric of our society.

Nor do I see any convincing plans from the Cabinet or the Government for investing in our manufacturing industry in any meaningful way. There are no coherent plans to rescue the national health service from the problems it faces. There are no realistic plans to help our school services or to tackle homelessness. All the people of this country can do is hope that they will be able to vote urgently in a general election.

Mr. Nirj Joseph Deva (Brentford and Isleworth): I am grateful for the opportunity to follow the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) and my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg), who made a very technical speech. I would also like to congratulate my hon. Friends who are now assuming their Front-Bench duties for the first time. I wish them the very best.

When the country voted at the last general election, the Conservative party received the largest number of votes it or any other party had received in the history of British politics. When the country voted that day, we were in the midst of the worst recession in Europe, but still the country voted for us. It was not a mere act of faith, but an act of certainty in the ability of the Conservative party—and the Conservative party alone—to turn the country around. That expectation is now being met. The Government have delivered.

In 1992, when those votes were cast, the growth in the GDP was minus 0.5 per cent. Today it is 3.9 per cent., and rising. In 1992, when those votes were cast, interest rates were at 10.2 per cent. Today, they are at 6.7 per cent., and are steady. In 1992, when those votes were cast, inflation was at 4 per cent. Today, it is 3.5 per cent., and is below the European Union average.

In 1992, when those votes were cast, 660,000 people were out of work. Today, there are 660,000 more people in work and supporting their families. In each of the past 22 months, unemployment has fallen. In my constituency alone, unemployment has fallen by 100 per cent. compared with the same period last year. In 1992, when those votes were cast, industrial production was growing at minus 0.1 per cent. Today, it is growing at a phenomenal 5 per cent. a year. In 1992, when those votes were cast, the balance of payments was £10 billion in red. Today, we are beginning to achieve something that has not been achieved since 1984—a balance of payments surplus.

No wonder the Labour party is in a panic, and is hiding behind its leader's sanguine smile. Labour Members are collectively paddling half under the water to stay afloat. The Labour party must acknowledge that it has tried to borrow the Government's policies as its own. I know that imitation is the sincerest form of flattery, and no one—least of all the Labour party—can deny that the party is imitating the Conservative party in all aspects bar one or two, such as its belief in the social chapter and the minimum wage.

Why is the Labour party attempting to steal our clothes if they are ill-suited to the country? Why is the Labour leader discovering every day a new Labour policy which is, in truth, an old Conservative policy? We are flattered by the imitation, and heartened by the confidence that the Labour party has placed in our policies.

We must look at the Government's record to understand the enormity of their success in turning the country around since the general election. No wonder the Labour party is trying to imitate us. Imitate us, by all means—but the more it imitates us, the more it flatters us, and the more it flatters us, the more the country will understand that it will be better to vote for the tutor at the next election rather than the new student. We are old hands at managing the economy well.

Labour's record of economic mismanagement during its entire history has been utterly disastrous, and it has been disastrous because one cannot teach an old dog new tricks. One can try, but in the end it reverts to its own traditions. Each party has an imbued culture, an underlying foundation, and its own ethos and values—in the case of the Labour party, it is pervasive socialism which, try as it might, will never go away.

Along with that all-pervasive socialism comes the desire to intervene, which is a polite word for meddle. The Labour party wants to meddle in people's lives, in how they spend their money, in how they should run their business, in how they educate their children, and in how they support their families. That old desire to meddle and the belief that the Labour party "knows what is good for you" comes from the party's socialist roots. That is why the Labour party is socialist.

Without that need to meddle, and without its socialist roots, the party will be left without a philosophy. Without a philosophy, it will be nothing as a party. It will believe in nothing and will stand for nothing, other than to get power. It will then become nothing—the ultimate nihilistic experience. The party will implode upon itself, smiling sanguinely and with a stiff upper lip to the last behind its languid leader.

Original thinking, like original sin, is unbecoming in the modern Labour party, as the party's modernity is entirely based on its unoriginality. The modern Labour party does not think, it copies. The modern Labour party does not innovate or develop, it merely reflects—like a large cracked mirror—our policies. That is a sad state of affairs.

Perhaps I am being a trifle unfair. The shadow Chancellor, who I notice has left the Chamber, is an original thinker. Last year, in a moment of weakness, the hon. Gentleman thought of something original, which, like a golden egg, dropped on his entire unthinking party. He developed a new economic theory, and called it the endogenous growth theory of the economy. His theory was particularly concerned with investment, a subject about which the hon. Gentleman spoke this afternoon.

In a number of pronouncements, the shadow Chancellor has made his suspicions of the work of business operating in a free economy quite clear. He has said:

"The British free market without effective intervention, has proved to be a static, brittle and second rate model of economic development because people do not have the tools to plan and invest for the future . . . To summarise, crude free market dogma has failed because it does not encourage long term relations and commitments and therefore gives no incentive for people to invest for the future".

As a result, the shadow Chancellor has stated:

"without co-ordinated action we cannot expect to see the kind of investment in industry and in skills and in infrastructure that we need".

Instead of trusting businesses to invest, Labour's version of the endogenous growth theory makes the state the key player in undertaking investment decisions, camouflaging nice-sounding, well-meaning rhetoric on the mechanics of how the Government should intervene directly in the investment process. Yet without the appropriate knowledge of commercial discipline, that cannot be meaningful. Alienated from justifiable economic stimuli, it will serve only to produce less investment, and lower-quality investment.

A specific method of economic and industrial control has been unveiled, involving widespread Government oversight of the economic process. Let us take some of the specific proposals with which the Labour party has threatened us, such as on companies' relationships with other companies.

The Labour party says that a beneficial influence is to be exerted in terms of industrial companies allocating decisions. It says that the state is to influence from whom companies buy, to whom they sell and how they relate to each other over the long term. Have you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, heard of anything so preposterous? The state will tell companies and their boards who to buy from, who to sell to and how to market their products.

On the allocation of companies' investment funds, the Labour party says that the state is to be involved in the type of investment undertaken. Regardless of the needs of the individual business, the Government are to involve themselves in whether a company invests in plant, machinery, advertising, marketing or research.

If the Labour party were elected, which I do not think it will be, we could look forward to a period in which the state—the shadow Chancellor and his team—informed company boards that growth would be better stimulated if they took their £100,000 and invested it in new plant or machinery rather than spending it on an advertising or marketing campaign, or even on a new carpet.

The Labour party says that the state should be directly involved in how firms handle and invest in their employees. On training—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. The hon. Gentleman's time is up. I call Mr. Jim Cunningham.

8.2 pm

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South-East): I was interested in the remarks of the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg), as he is the only Conservative Member who has tried to be honest about the economy. The Treasury has admitted what everyone already knows—that the recovery is slowing down, and that Britain is at the back of the class of industrialised countries on competitiveness. It is now known that, during the period 1979-94, the economy grew at an average rate of 1.7 per cent. per annum. That is the slowest period of growth in this country since 1945.

More shocking still, wages and salaries have been reduced to their lowest share of GDP since the second world war. They went down from 66 per cent. of GDP in the second quarter of 1979 to 62.7 per cent. in the fourth quarter of 1994. Manufacturing output has also received a hammering. In 1993, it was less than 1 per cent. higher than it was in 1973. But what really gives the lie to the Conservative "economic miracle" is that, of all the G7 countries, the UK had the lowest average export growth, at 2.9 per cent. Together with Germany, the UK has the highest imports among the G7 states, at 26.3 per cent. All those statistics are indictments of the Conservative party's record.

To really appreciate the effect of current policies, one must look at how my constituency has been devastated. Rolls-Royce and GPT have shed about 18,000 jobs in the past 10 years, which shows the magnitude of what has happened in my constituency and other parts of Coventry. The region suffers from poor transport links, which will only be exacerbated by rail privatisation and inadequate plans for the west coast rail link. Large manufacturers have been shedding jobs, causing Coventry's dole queues to rise above the regional average.

People should not forget when they make comparisons that, at one time, Coventry was known as a boom city. The decimation of the manufacturing industry has hit Coventry particularly harshly. One in three of the region's work force are in manufacturing, compared with one in five nationally. The subsequent job losses have created more long-term unemployed people in Coventry than even in Warwickshire.

It is not just the manufacturing sector that has been hurt. The service sector is expected to lose more jobs later this decade. The virtual end of the British coal industry has affected many people in Coventry and north Warwickshire. It is widely recognised that, due in no small measure to the recession and the slow faltering of the so-called recovery, investment in town centres has been slow.

The Government have shifted their excuses for the catastrophic fumbling of the economy, while the dole queues have lengthened and unemployment has more than doubled from just over 1 million in 1979. The labour force survey report shows that 734,000 people are working part-time as they cannot find a full-time job. That should be seen against a background of more than 1 million people earning less than £2.50 an hour. Women have been especially hit by the economic climate. Some 670,000 women earn less than £2.50 an hour.

The "Summer Economic Forecast" that has been laid before us does not show that things will change. On the contrary, the document acknowledges that the rut has been created for us by the Conservative party. Manufacturing industry has borne the brunt of two Tory recessions, as can be vividly witnessed in Coventry. Investment in industry, infrastructure and people are the keys to re-establishing a fragile economy. While extolling the virtues of investment, the "Summer Economic Forecast", however, reports that 1995 will not see as large a rise in business investment as expected.

The Treasury has also declared that total fixed investment is likely to be less than business investment. With growing under-investment, it should not be surprising that Britain has suffered. In May, excluding oil and erratic items for non-EC trade, Britain's volume of exports fell by 2 per cent., while imports rose by 5.5 per cent. The Central Statistical Office has even suggested that the non-EC visible trade deficit is widening. There has been a domino effect as money flows abroad. The net external assets of this country have been diminished, from £17.7 billion at the end of 1994 to £8.2 billion in the first quarter of this year.

Labour has imaginatively put forward an exciting strategy of investment and partnership with industry, and has recognised changing work practices in the run-up to the 21st century. It has also acknowledged the inventiveness and talent of the British people, and has been discussing its proposals with the trade unions and businesses. The Tories, through their shenanigans in a split ribbon leadership race, wiped £10 billion off share prices, which sums up Conservative economic mismanagement.

The Government should listen to the Labour party's proposals. Instead, we have seen clashes between the Chancellor and the Governor of the Bank of England. Labour would make the Bank of England more accountable to Parliament via a statutory framework, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) outlined today.

The rules governing private sector participation in the affairs of the state are in dire need of an overhaul. They need to be amended so that companies would not necessarily recoup all their costs at the point of use. The rules should consider not just cost-effectiveness but social benefits to the community.

The Treasury is also confused in its handling of leases. For example, a 20-year lease costing £200 million but repaid at £10 million a year would be counted against the external financing limit of the £200 million in the lease's first year. Clearly, it should be viewed as £10 million against the external financing limit in the lease's first year.

Most fundamentally, Labour will institute a decade of investment, as compared with a decade of negligence. One way to encourage investment in industry would be to establish an investment in industry unit at the Department of Trade and Industry. In an impact statement, each Government Department should declare how each of its policies would affect industry. The small loans guarantee scheme should be extended. Other measures could include a moratorium law for the courts to attempt to save companies from bankruptcy—not dissimilar to what happens in America.

Those and other proposals are being considered by the Labour party. All we hear from the Government is the tired old statement that has wrecked our economy—the iceberg of blind ideology.

8.9 pm

Mr. Matthew Carrington (Fulham): I apologise to the House for missing most of the earlier part of the debate because I was stuck upstairs in a statutory instruments Committee that went on longer than most of us who were on the Committee expected.

It is sad that I missed the first half of the debate, because I understand that the opening speeches were worth hearing, and especially that the speech of my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was one to treasure. He laid bare and exposed the policies of the Labour party most effectively, and I am sure that that approach will be carried forward for the next 18 months to two years and will become stronger and stronger.

I welcome to the Treasury Bench my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Mrs. Knight), and congratulate her on her appointment, which delights us and all her friends on the Conservative Benches. We look forward to great things from her.

I am especially pleased to have an opportunity to speak in the debate, because the summer economic forecast shows an economy that is in extremely good shape. It is in rather better shape than the country's economy has been, perhaps, since the end of the second world war.

The economy is doing very well indeed in a great many sectors. Unquestionably, there are problems in the economy, but even the apparent problems are in reality strengths. We are witnessing a decline in economic growth, but it is a decline from 4 per cent., which is historically in our economy a very high level, to a much more sustainable level of about 3 per cent. That is to be greatly welcomed, because it means that our recovery from the recession can be continued in a way that will allow the recovery to strengthen, broaden and deepen throughout the economy.

The continuing low retail sales are in many ways a serious problem for our economy. Many parts of industry suffer badly as a result—those that rely heavily on domestic sales. Low retail sales are a serious problem, but they have the advantage of avoiding what has always killed our economy in the past when recovering from recessions—an import boom, a massive sucking in of imports, which has destroyed the balance of payments in the past and caused us so many difficulties. A cautious return of growth in retail sales is therefore to be welcomed.

We should not be overly worried about depressed house prices; they will cure themselves with time, as they already are. The great problem of house prices increasing far too rapidly has beset us in the past and blown our economy right off course, most notably in the boom of 1986 and 1987, when the growth in house prices was largely responsible for the crash that came afterwards. We should therefore all greatly welcome the continuing low growth in house prices.

One of our great strengths is exports. As was said earlier, the increase in export volumes that has taken place—and there is every sign that that increase will continue to be sustained at high growth rates—is something that we have not previously witnessed in this country when coming out of recession. That is extremely positive, and it allows us to hope that this time, our recovery will be sustainable. It offers the opportunity for the next downturn in the economy, when it comes—in economic cycles there is inevitably a downturn—to be mitigated by the strength of our exports and our external market, which is extremely healthy.

Perhaps the biggest problem is inflation. Although inflation is low, it is projected to increase. It is increasing, admittedly, from a low base, which is encouraging, but inflation is the danger in our economy, and that is what we must watch.

I was very pleased to notice in the economic forecast that, after having increased, inflation is projected to decline sharply to an underlying rate of about 2.5 per cent. Inevitably, in the forecast there is no indication of the way in which that decline will be achieved, because the Government, wisely and rightly, give no estimates as to future movements in interest rates.

I hope that it will be possible to avoid a sharp increase in interest rates to control inflation, but in my opinion it is more important to maintain a low inflation rate than to worry about maintaining a low interest rate. We need to take whatever measures are necessary to get the inflation rate under control and to achieve the target of getting back down closer to 2.5 per cent. to 2 per cent. That should be a major objective in economic policy.

However, hope remains that it will not be necessary to increase interest rates to do that. There are signs that the inflationary pressures in the economy are not great and that, in the external economy, if anything, interest rate movements in the United States and Japan will allow us to weather the current inflationary storm. I rather agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) that, by watching the economic figures during the summer, and certainly through the second and perhaps the third quarter, before doing anything precipitate on interest rates, it may be possible to avoid any increase in interest rates.

One problem will need to be tackled; as things stand, we need to boost the domestic economy. We need to find some way of spreading that recovery from the recession so that it benefits more people. We have heard in many speeches this afternoon about the difficulties that confront the domestic industries in our country. Those industries need to benefit eventually from the recovery, and the sooner the better. To do so, we need to put more money into people's pockets in the right way, and slowly.

There is a strong case to be made for gently encouraging the domestic market to recover. The best way of doing that is by increasing people's disposable earnings. The most effective way of doing that is by reducing taxation, and by reducing direct taxation. I wish to encourage my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary and my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to consider seriously ways in which direct taxation may be reduced in the next Budget.

However, it is obvious from the economic forecast that, on the face of it, there is no scope for reducing taxation. Indeed we are witnessing, in the projections of public sector borrowing, a slight increase in the anticipated amount of borrowing this year and an increase in the anticipated amount of borrowing next year, neither of which shows any flexibility to allow for a reduction in taxation. Therefore reductions in taxation must come from a serious review of the public expenditure.

I wish to encourage a rigorous look at public expenditure, because there must be scope for finding substantial reductions in public expenditure, which can then be translated into returning money to people's pockets to spend as they choose, to encourage domestic industries to grow and expand. That is a desirable objective socially and economically, and it must be done sooner rather than later.

The question also arises whether that is best done in income tax cuts or in changes to capital taxes. There is a strong case to be made for changing capital tax, whether it be capital gains tax or inheritance tax, to encourage savings in the economy.

The summer economic forecast reveals that the savings ratio is decreasing and industrial investment, although it is projected to increase quite sharply in this forecast, is showing a marked decline on what was anticipated in the Budget forecast in the Red Book. There is therefore a strong case to be made for encouraging savings, and, in addition to some reduction in income tax, I should like steps to be taken towards reforming the taxation of capital, especially capital gains tax.

[Mr. Matthew Carrington]

We have a strong economy that is going in the right direction and we need to ensure that that progress continues. As a Government, we must not—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman's time has expired.

8.19 pm

Mrs. Helen Liddell (Monklands, East): My right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), who is a very distinguished and experienced parliamentarian, made one of the most perceptive remarks to be heard in tonight's debate. He drew attention to the importance of economic debates and the significance that the country attaches to them, while also drawing attention to the paucity of such debates in this Chamber.

That caused me to reflect, as a much less experienced Member of Parliament, on the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had an opportunity to come to the House today and give a reasoned and detailed explanation of the Treasury summer forecast. He missed that opportunity, and all we got was bluster and theatricality. That does not serve the House or the nation well. We expect better from someone who holds one of the highest offices in the land.

The Chancellor had an opportunity today to tell us why the Treasury summer forecast differs so markedly from last year's Budget. He had an opportunity to explain why the Treasury has revised down its forecast of overall growth in the economy. Gross domestic product in 1995 is estimated to fall from the Budget forecast of 3.25 per cent. to 3 per cent. in the summer forecast. The people of this country are concerned about economic growth; it is an integral part of their lives.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) pointed out that, in the period from 1979 to 1993, this country has had the slowest rate of economic growth of the 18 countries of the European Community and the G7 nations. A number of Conservative Members referred to an increase in forecast inflation. My hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) pointed to the significantly higher estimates of public sector borrowing requirement.

We are elected, Opposition and Government Members alike, as custodians of this country, its legislative framework and its economic performance. That is key to our future and it is why we, as politicians, have a very low standing in the community. The Government have not fostered an environment in which investment can improve. They are selling out our future.

The low levels of investment in both the public and private sectors—I do not turn repeatedly to the public sector as a panacea for all ills—are selling out this country's future. I do not spend a lot of time playing with a fancy electronic organiser that will tell me what the next day is or when I can expect my husband to take me to dinner. I do not mark down dates in my diary and 1 January 2000 does not mean all that much to me—except I suspect that it will be a rather more alcoholic Hogmanay than usual.

On that subject, I hope that by then we will have a Labour Chancellor who recognises that one cannot take policy decisions based on pique. The whisky industry in my constituency has suffered directly as a consequence of the Conservatives' pique. When they were defeated on the issue of value added tax on fuel, the duty on whisky was increased. As a consequence, we have seen a reduction in revenue to the Exchequer from that industry as well as a reduction in the industry's prospects.

Levels of investment are critical. Inward investment is important to my area. For many years, Scotland has depended on high levels of inward investment. My hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East referred to the opportunities that come from the globalisation of the economy and from increasing technological advances. We have an opportunity to attract companies that are mobile and can invest in this or any other country. Yet we often lose that opportunity, just as we are losing other opportunities that we should seize.

Let us consider, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you and I are economic strategists for a multinational company which could choose to establish a business in any country in the world. Would it choose to come to Britain when it does not know what is the Government's policy on the exchange rate and when it does not know whether there are one or two Conservative parties on the issue of a single currency? How can businesses plan for the future and view this country as a potential site for industrial investment if the Government are not confident about where they are going and about their long-term future?

The Government have repeatedly been thrown off course. They are committed to short-termism and the Chancellor and his colleagues on the Back Benches have already begun to consider, with some anxiety, their prospects at the next election and the way in which they can use and abuse the economy to secure their re-election. I do not believe that the people are foolish enough to fall for that.

My constituents would have been interested to learn today why 734,000 more people are working part time and cannot find full-time work. Why has the number of temporary employees in industry increased by 30 per cent? Why has the number of those in employment fallen by 14,000 in the first quarter of this year? My constituents and those of every hon. Member in the House—there are more than 650 of us—want to know why they feel insecure at work. The Chancellor's speech has not prompted us to explain to our constituents that the Government are in control and have the country's long-term interests at heart.

My speaking time is short. Most hon. Members have been fairly restrained in their remarks and I will try to do the same. I am very interested in the future of small firms in my constituency. More than 90 per cent. of people in the country work for small firms; it is a fallacy to believe that everyone works for the ICIs and the Marks and Spencers. It is the small firms sector that is most troubled about the future. Some 40 per cent. of those involved in small firms who were polled in a recent Daily Telegraph survey said that they did not believe that the country had come out of recession. People in small firms are at the sharp end.

I commend those Conservative Members who referred to what is happening in the retail industry. My constituency used to comprise market towns. When I walk down South Bridge street, the main street in the major town in my constituency where as a child I was taken to buy my Sunday outfit, all I find now are discount stores and empty shops. People have lost confidence in the Government. I do not seek to make a partisan point when I say that the people are entitled to turn to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and expect answers, not bluster. What we had tonight was bluster and also complacency from a number of Conservative Members.

We cannot be complacent about the country's economic performance and economic future. We have a responsibility to take these debates extremely seriously and to show that we are committed to ensuring the country's future economic growth. We must make sure that the Government are considering some of the existing fundamental problems in the economy.

I do not believe that every economic problem is caused by the Government. However, some honesty and some rational argument on the part of the Chancellor about the nature of the problems that we face would allow people to go forward in partnership. Confidence among our business sector would increase, as would the hope and confidence of those people who fear unemployment. Some 65 per cent. of people fear unemployment and feel insecure in their jobs. Given the events of the past couple of weeks, I would have thought that there was one man who, more than any other, would understand how it feels to be insecure in one's job: the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

8.29 pm

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): The hon. Member for Monklands, East (Mrs. Liddell) represents a considerable strand of the Labour party. She is fluent, she has an attractive way of addressing problems, she has confidence and vigour, and she plainly addresses herself to that great body of those in the private sector who are temporarily disenchanted with the Government.

They look at the policies of new Labour and they say to themselves, "This is splendid. It is a new, reinvigorated Labour party and we can vote for it and have all the advantages of a new form of Conservative Government." They say to themselves, "Here is a smart, young public school boy with his attractive and very successful wife at the Bar. He is just the sort of person that we in Hampstead or Tettenhall feel most comfortable with." They then say, "While we respond to those arguments, what are the principles and the policies of the Government?"

It is true that, after 16 years, there have been some changes. It is instructive for all those outside the Chamber who believe that they can have a Labour Government without substantial changes to read the debate. It is important to examine not just the principles and the policies, but the prejudices of the two great parties. Those prejudices have been eloquently demonstrated in today's debate.

Conservative Members have, by and large, expressed support for my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We believe that economic policy is now settled and successful. We have had some discussions about the minutiae of monetary policy, but the persistent theme is the need to cut public expenditure. We admit that it is jolly difficult to cut public expenditure, even when the prejudices of our party are in favour of it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend), as always and rightly, put the need for specific cuts in public expenditure in the first paragraph of his speech. My hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) supported the way in which economic policy is proceeding at present, but he too was looking for cuts in public expenditure. That is a proper expression of Tory prejudice. Yet, in spite of those prejudices, it is extremely difficult to contain public expenditure, and our public expenditure has risen too much.

New Labour, however, offers all the attractive features of Conservative economic policy, but people should listen to the speeches by Labour Members this afternoon. Every time a speech makes recommendations on how the economy could be improved, massive amounts of public expenditure are involved. The public school boys leading the Labour party will say, "Oh no, that is only old Labour. The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) is completely out of touch with everything that is happening, but we have younger, smarter, cleverer people and we don't want massive amounts of public expenditure." But we have only to look at the speeches made this afternoon.

The hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) produced a massive catalogue of suggestions for increases in public expenditure. He is an important figure on the Labour Front Bench who is thought to be modern, new, intelligent and well educated Labour, well away from the trade unions, but he gave us a massive catalogue of expensive promises.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) is solid, decent and moderate. What was his prescription for improving the economy? It was spend, spend, spend. The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) is not one of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield's wild men with roving eyes and a mad look, but another decent, sound man who might be in middle management anywhere, but yet again he makes further suggestions for increasing public expenditure. Those solid citizens that would support a Labour Administration would ask for more public expenditure.

I am glad that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) is here. I gave him notice that I would mention him. I have watched him and his colleague the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. Turner) these past 10 years as they have been councillors in Wolverhampton and then Members of Parliament. Every time there is a suggestion for closing a hospital or moving facilities elsewhere, they ask for more public expenditure. They want more public expenditure for general practitioners and they are extremely good at supporting middle-class claims for extra public expenditure. When the lawyers complain, they want more money for legal aid. Whenever there is a suggestion for more public expenditure, along come those solid citizens representing new Labour—the soft, decent face of a Labour party that can give the country Conservatism under a different name.

The prejudices of our parties are quite different. The Conservative party wishes to reduce the size of the state; we want to reduce public expenditure, because that is the only safe way to reduce taxation and the only way to keep interest rates down.

The Labour party should realise that it cannot reintroduce exchange controls or any form of capital control. It will have to borrow money from the global pool of capital. If it comes to power, those solid citizens will put pressure on the fresh-faced public school boy and we shall be back to the old story of an enormous public sector borrowing requirement, higher taxes and higher interest rates, and there will be no difference whatsoever in substance between the fresh-faced public school boy and all the old chaps who are in favour of old Labour and the nostrums of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield.

8.36 pm

Mr. Alan Milburn (Darlington): We have heard in the debate a tale of two Britains. We have heard the official version from the Chancellor of the Exchequer earlier today, who described a Britain on the up—a Britain where everything is improving dramatically and insecurity and unemployment are about to become things of the past. At one point, I thought that the Chancellor was about to follow his predecessor by using a gardening metaphor. Hon. Members will remember those famous green shoots of recovery. I thought that the present Chancellor was about to talk about everything coming up roses.

Like the previous Chancellor, the right hon. and learned Gentleman will quickly find that the public simply do not believe that message of optimism because it jars against the other Britain—the real Britain, where, unfortunately, confidence is low, pessimism is high and insecurity in the job and housing market is the order of the day. It is the Britain where middle and low-income families face record tax bills and ordinary families are paying more for less—more tax for fewer services. It is a Britain where millions of home owners have lived through more than five years of crisis in recession, debt and repossession. As the debate takes place, more than 1 million home owners remain trapped in negative equity.

A Government committed to the home owner would seek to create the conditions in which the insecurities, doubts and lack of confidence in the private housing market were removed. The Government's approach is clearly driven by an understandable fear of a lurch back into the bad old boom-bust cycles, for which they were largely responsible and which they wish to avoid again. I understand that fear. They are right to be fearful but are wrong not to recognise the fact that the economic circumstances of the 1990s are very different from those of the 1980s. The danger in the present situation is not that a recovery in the housing market will inevitably set up a damaging inflationary spiral but rather that a lack of recovery in the housing market will dampen prospects for the economy as a whole.

The Government have a responsibility to carry out the promises and pledges that they made to home owners. They can do that quite simply tonight. The new Chief Secretary to the Treasury, when he winds up in an hour or so, can tell the House that he will recommend to the Secretary of State for Social Security that he drop the proposal to remove benefits from unemployed home owners. The Chief Secretary can say that he will review the additional tax burdens that ordinary home owners face, as a result of the fact that, between January of last year and October of this year, repayment costs on an average home have risen by more than £800, because of interest rate rises, two cuts in mortgage interest relief at source—MIRAS—and the cost of private mortgage insurance.

I recognise that the insecurity in the housing market springs from something deeper than mistrust of the Conservative party. It springs from a growing insecurity in the jobs market and growing economic insecurity in general. In essence, insecurity will remain as long as doubts remain about the prospects for long-term growth in the British economy. Here, as the summer forecast itself bears out, the prospects are rather less rosy. Economic growth, as my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mrs. Liddell) said a moment ago, has been cut from 3.25 to 3 per cent.

Nor are the prospects for future sustainable growth any more favourable. Labour Members have consistently argued that the economy requires higher levels of investment for sustainable growth to avoid the boom and the bust, as growth is inevitably derailed by accelerating inflation. Yet in the summer forecast, business investment has been halved from 10.75 per cent., as it was in the Budget just a few months ago, to 4.75 per cent.

Many hon. Members will have read the Bank of England's inflation report and will have noted in the February edition the warning, which I hope that we will all take seriously, that, already,

> "Capacity constraints are becoming widespread in industry . . . This will increase inflationary risks unless productive capacity increases."

Already, the fragile economic recovery that we are seeing is running into all the old problems of capacity constraints, investment gaps and skills shortages—skills shortages when more than 2 million people are officially unemployed. The low capacity of our economy is the main reason why unemployment remains so high and our trade deficit is so large, and is the root cause of rising taxes and high unemployment.

Unless those underlying weaknesses in the British economy are tackled, Britain's relative economic decline will continue through the latter part of this century and into the next. That failure to invest in capacity, whether it is physical or human, lies at the heart of Britain's inflation and its slow growth problems. The result is that, unfortunately, Britain has a sluggish rather than a dynamic market economy. That reflects a failed model of Government: the deregulation dogma, cuts in investment in skills and infrastructure.

Cuts have been made in investment in training at the very time when so many people are out of work and are crying out for an opportunity to gain entry to the labour market. That reflects the failure to see that it is necessary to develop long-term partnerships to improve economic performance. Partnership—between Government and the private sector, and between companies, shareholders and workers—is the model for progress.

Investment is the key to future economic success. Without investment, Britain will not only remain in the slow lane of the global economy, but will remain a country divided. Again, there is a tale of two Britains: prosperity for the few, insecurity for the many, and unemployment and low pay scarring the prospects for all. Britain is locked in a vicious cycle of poverty, rising inequality and economic failure.

It used to be said in the 1980s, when we heard much of the economic miracle, that trickle-down economics would provide the basis for sustainable growth, that they would work, and that cuts in the top rate of tax would mean that those at the bottom would find gainful employment. There has been no economic miracle. There has been an economic disaster. Just a week or so ago, the former Welsh Secretary coined the phrase, "No change, no chance." He was right in more ways than one, because the summer forecast and all that the Chancellor had to say this afternoon represented no change—no change in policy, no change in direction.

We could be rubbing our hands with glee at the prospects—or rather the lack of them—that arise for the Conservative party from that lack of change in direction, but what worries me is not the life chances of Conservative Members of Parliament but the life chances of the people of this country. The real lesson to take from the economic forecast is that, without a change in Government, life chances will not improve for the majority of people.

8.46 pm

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) on his appointment as Chief Secretary to the Treasury and wish him well in the future as he considers the budgets of the great Departments of State.

I have always believed that we would win the next general election. I have listened to speeches from Opposition Members this evening and am more convinced of that than ever before. My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) referred to the speech made by the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) and to the huge shopping list. The realisation of the bills that will have to be met by an incoming Labour Government will, I believe, frighten voters. Secondly, there will be a recognition that the Conservative Government have moved the country from recession to recovery, and that they have done so at a time of the deepest worldwide recession since the 1920s.

I was struck yesterday, when listening to Opposition Members posing questions on education and employment, by what an uphill struggle the Opposition will have because of the way in which the statistics are changing. How difficult it is for one to mount an effective attack when the statistics are against one.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) focused his speech tonight on unemployment and said that it was a key factor. Yet all the statistics relating to unemployment and the creation of jobs, are moving in favour of the Government. Unemployment has fallen by nearly 700,000 since its peak in December 1992, and the number of people joining the unemployment register in May was the lowest for five years.

It is hard to attack the Government when the number of people in employment has risen by more than 400,000 to about 25.5 million since the recovery began; and it is hard to attack the Government when redundancies are down to half the level that they were a year ago. It is also hard to attack the Government when, over the three months to May, the number of people out of work for a year or more fell by 40,000 and the number of people employed in manufacturing industry is on the rise.

When I listen to some Opposition Members, I really think that we are living in different worlds. [Interruption.] We have heard the theme of the tale of two cities from the Opposition this evening, but with such improvements in the economy, it is hardly surprising that the Opposition made so little headway yesterday.

It is in part due to the success of our economic policies that the Conservative party is now recovering in the polls. [Interruption.] The most recent polls show us recovering, but Opposition Members do not like to hear that. The recovery is also due to the Opposition's failure to present credible costed policies. That was the problem faced this evening by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). They are not helped when the Leader of the Opposition appears to have begun to distance himself from one of their key policies, the minimum wage, saying that he wants to leave it to the unions to negotiate rather than coming up with a figure.

Perhaps that is why the stock market has surged recently. That is further evidence of economic recovery, although, judging by the speech made by the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Cunningham), he may not have noticed it. However, the key factor in boosting the stock market, which is an illustration of people's confidence, is the fact that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has been re-elected with a greater majority than the leader of the Labour party achieved in his election. [Interruption.] Hon. Members do not like to hear it, but it is true.

I welcome the summer economic forecast. I quite understand why growth has to come down slightly if we are to keep inflation within a figure which will enable us to compete internationally. I welcome the target of 2 per cent. of GDP for the PSBR for 1996-97 and the need to keep tight control. Growth is what we need and will get. Some Opposition Members may give us credit for the fact that unemployment in France is twice that per capita in Britain, and France has yet to begin to reconstruct some of its state industries.

I come now to the area that I represent—the middle of England, the east midlands. Manufacturing in the east midlands has performed strongly in recent years and its share of regional GDP at 29 per cent. is higher than anywhere else in the country. Output is up 32 per cent. over the past decade. If we have a problem, it is that not enough inward investment into Britain is going to the east midlands. That is something which I hope that the Government will address.

That the east midlands is doing so well is in part due to Toyota's huge new plant near Derby. When I was parliamentary private secretary to the Minister of State, Welsh Office, I visited that plant, on behalf of the Welsh Office, on its opening. It is a wonderful plant, which has had a large impact on the east midlands, in particular stimulating the trend towards exports.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) referred to the fact that this is the first time that he has seen an export-led recovery. My hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Carrington) talked about the importance of the export-led recovery possibly shielding us against a downturn in the future. We listened to the shopping list of the hon. Member for Ashfield, but I was surprised to hear him say that the export-led economy is not helping the domestic economy. If that is the case, he certainly has not visited my constituency. The success of specialised companies there and in other parts of Leicestershire has played an important part in rejuvenating the local economy.

For example, Nelson Burgess in Hinckley, which makes massive industrial exhaust systems, has doubled its work force on the basis of export orders. Intertech has received a £31 million order from Nigeria for radio equipment. Another company which is well known to everybody, Caterpillar (UK) at Desford, has just received the Queen's award for industry for exports. That is why unemployment in my constituency is down from 4.1 per cent. to 3.8 per cent. I am very surprised that the hon. Member for Ashfield can say that exports have no bearing on the domestic economy.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East referred to the importance of training. He suggested that we were taking no notice of training, whereas my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and his Ministers have a firm policy on training. That has been an excellent area of growth in my constituency in recent months. At an award ceremony in my constituency, 12 firms received the training for excellence award.

My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury should not be put off by what is said by Opposition Members. Our policies are working. It is much more important to get right the fundamentals in the economy so that we can compete internationally in order to generate the revenue that we can spend on training rather than going to the IMF and borrowing the money, which would mean putting up interest rates and return us to the old vicious cycle.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor said that this is the best country in the European Union in which to invest, and it is, and that is because of my right hon. and learned Friend's policies. As my right hon. and learned Friend approaches his next Budget, he should address three issues. I accept that we have problems with the housing market. In Leicestershire, the problems are to be found in the middle range rather than at the bottom or the top of the market. We also need to consider the problems of the married couples' allowance. Finally, if it is a matter of income tax or interest rate reductions, I would urge my right hon. and learned Friend to reduce interest rates first.

8.56 pm

Mr. Malcolm Chisholm (Edinburgh, Leith): Opposition Members are relieved this week to get away from the irrelevant leadership escapism of the rabble on the Conservative Benches and face up to the reality that confronts our constituents—the growing inequality and insecurity that we debated on Monday, and the economic failure that underlies that which we are debating today. Even this week, I cannot give too many marks to the Chancellor for facing up to reality, because what he displayed today was a mixture of hypocrisy, brass neck and election babble, which will deceive no one in the country and possibly not even himself.

I start with the four indicators that the Government chose to highlight in the motion of which they are so proud—growth, exports, inflation and borrowing. It takes brass neck for them to boast about growth with the all-time low record of 1.7 per cent. since 1979, below that in the other G7 countries. Of course, the figure sometimes has to creep up to compensate for the recessions that the Government create, but even this year they will struggle to manage growth of 3 per cent. The manufacturing output figures released this week put that in question, as does the total failure of investment to take off in the economy.

The Government are, perhaps, proudest of exports. Again, what a nerve they have. Their record of export growth is the lowest in the European Union. The export growth that they achieved last year resulted, in fact, from the failure of their economic policy: it happened only because of devaluation. That 8 per cent. figure was just in line with the world average, as an 8 per cent. expansion of world trade took place last year. Other countries that devalued their currencies enjoyed greater export growth; the figure was 9 per cent. in Italy and 17 per cent. in Sweden.

What about borrowing? Well, if it reaches £50 billion, of course it must come down; but the significant aspect of the summer forecast is that it is revised upwards. At no point in the current economic cycle will the Government conform with the golden rule, and most commentators are now saying that there is no economic argument for tax cuts in view of that. The Chancellor, however, has said that he wants to cut taxes in time—and to him that means in time for the next election.

The Government boast about inflation. Again, most commentators question whether they will meet their inflation target. They are very proud of having lowered inflation, but again we should look at the international picture. The Government are very much in line with other countries and there are disinflationary forces in the international economy; in fact, our inflation rate is now higher than those of France, Germany, the United States and Japan. Last year, our inflation rate was 113 per cent. of the OECD average, only slightly less than the figure that obtained at the end of Labour's time in office: the figure was 122 per cent. in 1978. I do not think that the Government have too much to boast about, even in regard to inflation.

Those, of course, are the Government's chosen indicators. They ignore more worrying indicators, which have far gloomier implications for the country. The key indicator is investment, in which we come 22nd out of 24 OECD countries. The figure fell last year for the fifth successive year, and it is falling further this year. It is on that key factor that Labour's economic policy is concentrating; our analysis is based on the failure of investment, and all our prescriptions are directed primarily towards dealing with it. My hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) spoke of capacity shortages, as has the Bank of England, and others have issued the same warning. That is the problem with which we are keenest to deal when we come to power.

There are many policies that I have no time to describe, but I should like to say a little about dividends, which we are examining in our corporate tax review. The enormous increase in dividends has, however, already been highlighted by a previous Financial Secretary to the Treasury, by the Select Committee on Trade and Industry and by the Institute of Fiscal Studies. They have increased from 1.5 per cent. of gross domestic product when the Government took office to 5.4 per cent. now. That almost mirrors the decline in investment from 21 per cent. in 1979 to 17 per cent. now. More of companies' profits must be used for investment rather than dividends.

The Government chose to ignore many other indicators—for instance, the growing inequality in society. There is no trade-off between equality and economic efficiency, as many Conservative Members often argue; in fact, there is much evidence that countries where there is more equality have better economic records than "unequal" countries such as ours. Our constituents perceive that as the reality of the present Government. The Chancellor merely referred to the growing wage inequality in his usual dismissive way in trying to put down our minimum-wage policy. On Monday, the Secretary of State for Social Security said that we should conduct a pilot study for the minimum wage; but every country in Europe is "piloting" it, and many academic studies show that the Government are lying when they say that a minimum wage set at the correct rate will cause job losses.

Can the Government really justify circumstances in which a utility boss earns in one month what someone on £2.50 an hour will earn in four and a half years? What will they do about that? We know what they will do: they are introducing the jobseeker's allowance to drive low wages even lower. The problem is not just wage inequality; it is the whole regressive tax system in which the top 1 per cent. have been paid the equivalent of £300,000 in the Government's lifetime, while the bottom fifth pay tax at 39 per cent. rather than at the 31 per cent. rate that they paid in 1979.

The other great factor behind inequality—almost unmentioned by the Chancellor—is unemployment. The Government boast that the figures are falling, but we note that in the first three months of the year, employment fell too. Many people with jobs work part time. Some want to, but others do not: we are told that three quarters of a million people have part-time jobs that they do not want, which clearly increases the insecurity that many are experiencing. At some point in the past five years, 10 million people have been unemployed. That is why it is not just the poorest in society who feel a grievance against the Government.

Insecurity feeds through the whole of the middle areas of society and, of course, those sections of society are feeling the full brunt of the great tax increases—the greatest tax hike in British history. That is affecting those middle-income groups, just as it is affecting low-income groups. That is why there is today a great coalition of forces between middle-income, low-income and no-income people. That coalition took to us power 50 years ago this month, and it will take us to power as soon as the Government have the courage to call a general election. It cannot come too soon.

9.4 pm

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I add my personal warm words of welcome to my right hon. Friend the new Chief Secretary to the Treasury. I welcome him to his important duties in the Front-Bench team and extend those words to all my other right hon. and hon. Friends who are new to their Treasury responsibilities.

In dealing with their responsibilities, my right hon. and hon. Friends, like other members of Governments throughout the European Union and the advanced world, face two awkward realities when trying to steer the economy, a phrase that may be a misnomer these days in the world of global markets. As has been made clear in the debate tonight by many hon. Members, one reality is that we have not one homogeneous economy any more, but several. The second point is that no national authority, whether it is a central bank or a national Government, has any longer a monopoly of control or influence over economic conditions—if it ever had.

There are three main levers of economic policy—monetary, fiscal and supply side. Of those, the greatest room for manoeuvre available to national Government probably exists in the supply side. That should be a lesson for my right hon. Friends when taking policy forward.

In the past few years, Treasury Ministers have been steering the economy, as I rather quaintly put it, effectively. I shall give just a few figures. The corporate sector financial position has improved from deficits of about 4 per cent. of gross domestic product in 1989 and 1990 to a surplus of about 2 per cent. of GDP last year and, I think, a slightly larger surplus this year. In the personal sector, it is the same story of a healthy turnround from a deficit of 4 per cent. of disposable income in 1987-88 to a surplus of 4 per cent. in 1994.

In the public sector, I am glad to say that we are again moving in the right direction. The financial position is improving, but is still vulnerable to the triple risks of slower growth which, as everyone knows, affects tax revenues, the lack of buoyancy in revenues at all stages of the recent economic cycle, and the inevitable public spending pressures in the run-up to a general election, which I am sure thatn my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary will be well able to cope with. He must, however, be robust in dealing with those pressures because otherwise dangers will flow and we intend to inherit the consequences of our decisions.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hazel Grove (Sir T. Arnold) said in his interesting speech, the Bank of England, in testimony to the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, of which I am proud, with him, to be a member, referred to the "tale of two cities" in our economy, a phrase frequently used in this debate. It is right for our constituents to understand, even though it may be disagreeable for them, that whereas in recent years the internationally traded goods and services sector has been buoyant and highly successful, the rest of the economy has not.

No doubt exists that we must hope that the gap between those two sectors will converge, not only from the point of view of Conservative Members, because voters' subjective assessment of how the economy is going will improve if that convergence takes place. That is possible, first, because the figures on real personal disposable incomes are pointing in the right direction in relation to our constituents—this year, it is set to rise by a little over 1 per cent. and next year by more than 2 per cent.—and, secondly, because it would be economically and politically appropriate to have some judicious tax cuts in the forthcoming Budget.

It is not just a dual economy of two cities because there is a third city that one might almost call a shanty town outside the gates of the other two. It is the informal or black economy. So far it has not been mentioned in the debate, but it is important to take account of it in considering what is happening in our society. Nobody knows the precise size of that informal economy, but it is probably between 7 per cent. of GDP—that is the cautious Inland Revenue estimate—and 14 per cent. of GDP, which is an example of some of the academic estimates.

Let us take a middle figure of 10 per cent. of GDP as fair and possibly accurate. That represents £70 billion of economic activity in today's money, and it is largely outside all the formal mechanisms, the information gathering systems and, most of all, the tax system. Therefore, it becomes increasingly important for the Treasury to consider carefully the best and most intelligent ways in which any Chancellor can capture a proportion of that turnover for good public expenditure causes and other necessary Government expenses.

[Mr. Nigel Forman]

Against that background, any tax policy must not only be internationally competitive because of competition between fiscal jurisdictions—a point that I have made in previous debates—but also aim at the broadest possible tax base and the lowest possible rates, particularly on income, so as to maximise the revenue available. At the same time it must gradually shift more of the burden to taxes on expenditure and less to taxes on income and capital, as the Government have sought to do since 1979. Those broad principles should be borne in mind.

I should like to make two or three headline Budget recommendations. Because of the vagaries of the Budget timetable, this debate in July is one of the few opportunities for politicians to place such recommendations on the record. I should like to see several proposals in this year's Budget, but I do not expect the Minister to comment on them, simply to take note of them. First, we should cut the income tax burden on the large number of those who pay it, especially those on average and below average incomes. That is the priority.

Not long ago, I put down a parliamentary question which clearly shows that to make the 20p band of income tax the highest marginal rate for half of all taxpayers would cost about £4.3 billion in today's money, which is just over 0.5 per cent. of GDP. That is not an excessive sum, and it is well within the bounds of what could be prudently afforded by the Chancellor in November.

Secondly, on the expenditure side it is important especially to target any improvements that we can afford on the elderly, on those on the state pension who need help most. The way to do that would be to focus it on those born before a set date. I am trying to direct help to those who are over, say, the age of 75 and who, according to all the indicators, have some of the greatest social and personal needs.

Few of those who were born before 28 November 1920 have occupational pensions. Help would lift some of them out of income support, and that would be a countervailing saving on the other side of the account. By definition, that form of help would be a declining public expenditure commitment. I do not need to spell out why that is so, because it is fairly obvious. A deserving cause could be targeted and it would not take public expenditure out of control.

In the interests of brevity, I shall come to my third and final recommendation. The time has come to introduce a comprehensive tax incentive for personal savings. Many of my colleagues have been advocating such ideas from various quarters. Let us call it PIP—short for personal investment plan. It should be self-certified and there should be stiff penalties to deter potential abuse. It should be available to be offset against all forms of personal savings and investment up to a figure of let us say £10,000 per year per person. So it should be more generous than the existing structure of PEPs, but for the very good reason that it would cover all forms of savings instruments.

It would have great advantages for the investment problem, which has been one of the main themes of the debate. If we could achieve an increase in aggregate investment, it would be a great triumph for this country. It could also be used by people to invest in their own future: in their education and training, their professional updating, refreshment of their skills, and so on.

That would all be to the good and would meet both a social and an economic need. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary will bear those points in mind as they move towards this year's Budget.

9.15 pm

Mr. Stephen Timms (Newham, North-East): I have only a few minutes and I want to make only one point, picking up from where the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) left off. We face a crisis of inadequate investment in Britain, which the Government have failed to resolve. That has been the Government's central economic failure in the past 16 years.

We are a long way from seeing the investment-led recovery that will lead to sustainable growth in Britain. We face a crisis of investment and, therefore, a desperate lack of the underpinning that we need to transform our economy for the new century. In the years since 1979—some hon. Members have referred to this already—the average level of investment as a share of gross domestic product in this country has been 17 per cent. That has put us 22nd out of the 24 nations of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. We have the worst level of investment of the countries in the European Union and the G7. It is no surprise, therefore, that over the same period we have had the worst economic performance. Our economy has grown at an average of 1.6 per cent. since 1979—the worst of the G7 countries.

Recent evidence shows that our economy is still in a bad state. The Government told us in the Budget that investment would grow by 10.75 per cent. in 1995. Now we are told that it will be 4.75 per cent. In the first quarter of this year the level of investment fell. In March, the Confederation of British Industry told that its survey of investment intentions revealed that companies were increasingly cutting their investment plans in the face of inflationary pressures and the fears of higher interest rates.

The truth is that sustainable growth remains as elusive as ever. Inflationary problems are recurring, while in my constituency 21.7 per cent. of men in the labour market are out of work and there is no confidence anywhere that the position will get better. Nations such as ours that fail to invest have poor economic performance. Until we can tackle that problem and the investment gap, Britain will continue to slide out of the economic and social first division.

I wanted to say a little more about two areas of failure that say a great deal about the problems in our economy. I do not have the time to do that, but I shall just mention them in passing. The first is our lamentable record in research and development. A desperately small percentage of our GDP is spent on that, and the Government have done nothing to put it right. That augurs ill for the future.

The second area is very different, but says a great deal about the Government's failure to manage the economy in recent years. It is the saga of the channel tunnel rail link, in which I have a constituency interest. Eight years after work began on it, even this morning fundamental questions were being raised about whether the funding for it can ever be achieved. That saga poses searching questions about the Government's management of the economy and the abject failure to deliver key investment projects that should be central to our economic development and which we need if we are to be a successful economy in the new millennium. There is no sign of those projects being put together successfully.

I want to quote a short point made in the recent Rowntree report, which described the problems of inequality in Britain. We should remember that a broad cross-section of people contributed to that report and worked on the team that put it together. It concluded:

"Addressing growing inequality will require investment of resources which could otherwise go into current consumption."

The resources may come

"from taxation, reductions elsewhere in public spending, greater spending by companies on training and investment, or by greater individual payments . . . But if we fail to make this investment, the costs we shall have to face and consumption we shall have to forgo in the future will be greater."

That is a stern warning and one that the Government must heed. If this Government do not, the next Labour Government most certainly will.

9.20 pm

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): I welcome the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and his Front-Bench colleagues to their new positions. If I understand rightly from the place in which she is sitting, congratulations are also due to the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) on being appointed as a parliamentary private secretary. I hope that I have not just appointed her to that position. I see that I have not.

I am sure that the Chief Secretary is well aware that he takes over at a time when the downward revision of economic prospects that we have heard so much about in this debate, taken with the pre-election pressures for huge tax cuts and the Prime Minister's new £11 billion spending pledges, will make his job especially difficult.

We heard today a good example of what the right hon. Gentleman is up against. It is clear from the debate that there is a huge split between the Prime Minister and the Chancellor over the Prime Minister's commitment to abolish capital gains tax and inheritance tax—something which the Chancellor told us earlier was too ambitious. I challenge the Chief Secretary to tell us when he winds up whether it is Government policy to abolish capital gains tax and inheritance tax. There are big spending implications in that, which were added to by other aspirations expressed by Conservative Members—not least by the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman), who must have spent several billion pounds more in the few minutes he had to speak.

The new Chief Secretary will have to square the Chancellor's stated aspiration, to drive public spending below 40 per cent. of GDP, with his own previous speeches, which suggested that the Government would find it difficult to get it any lower. As Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, he told the Institute of Directors:

"The advocates of a return to pre-Modern minimalist Government are whistling in the wind. In any modern democracy, the government is always going to direct"—

"direct" was the word he used—

"around 40 per cent. of the national wealth."

The debate has been interesting, if somewhat staccato with the number of contributions. I have a number of questions that arise from the debate to which I shall come later and which I specifically want to address to the Chief Secretary. First, I want to underline the point made by my hon. Friends the Members for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) and for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) and others, by saying how worrying it is that nearly all the key changes in the summer forecast compared with the autumn Red Book and Budget statement have been changes for the worse.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mrs. Liddell) said, no explanation is provided. We should be given one tonight. We know that forecasting is a precarious business—all those uncertainties multiplied together and all those small differences between large numbers. We must expect some variation. In so far as we have heard a Government explanation today, this is all there is to it: we should not worry about the summer forecast—things are pretty much all right, with only a few small differences here and there; the economy is basically on a sound footing.

For the sake of the country and for my party if we win the general election, I would like to think that the economy is on a sound footing. However, when one examines the story, judged against the evidence, one sees that it is far too complacent and self-serving. It presents a flawed analysis of what is going on in the country and reveals a poverty of ambition for what Britain can and must accomplish.

For the key indicators—investment, growth, inflation and the state of the public finances—to look so much worse than just last autumn should disturb the Conservatives every bit as much as it disturbs us. Indeed, one or two Conservative Back Benchers—the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg), for example—came close to recognising that.

The Government cannot escape the fact that the arithmetically small differences to which they point are proportionally very large. The summer forecast shows growth in the current year now expected to be down by nearly a tenth as compared with the Budget forecast; inflation to be higher by nearly 20 per cent. proportionately; the PSBR to be higher by 10 per cent.; and business investment to increase by less than half as much as the Government were expecting just eight months ago.

They are not the statistics of a successful economic policy. They are, as my hon. Friends have pointed out, another episode in the Government's persistent failure to modernise the economy in such a way that we achieve genuinely sustainable non-inflationary growth. That is clear from the summer forecast figures. Whereas last autumn they were predicting growth higher than inflation, they are now pointing to fourth quarter inflation higher than the volume level of growth.

Despite welcome falls in the unemployment claimant count, the summer forecast concedes that the rise in employment has been very much less. It puts that down to the expansion of further and higher education and increases in early retirement and in the number of people claiming invalidity and sickness benefits. On page 25, the forecast states:

"Unemployment therefore seems unlikely to go on falling faster than employment is rising."

That begs the crucial question whether the Government believe that the gap will be narrowed in future by unemployment falling more slowly or by employment rising more quickly.

[Mr. Andrew Smith]

The first specific question that I direct to the Chief Secretary is, given the assertion in the summer forecast, does he now expect unemployment to fall more slowly or employment to increase more rapidly? We need to know, because it makes an awful lot of difference to the unemployed and to the social and economic cost to our whole community of that unemployment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Cunningham) spoke with passion about the unemployed in his constituency, as did other hon. Friends about unemployment in theirs. For this country still to have 836,000 people trapped in long-term unemployment and 619,000 young people without jobs is an obscenity that demands the urgent programme for jobs for which Labour has called, measures to stimulate the recruitment of the long-term unemployed and action to make it easier for people to move from welfare to work.

Equally worrying is Britain's position on investment, especially coming on top of the Government's poor historic record. Total investment in 1994 was still 10 per cent. below the level in 1989, before the recession, and investment as a proportion of GDP fell six years in a row, from 23 per cent. in 1989 to 17 per cent. last year. Given that record, to have to revise downwards, as the summer forecast does, predicted investment growth by more than a half—from 10.75 per cent. to 4.75 per cent., is an indictment not only of the Government's forecasting ability but of what they are doing to the real economy.

Of course, business investment has always proved to be one of the most difficult things to forecast. It is all very well to suppose that the fall in manufacturing investment that we witnessed in the first quarter of this year was, as the summer forecast put it, "erratic", but the forecast does not explain that deteriorating investment outlook. The country deserves an explanation. The second key question that I would like to direct to the Chief Secretary is this: will he tell the House why investment prospects are now so much worse than the Government claimed at the time of the Budget?

My hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) made a passionate case for investment in manufacturing on behalf of the steel and aircraft industries in his constituency. It is clearer than ever before that Britain needs the strategy for investment that Labour has set out—

Mr. Budgen: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: In a moment.

Britain needs greater incentives for long-term finance, more opportunities for small business to access capital and incentives for investment in skills, infrastructure and transferable technology. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Timms) said, we need to get research and development moving in this country if we are to confront the global competitive challenges.

Mr. Budgen: The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) did not just talk about investment in manufacturing, but made a specific request for grants for the aerospace industry. Is the Labour party in favour of that?

Mr. Smith: We are in favour of an industrial policy that rebuilds the strength of industries undermined by the Government's persistent mismanagement of this country's economy. We are in favour of getting industry moving through a partnership between Government and people and through training to raise the level of skills in our work force, to give people, like my hon. Friend's constituents, the opportunities which they have been denied under this Government and which they know that they can never expect from this Government.

The Government's record on investment is particularly serious given the evidence of high-capacity utilisation—at least in manufacturing industry—to the point where it is generally agreed that the output gap has significantly narrowed, which the summer forecast recognised. Indeed, some analysts believe that the gap may have disappeared altogether. That can only lend further weight to the point made by the Bank of England in its May inflation report, which was stressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn). It said:

"capacity utilisation in manufacturing"—

in the first quarter of 1995—

"was at its highest level for almost six years, at about 18 percentage points above its long-run average".

That underlined the warning in the February report:

"Capacity constraints are becoming more widespread in industry . . . This will increase inflationary risks unless productive capacity increases".

That bears out Labour's argument, as several of my hon. Friends have pointed out, that the shortage of capacity—the failure to invest in plant, skills and infrastructure—limits Britain's growth and causes inflationary pressures to emerge even when there are more than 2 million people unemployed, consumer confidence and demand are very flat and, as some Conservative Members have pointed out, the construction industry has yet to struggle out of recession.

The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) referred to the difficulties facing the construction industry and drew attention to the benefits of implementation of the Latham report. He should ask his right hon. and hon. Friends in government when they will find the time to implement the legislative provisions of that report.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) was characteristically wise when he drew the attention of the House to the danger of failing to take account of acting on the depreciation and degeneration of our public capital. People will ask why, given the state of Britain's infrastructure, with its rundown housing and transport systems, the Government are now proposing to cut public investment even further.

My third specific question for the Chief Secretary, if he will listen for a moment, is this: why, according to the summer forecast, is public investment in 1996 set to fall by 8½ per cent.—nearly twice the 4.5 per cent. cut that the Government put forward in the Red Book in the autumn?

Mr. Legg: If, as the hon. Gentleman believes, public investment should increase—that is the case that he and his hon. Friends are putting forward—how high is he prepared to see the public sector borrowing requirement go?

Mr. Smith: We want to cut the PSBR by getting people back to work. That is the way to cut borrowing in this country.

When we survey the state of the economy, we see that the Chancellor is in a difficult dilemma of his own making. Because of the underlying limits to productive capacity, he faces growth high enough to generate inflationary pressures above his target level but not high enough to lessen insecurity at work, to generate sufficient extra employment, or even to bring in tax revenues or to make people better off.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman's response to the dilemma is to go for greater short-term flexibility by loosening the targets that he has set himself on inflation and the public finances. In that way, he hopes to gain extra room for manoeuvre on both the monetary and the fiscal sides in the run-up to the general election.

The Chancellor now says that inflation will be between 1 and 4 per cent. most of the time, when previously—[Interruption.] I have here a letter signed by the Chancellor and addressed to the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Sir T. Arnold), the Chairman of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee, which says:

"But setting interest rates consistently at the level judged necessary to achieve the inflation target of 2½ per cent. or less should ensure that inflation remains in the range 1-4 per cent. most of the time."

It is no good the Chancellor saying that he did not say "most of the time", because he signed the letter.

Not only has the right hon. and learned Gentleman loosened his words there, but he now talks about bringing the public sector borrowing requirement back towards balance, whereas he used to say that it was his goal to achieve balance. In effect, he is admitting that his policy may be loosened in the pre-election period.

This is my fourth specific question to the Chief Secretary to the Treasury—

Mr. Stephen: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Smith: No.

If the Chancellor is not loosening his policy, why is he loosening his language? The public finances, another critical area in which the Government—

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Gentleman's textual analysis is utterly ludicrous. The inflation target is 2.5 per cent. or lower. I said that we were moving towards balance in the medium term in the 1993 Red Book. It is absurd textual analysis to use a difference of one word between that and the 1994 Red Book. There has been a totally consistent policy. What is Labour's policy on public sector borrowing? What is Labour's policy on inflation targets? We have listened for another half an hour and still we have not heard a word of serious economic policy.

Mr. Smith: The Chancellor of the Exchequer is obviously in a serious difficulty that he cannot get out of. He could not tell my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) earlier which of his various targets he was following in practice—whether it was the 2.5 per cent. that he told the Governor about, the 3 per cent. that he said in an interview would be a triumph, the 1 per cent. to 4 per cent. range that he tells the public about, or the "most of the time, but we might go over 4 per cent." to which he put his name when he signed that letter. The Government's policy is in chaos.

Not only is the PSBR now projected to be higher than the Government expected at the time of the Budget, but their own panel of independent forecasters has said that it will be 25 per cent. higher than they admit even now. That prompts my fifth question to the Chief Secretary. Does he regard the £16.1 billion in the summer forecast for 1996-97 as an acceptable level for the PSBR? Is it now a target for that year?

Sir Peter Hordern rose—

Mr. Smith: No, I am running out of time.

When does the Chief Secretary expect the public finances to reach balance? Let us have a date. The Chancellor would not give us one earlier.

The right hon. Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) invited us earlier to consider what had happened to business taxation. I have news for Conservative Members about that. Not only have the Government clobbered individuals by breaking all their promises on tax and banging on that extra £800 a year from which people are suffering even now, but they have taken more tax from companies as well.

Figures from the Library show that the average share of company income taken by the Conservative Government during their years in office, in corporation tax and other taxes, is 15 per cent., compared with 11 per cent. for the years of the previous Labour Government. In 1994, the Government took 13 per cent. of company income, compared with 11 per cent. in Labour's last year in office.

We were invited by the hon. Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Deva) to contrast the values and policies of the Conservative and Labour parties. I can tell the House that the choice before the country and the House is clear. The Conservative party breaks its promises on tax cutting and living standards, fails to invest for the future and leaves our productive capacity too small to generate the welfare that people need. The Government have divided the country, trapped millions in poverty and hit middle and lower-income Britain while they have failed to act to end excesses in the privatised utilities. The Government have surrendered their responsibilities to an unregulated market.

The Labour party stands for investment in people, industry and infrastructure, and wants to open up opportunities to enable everyone to make the most of their potential. We say that fairness is crucial to enable people to get on and to get the people of Britain pulling together for economic success. I remind Conservative Members of something that the country will not forget—that it was Labour who defeated the Government over the increase of VAT on fuel, while it was the Prime Minister, the Chancellor and the Conservative party who wanted to force through that unfair tax, just as they will extend VAT again if they have the chance.

The choice is between the parties, but which one can the public trust? The public can never trust the Conservatives again. Government Members have said, "No change is no chance." Labour will bring change and a new future for Britain, and I commend our amendment to the House.

9.41 pm

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. William Waldegrave): These economic debates are very different from debates on agriculture. They are much more fun, I have to say. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor will not find it offensive if I say that I found certain similarities between his speech and that of his shadow, the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). They are both substantial figures who delivered speeches full of jokes. The only difference was that my right hon. and learned Friend had some substance between his jokes, while the hon. Gentleman just had jokes. They were good jokes, but there was no substance in his speech at all.

We did learn one or two things. The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) said that he would have liked interest rates to be higher, and that was helpful. I think that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East really wanted interest rates to be higher, too. He shifted around a bit, but the tenor of what he was saying in his debate with my right hon. and learned Friend about the Governor of the Bank of England suggested that the hon. Gentleman would have put interest rates up.

There was also an announcement from the hon. Member for Dunfirmline, East of at least one new tax on business, for training. That is very admirable, and it is better that the hon. Gentleman should put that new tax forward firmly. It may be a good thing if he puts it forward and votes for it.

The problem for the Opposition today is a problem that I remember the late, great Keith Joseph explaining to me a long time ago when we were in opposition. He said that it was a miserable business being in opposition when the news is good—not that the news ever was good between 1974 and 1979—and added, "You have to emphasise as much as you can everything that is wrong."

The hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) played some wonderful games with percentages, and stated that a revision from 3.25 per cent. down to 3 per cent. was a great disaster. My goodness, Labour would have been pleased with figures such as those when they had inflation of nearly 27 per cent. It reminds me of Oxford city council, which is run by the partisans of the hon. Member for Bristol, South (Ms Primarolo). It wanted to put up a barrier to stop shoppers crossing a road because the number of road accidents had doubled. I asked how many casualties there had been and was told two—there had been one the year before. One can do things like that with percentages, and the hon. Member for Oxford, East was doing it, but it was not very effective.

Mr. Stephen: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall give way just once, as the hon. Member for Oxford, East did not keep to the agreement on time.

Mr. Stephen: I am much obliged to my right hon. Friend. When he reads Hansard tomorrow, he will see that the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) took almost 22 minutes to wind up the debate, in the course of which he made one carping criticism after another of the Government, regaled us with figures of which we are all well aware and, apart from a few generalisations to which we can all say amen, gave no sign whatever of Labour's policy. Is the government of this country to be entrusted to a party whose economic policies are so incredible that it will not even state publicly what they are?

Mr. Waldegrave: In coming to these debates, I have learnt that there is no hope from Opposition speeches or papers on their position. One always hopes that an Opposition will give ideas that one can pinch and claim as one's own, and then say what admirable new ideas one has had. There is no chance of that from the Labour party. Alternatively, one can look at their ideas and rebut them because they are wrong. There is no chance of that either, because no ideas are forthcoming. It is inconvenient of them and I do not think that they are earning their pay on this matter.

The hon. Members for Dunfermline, East and for Oxford, East raised one important matter. They tried to manufacture confusion about our inflation target. There is no confusion about our inflation target, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hazel Grove (Sir T. Arnold) said, and he understood it very well.

Surprisingly, the hon. Member for Gordon tried to contribute to that confusion. He of all people should know that there is no confusion, because he put a question to the Governor of the Bank of England when the Governor came to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee. He asked the Governor whether the Government had relaxed their inflation target and the Governor said, "No, I think that that is absolute rubbish." So it seems odd that the hon. Gentleman did not listen to the answer, and neither did the Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen.

Let me give an example of what my right hon. and learned Friend means. Let us say that the last Labour Government had inflation moving between 7 per cent. and 27 per cent. If their target had been consistent with that, they would have said, "We shall set a target at 17 per cent. or downwards" and that is exactly what they would have achieved—an average of 16 per cent. inflation in that period. So the arithmetic is really quite simple.

In an eloquent speech, my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) made the fundamental point that a long-term commitment to low inflation is what produces investment, rather than clever tricks or, Lord help us, state direction. A long-term commitment to low inflation changes the culture of investment and produces long-term investments. Sustained, healthy economic growth at a strong rate, which is what we have now—stronger than any other European country—will become a permanent feature of the landscape only if we keep inflation down and achieve those long-term investments.

Many hon. Members on both sides of the House welcome the fact that the recovery has been led by exports. That is surely to be welcomed. Every Government since the second world war have sought to achieve that, but this is genuinely the first time that a recovery has been export led. Exports have risen by more than 9 per cent. compared with a year ago. My hon. Friends the Members for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) and for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick) made that point eloquently.

Although manufacturing investment has risen in the past year, obviously we want it to increase further. The framework for that seems to be in place because investment is ultimately caused by profitability. The Opposition, even new Labour, are pretty uncomfortable with profits in private sector companies. They do not really like them. They nearly always describe profits as excessive and conduct a sort of vendetta against companies that make large profits. The fact that profitability has now returned to its highest since 1988 and is higher than at any time in the 1970s is a good indicator that we shall get that investment in the future.

The hon. Member for Monklands, East (Mrs. Liddell) made an uncharacteristically unfair point about inward investment. She complained that we were not obtaining enough inward investment.

I do not know what figures the hon. Lady can have been reading. We have about a third of all inward investment into the European Union and 40 per cent. of the United States and Japanese investment into the European Union, and a recent Confederation of British Industry survey showed us as being the second favourite destination of mobile investment in the world, after the United States.

Therefore, it was a little unfair of the hon. Lady to make that criticism, and she well knows that Scotland has rightly been a great beneficiary of that inward investment, with a good work force and plenty of good opportunities for investment. That leads to the creation of jobs, not only in Scotland but throughout the United Kingdom.

As many Opposition Members and all Conservative Members who spoke have said, we are talking about the creation of long-term stable jobs in the only way possible—660,000 new jobs in the past two and a half years and, on either measure, unemployment has decreased during that time. Let us hope that that continues.

Living standards are now increasing after inflation and tax. Real personal disposal income is expected to increase by about 1.5 per cent. this year, and that should mean an extra £5 a week for households on average. We expect to keep that going next year and beyond.

Unjustifiably, several Opposition Members accused my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of complacency. One person, the hon. Member for Oxford, East, accused him of loose language. My right hon. and learned Friend could never be accused of any manner of loose language, and he certainly could not be accused of complacency.

If we are to be accused of complacency, let us stand, not on our forecast, which we believe, but on the forecasts of outside organisations. The hon. Member for Oxford, East, who is learned in those matters, will have studied those forecasts and he will know that our forecast lies about in the middle of the range of forecasts by outside organisations. Therefore, by saying that that pattern is likely to come about in the next year and the next year or two we are not being complacent; we are simply predicting what is the best advice that can be given to us from inside and from outside.

The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, for example, expects the United Kingdom economy to grow faster than any other major European country again this year. That is not complacency; it is a fact of which we should be proud, and which we should take the necessary steps to maintain in future.

Many of my hon. Friends mentioned the subject that dominates my mind, and will dominate my mind while I hold this job, which I am delighted to hold—public spending.

As I take on what is a crucial job in Government, described to me by Leon Brittan as the most fascinating job in Government, it is legitimate for my hon. Friends to ask me, in the phraseology of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen), what my prejudice or instinct is.

I have sometimes been described as a one-nation Tory or, if one wants to be offensive, a wet Tory—the type of person who admires Rab Butler and people of that kind. I do admire Rab Butler; I plead guilty to admiring Rab Butler.

Let me remind the House what Rab Butler did when he was one of the most distinguished holders of my right hon. and learned Friend's office—he was also Deputy Prime Minister—and in that great office he reduced Government spending from 37.75 per cent. of gross domestic product to 33.5 per cent. of GDP between 1952 and 1955. If that is being a Tory wet, I could probably bring my right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) and my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) with me. My hon. Friend would put up with wetness of that type, I believe, if we reduced public spending to 33.5 per cent. of GDP.

I do not believe that I shall be able to do that, but I believe that I shall have to work, and shall work, extremely hard to continue the Government's commitment to bringing down the proportion of public spending in GDP. That will be the principal target of my efforts and of the efforts of the Treasury in the next spending round.

I believe that that is something that unites all Conservative Members. It is one of the things that fundamentally divide us from the Labour party. The Labour party will not give us targets and so on. It is uncomfortable with that because, as we decrease the percentage of GDP that is spent by the public sector, it will find it more and more difficult not to give an answer. Labour Members will make the debating points that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East has made—"You just put it up." Yes, it did go up in the recession, but we shall bring it down to the point where the hon. Gentleman must, in the end, be smoked out into agreeing with us, or he will be shown to believe in nothing.

The two most eloquent speeches today were made by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) and by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West. The right hon. Member for Chesterfield raised the tone of the debate by offering a real and philosophically coherent alternative. The conventions of the House do not permit me to refer to an amendment that was not chosen, but the right hon. Member's speech reminds us that, although Labour Members tease us about the divisions in our party, the divisions in the Labour party are much deeper, because they are based on a complete difference in philosophy.

The amendment appearing in the name of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield contains a reference to the philosophy of Her Majesty's Government—a belief in markets and so on. I think that that is what used to be called code; he was really referring to Her Majesty's loyal Opposition. It must hurt the right hon. Gentleman that the Labour Front Bench now professes a commitment to market economics which must be anathema to him and to his colleagues who signed the amendment.

[Mr. Waldegrave]

Are they trying to tell us something? Are we to assume that Labour Members have become pink Conservatives after all? My right hon. Friend—I beg his pardon: he should be right hon.—the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West said that we should not allow the country to be fooled by that. [Interruption.] My colleagues on the Front Bench are saying, "Steady on." My hon. Friend made his point very eloquently.

What are the gut feelings of Labour Members about those matters? I do not believe that they have become pink Conservatives; I believe that they have listened to the PR men and the pollsters, and they do not think that they will be elected if they allow their true colours to show. I believe fundamentally—it is obvious from every debate in this place and in our constituencies and from the hon. Member for Bristol, South (Ms Corston), who is a redoubtable fighter for socialism but who is very quiet nowadays—that Labour Members believe in higher spending and higher taxing. If they do not believe in that, they do not believe in anything.

Mr. Andrew Smith: Will the Chief Secretary tell the House whether it is Government policy to abolish capital gains tax and inheritance tax?

Mr. Waldegrave: That is a nice easy question to answer: yes. When we can afford to do it, we shall do it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West should be interested in my next point. Labour Members' commitment to a belief in market economics does not go as far as believing in rewarding the winners in a market system. We believe that the abolition of those taxes will make capital markets work better so that everyone will be better off. Labour Members cannot stomach that, so they fall off the train. At that stage, they do the populist bit and say, "It's going to make some people richer, so we're against it."

That is also their reaction to privatisation. We did not hear anything about the fact that the privatised industries now contribute £55 million a week to the Exchequer, when they cost £50 million a week when they were left to us by Labour. We hear only persistent attacks on a few individuals whom Labour Members allege are overpaid. They go for the cheap populist vote in order to disguise the fact that they have no belief in privatisation.

My hon. Friend's point was eloquently reinforced by a number of Labour Members, a few of whom referred to more spending. They have been house trained to the point where they do not state any figures; they have been told to disguise the fact that their spending pledges are real. That is what so offends the honest socialists on the Opposition Benches who want to spend money and who believe in spending money. That is what so offended the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley). He recently wrote in The Guardian newspaper that Labour now has a clear choice: it can be either the party of high taxation and proud of it, or the party of higher taxes which it is ashamed to describe.

The Labour party has now become the party that is ashamed to mention its own name—the party that dare not speak its name. It is really the party of high spending and high taxation, but it will not be brave enough to say so.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the publication of the Government's latest forecast, which shows growth continuing at a steady and sustainable rate, inflation remaining low, exports rising and Government borrowing falling; and recognises that this favourable outlook for the economy is a result of the Government's firm commitment to the healthy and sustainable recovery of a modern and competitive industrial economy.

Immigration Service (Hackney Council)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Wells.]

10.30 pm

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): Hackney has had its share of troubles in the past, but in recent years it has become a well-managed council, which attracts large amounts of Government money. It has more than 11,000 employees, the overwhelming majority of whom are loyal and hard-working public servants.

When there is fraud, Hackney tries to root it out seriously. Since 1990, 110 council staff have been sacked or have left when disciplinary action loomed. The council has helped the police successfully to prosecute 24 of those. The council's approach to combating fraud has been praised by the district auditor for four years, and by the police, with whom the council has an excellent relationship. It co-operated with outside bodies, but only within the rule of law. That is where the trouble starts—operations outside the rule of law.

The council was shocked to discover that, earlier this year, a Ms Jill Arnfield of the immigration and nationality department of the immigration service had in her possession a list of 600 Hackney council employees. The information was not supplied by Hackney council but was removed without authorisation from the council's payroll records. Ms Arnfield used the stolen list to run systematic checks on people of whom there was no suspicion of wrongdoing. She then passed the list to a Ms Jenny Gray of the Benefits Agency to run further blanket checks.

When Ms Arnfield handed over the list, she said, according to Jenny Gray, that she had got it officially from Hackney council. That was a lie. She asked Jenny Gray not to tell her line manager that she had the list. However, Jenny Gray told a David Carroll, her line manager, who reported the matter to Hackney council.

The list contained 600 African names, and gave their payroll numbers and their start and leaving dates. It is clear as clear can be from the list—I have here one of the pages from that list—that it has come off a computer, and that its use was in breach of the Data Protection Act 1984. It is my belief that the IND has colluded in a criminal act and has been an accessory after the fact of a crime, which in itself is a crime.

It is clear that whoever supplied the information to the IND did so with the sole aim of encouraging it to investigate all of Hackney council's African employees. That is a gross and despicable violation of the civil liberties of the individuals concerned. They should be investigated only where the IND has grounds for reasonable suspicion against them as individuals, and not because their name appears on a general list. It is a nasty form of racism, which has caused deep offence in Hackney council.

One remembers that, in Germany in the inter-war years, the secret police checked up on Jews merely by virtue of the fact that they were Jews. In Hackney in 1995, a secret police has been checking up on Africans who work for Hackney council merely by virtue of the fact that they are of African descent.

On 10 March, Robert Barr, the assistant chief finance officer, met members of the Immigration and Nationality Department to complain. His confidential minute of the same date records:

"Following the revelation of the list of names the IND officers appeared to be very uncomfortable."

The meeting came to an abrupt end. Now, two Government Departments are refusing to co-operate in an inquiry into crime and one of them—bizarrely—is the Home Office, which is responsible for law and order.

On 11 May 1995, David Wilson, a Home Office official from the IND, wrote to Hackney council:

"On balance we feel that it would be inappropriate for Ms Arnfield to be drawn into your enquiry and that she should not be directly interviewed as part of your investigation. However, should you wish to direct any written enquiries to me at the above address, we will do our best to provide you with answers."

That is a slippery way out of a difficult situation.

On 2 June 1995, P. Gisbey from the Benefits Agency wrote to Hackney council saying:

"In your letter you asked to the Agency's agreement for our officer, . . . Jenny Gray, to be interviewed by you concerning this matter. I have sought advice from our Personnel Command concerning this, and they inform me that it would be inappropriate for this to happen unless it were part of court proceedings and a subpoena issued."

I am a barrister, but perhaps the Minister can tell me and the House how there can be court proceedings and a subpoena issued when the chief witness in the case will not make a statement to the people inquiring into the case—wrap your mind around that, Minister.

I seek three assurances from the Minister. First, will he assure me that Ms Arnfield will co-operate with the inquiry that has now been set up by the Data Protection Registrar, Elizabeth France; secondly, that Ms Arnfield will, with the Home Office's permission, co-operate with any police inquiry; and thirdly, that there will be no issue of public immunity certificates or other devices to protect the staff of the IND?

Moreover, we are not dealing with only one list—there have been others. I have here a copy of a letter dated 17 February 1995 and signed by a Mr. Barrett, assistant director of the IND of the immigration service. It states:

"It is not possible at this stage for my staff to recall which member of Hackney Council's Tenancy Audit Team asked for the checks to be carried out about 18 months ago and I understand that none of the lists"— in the plural—

"were retained after the checks were completed."

Perhaps the Minister will tell us about the other lists of people being investigated.

Shortly before the story broke in The Observer, a journalist went to see Hackney's disgraced and sacked director of housing, Mr. Bernard Crofton, because it was his tenancy audit team and he who had released the information. Mr. Crofton admitted to the journalist that he personally had supplied a list of 300 Hackney council employees to the IND.

He then made the following bizarre suggestion about the list of the 600 African names: he said that Robert Barr, the assistant chief finance officer, had made available to the Benefits Agency details of all 11,000 of Hackney council's employees, that the Benefits Agency had passed them to the IND, and that the IND had then extracted the 600 African names and passed the list back to the Benefits Agency. It is a wonderful story, but it is wholly untrue.

The House will remember that it was Mr. Robert Barr who, on 10 March, went to the Home Office to complain about the original list, but he is now being accused of being the person who provided it. Thanks to me, it is being made known to Mr. Barr what Mr. Crofton has said. If Mr. Crofton makes a statement in public, he will receive a libel writ. However, Mr. Crofton seems to have dropped this particular potty story and gone in another direction.

We have been able to catch Mr. Crofton out in this particular case because he could not have known that I would be told by the journalist exactly what he said. I can hear daft mutterings from above me even as I speak.

A couple of weeks ago, I was going through a long list of documents, and suddenly I was gobsmacked. I found that the suspended director of housing had had a meeting with the Immigration and Nationality Department on 31 October 1994. I wondered why. The Under-Secretary of State who is to reply to this debate, said in answer to my question:

"Following the suspension of Mr. Crofton from his post of director of housing at Hackney council, Mr. Ostler"— the head of the tenancy audit team—

"sought a meeting."—[Official Report, 3 July 1995; Vol. 263, c. 27.]

I can tell the Minister that his answer is not true. How can I be certain that his answer is not true? It is because I have a letter from Mr. Barrett, the assistant director of the IND, written to the chief executive of Hackney council, dated 20 December 1994, which says:

"Turning to the meeting on the 31 October at Becket House, I understand"— presumably referring to the civil servant who briefed the Minister on his untrue answer—

"that this was arranged at Mr. Crofton's request and was purely a general discussion, with no record of the meeting having taken place."

We have to give accurate answers to parliamentary questions, yet the Home Office civil servant tells me in this letter that we have been given an inaccurate answer. No doubt the Minister will wish to make a statement on that tomorrow.

The plot thickens, because Mr. Crofton has a third account of this meeting. He issued a press release, or a press release was issued on his behalf, last week, which said:

"However, the facts are that the Home Office requested the meeting because of its concerns about publicity following Mr. Crofton's suspension by Hackney council."

First Mr. Ostler was supposed to have sought a meeting, then Mr. Crofton, and then the Home Office.

I discovered over the weekend that, when Mr. Crofton was questioned about the matter, he said that he was telephoned by the immigration service at his home—when he was suspended—and told about the meeting. What a wonderful intimate relationship! The suspended director of housing on Hackney council was telephoned at his home for a meeting of which no minute was taken.

Mr. Crofton goes on:

"The meeting was informal but not secret or unauthorised. Mr. Crofton informed former Chief Executive, Jerry White, of the meeting, and also submitted correspondence to a Council committee confirming the discussion which took place at the meeting."

That is fine—a perfectly rational explanation. Mr. Crofton is in the clear. The only problem is that, when one cross-checks the document and talks to the witnesses, one discovers a web, a tissue, of lies. Every statement that I have just read out is a blatant and deliberate lie.

[Mr. Brian Sedgemore]

The chief executive that we are talking about is now a local government ombudsman—not somebody that one can slag off with impunity. He has confirmed to me that he knew nothing about this meeting, it was totally unauthorised, and he found out about it three weeks later via a third person who refused to attend the meeting precisely because Mr. Crofton was unauthorised and should not have attended the meeting. As for that nonsense about Mr. Crofton reporting it to a committee, Mr. Crofton simply had to report it to the disciplinary panel that was hearing his case. This is the close and intimate friend of the Home Office who is trampling on the civil rights of Hackney's workers.

Then, as if that is not enough for the Minister to answer, the Immigration and Nationality Department has run a dirty tricks campaign, leaking information and misinformation to various journalists supplied by—guess who? First, there is the case of Tim Kelsey of The Independent. He leaked some stuff which was given to him by the IND, and there was a row over whether he should say that the investigation was understood to be based on evidence produced by Bernard Crofton. But Mr. Kelsey stuck to his guns and put it in the paper, and that upset Mr. Crofton.

Then, there was a most recent case. One journalist was given the names of two teachers by the IND and told that they were going to be picked up and deported before their interview with the asylum section on 31 May 1995. There are people in this country who believe that it is not natural justice for the IND to announce that somebody is going to be deported before they have even had their hearing. That does not sound right to me, as a barrister.

The journalist insists that the story, which appeared in the Daily Mail, came from the Home Office. The Home Office does not want to comment on it. The Minister gave me some facts in a parliamentary answer, but I read about them in The Guardian the day before the Minister gave them to me. They had been leaked by the Immigration and Nationality Department.

I could name case after case in which, for whatever reason, the department has sought to destroy the reputation of Hackney council in a disgraceful fashion. Why did someone in Hackney housing department appear to be an arm of the Immigration and Nationality Department? I shall tell you why, Madam Deputy Speaker.

There have been two small groups that constitute two little secret police forces. One—the tenancy audit team, led by Mr. Crofton—comes from Hackney council. Those people have gone potty. If I were to sum up Mr. Crofton, I should say that he is a highly sophisticated liar, that he is deluded, and that, using words in their ordinary and natural meaning, he is a racist. Secondly, for whatever reason, a small group of people in the IND have been using Mr. Crofton.

Mr. Crofton has constructed a world in which "west African" equals "illegal immigrant" equals "fraudster". That equation has buzzed around in his mind until he has blown it, because the equation is not true, and he has not been able to make it stack up. Now, hardly any decent people I know support him—apart from a poisonous little fat boy called Keith Vaness, who is out of his depth, and a few oddballs who have backed Mr. Crofton down the years. [Interruption.]

I hear the derisive cheers from the anti-civil libertarians on the Government Benches, but I tell the Minister that the whole business has constituted a disgraceful and shameful act. Hackney council should dissociate itself from the IND immediately, and re-establish a completely new line.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Nicholas Baker): The hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) has been most persistent in his attempts to suggest to the House that there is something sinister or improper in the way in which the Immigration and Nationality Department has conducted its affairs with the London borough of Hackney. He has now tabled eight parliamentary questions and three notices of motions.

The hon. Gentleman has also levelled accusations against officials from the Immigration and Nationality Department that are absurd and have absolutely no basis in fact—in fact, I challenge the hon. Gentleman to repeat some of what he has said this evening outside the House—so I especially welcome the opportunity to reject the accusations and to put the record straight.

I am also pleased to have the opportunity to set out serious concerns about three factors. The first is the recruitment policies of Hackney council; the second is the lack of proper checks, which has led to an unsatisfactory situation in which a high number of immigration offenders are thought to be employed by the council; and the third is the lack of co-operation by the council with the immigration service in dealing with apparent abuse of the immigration laws.

The hon. Gentleman has accused the Home Office of a witch hunt. There is none; nor has there ever been a witch hunt by Home Office officials against employees of Hackney council. But where there are apparent abuses of the immigration laws, the immigration service has a duty to investigate them. Eight employees of Hackney council have already been identified as immigration offenders, and served either with papers as illegal entrants or with notices of intention to deport.

The hon. Gentleman accuses Home Office officials of complicity in the theft of a computer disk. I say clearly that the Home Office is not, and never has been, in possession of a computer disk containing details of employees of Hackney council.

He accuses the Home Office of collusion in unlawful and criminal acts. There has been no such collusion. If the council's security procedures have been breached, it is for council officials to pursue the matter with the police, and with the Data Protection Registrar, if appropriate.

The evidence I shall lay before the House tonight will show conclusively that the immigration service has acted properly and with considerable restraint. It has operated in an open manner, offering to co-operate with the council to resolve the matters—an offer which the council has not accepted.

The hon. Gentleman must surely realise that all is not well in the "House of Hackney", and that the lawful activities of the immigration service cannot be used by Hackney council as a smokescreen to cover its own internal difficulties. It is time for the council to stop name-calling—and time for the hon. Gentleman to do the same—and to wake up to its responsibilities. These wild allegations can only serve to lessen the electorate's view of local government in London, and reflect poorly on the Labour party.

For some time now, the immigration service has received a stream of allegations from different sources alleging that illegal entrants were being employed by Hackney council. Not all the allegations were researched, but only those where there was evidence to suggest that the information was accurate.

The immigration service enforcement directorate is required to investigate allegations and information from whatever source about persons who may be working and/or residing in this country illegally. Such inquiries are not limited to cases of people of African origin or who are black. They are carried out irrespective of the nationality or race of the person concerned, and are based only on the question whether there are reasonable grounds for believing that offences under the immigration laws are being committed.

I have said that a number of immigration offenders working for the council have already been identified. Allow me to give some examples of the lax procedures of the council which enabled these offenders to obtain employment. The hon. Gentleman may then care to reflect on whether he wishes to see the law enforced or not.

On 2 September 1994, the immigration service detained a 35-year-old female who was employed by the London borough of Hackney as a cook. She had overstayed her leave to enter the United Kingdom since 23 October 1992. She had no permission to live or work in this country.

On 1 December 1994, a 33-year-old male was detained by the immigration service for working in breach of his conditions of entry. He had been employed on a full-time basis by the London borough of Hackney since June 1990, most recently as an estate manager for the housing department. [Interruption.] I can tell the hon. Gentleman that all his hon. Friends are leaving him, and he is becoming increasingly isolated.

In February 1995, a 36-year-old male was served with a notice of illegal entry. He had entered the United Kingdom using a false British passport. He was employed by the London borough of Hackney as a full-time personnel officer in the chief executive's office. He had been using a false identity, that of a teenage girl. He had been employed using the girl's national insurance number, which gave her true date of birth. He gave a different date of birth to the council, and used the girl's name to obtain employment. These discrepancies went unnoticed. He was removed from the United Kingdom on 20 February this year.

On 26 February 1995, a 24-year-old female was served with a notice of illegal entry. She had entered the United Kingdom on 27 November 1992. She had claimed to be coming for a visit of three days. She concealed the existence of her husband, who was already in the United Kingdom, and obtained employment with the London borough of Hackney as a full-time finance officer.

The list goes on, but I shall abbreviate it. All those cases give clear cause for concern and raise serious questions about the procedures employed by Hackney council in the recruitment of its staff. There are other cases.

The immigration service wrote to the chief executive of Hackney council on 25 January asking for a check to be made on two employees. The chief executive admitted in his reply, dated 13 February 1995, that the two employees had not confirmed in their application forms that they required a work permit to work in the United Kingdom, or that they were prohibited from taking employment by the conditions of their stay here. The two individuals were dismissed before the immigration service was given the opportunity to establish their status in this country, and as yet they have not been found.

The hon. Gentleman has mentioned a list of 600 employees, which he believes was obtained by the immigration service unlawfully. The immigration service received two manuscript lists containing what appeared to be details of persons employed by Hackney council. They were unsolicited. One was received in December 1994, the other in February 1995.

They were not extracts from a computer payroll record, and contained no sign that they had originated from within the council. The immigration service cannot be held responsible for the fact that they contained names almost exclusively of African origin; nor is it for me to comment on the motives of the person or persons who supplied the lists.

The hon. Gentleman has accused the Home Office of refusing to co-operate fully in an investigation to establish whether the Data Protection Act 1988 had been breached. He has also suggested that the information was unlawfully provided to the Home Office by the supporters of Mr. Bernard Crofton, the housing director of Hackney council, who is currently under suspension.

He notes that the associates of Mr. Crofton have now shown themselves in their true colours. In the motion dated 22 June 1995 the hon. Gentleman says that they have shown themselves "to be barmy, racist and criminal in character".

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman will forgive me, but I am very short of time. I have many points that I wish to put to the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch, and I am sorry that, on this occasion, I cannot give way as I would normally like to do.

I understand that the data protection registrar has been asked to conduct an inquiry into possible breaches of the Data Protection Act. It would therefore be wrong for me to comment in further detail, but the Home Office will, of course, co-operate fully with any such inquiry. What I shall say is that all information alleging breaches of the immigration laws is thoroughly researched, both within the Department and with other agencies, where an abuse of public funds is suspected.

The Government are committed to firm but fair immigration control, and will continue to welcome genuine visitors to our shores. But when overseas nationals abuse the immigration laws, they must expect to be dealt with firmly and returned to their own countries. Those who flout the immigration laws cannot expect to evade investigation simply by the status of their employer or the nature of their employment.

The immigration service receives denunciatory information from many sources. It would be inappropriate to reveal publicly the source of the information. The London borough of Hackney requested an interview with the immigration officer involved in many of the investigations that I have outlined today, in order—the hon. Gentleman will confirm this—to ask her from whom or where her information was coming.

The general question of such disclosure is a matter for the Home Office, not for individual immigration officers. For that reason, the Home Office offered to respond to any written inquiries but not to allow individual immigration officers to be interviewed about matters that go beyond their responsibilities. The council has not taken up that offer of co-operation.

The Home Office has never received information from Mr. Crofton. The hon. Gentleman will know that, in 1993, Mr. Crofton established his tenancy audit team, consisting of members recruited from outside the authority, to investigate allegations of widespread corruption in the housing department of Hackney council. The council's own appointed team found evidence that many council properties were inhabited by people who had no right to live in them and who in some cases had no right to be in the United Kingdom.

The team asked the immigration service to co-operate with its investigation into the misuse of council property, which has led to the apprehension of a number of immigration offenders and the return of several properties to the council—properties that it was then able to reallocate to genuine applicants. The immigration service will continue to investigate any breaches of the immigration laws if asked to do so by the tenancy team.

The immigration service has sought the council's co-operation to try to resolve this matter sensibly. It has pointed out the judgment in the Court of Appeal case of the Queen v. the Secretary of State for the Environment, ex parte London borough of Tower Hamlets, which concerned the duties of local housing authorities under the homelessness provisions. I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to that case.

That judgment confirmed that not only was there no bar to local authorities telling the Immigration and Nationality Department if they came across a suspected immigration offender; rather, it was their duty to do so.

Guidance following the judgment issued by the Department of the Environment in February 1994 recommended that local authorities should register a point of contact with the Immigration and Nationality Department for the handling of all inquiries by an authority. Although Hackney council has registered its benefit staff for the purposes of exchanging information on persons claiming housing benefit or council tax benefit, it has yet to register a contact point in accordance with that guidance.

The immigration service has also met council officials to discuss improvements in its recruitment procedures. It can surely only be to the benefit of people who are legally here that those who are not should be readily identifiable if they seek work.

The evidence that I have laid before the House tonight should give the hon. Gentleman cause to cease his bluff and think again. I urge him to retract his baseless allegations. I am satisfied that the immigration service has acted reasonably and with considerable restraint in its dealings with the London borough of Hackney. The council does not appear to have acted in a spirit of true co-operation—

Inflation Prospects

1. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will outline the prospects for inflation. [32468]

11. Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what he expects the rate of inflation to be at the end of 1995. [32557]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I expect inflation to increase a little towards the end of 1995, to 3 per cent. in the fourth quarter. That increase reflects the impact of higher import prices, and is expected to be temporary. I expect inflation to fall back during 1996, to 2½ per cent. by the fourth quarter.

Mr. Riddick: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that low inflation is a crucial factor in the creation of more wealth, more investment and more jobs? Does not he find absurd the way in which the shadow Chancellor on one hand appears to be for ever calling for lower interest rates but on the other has started to criticise my right hon. and learned Friend for not agreeing with the Governor of the Bank of England, who wants interest rates to increase? Will he assure the House that his inflation policy will be based on sound economics and not soundbites, so beloved by the hon. Gentleman?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend that the overriding aim of all economic policy is increased prosperity and more secure jobs. It is essential that we deliver low inflation in order to guarantee those and deliver those. We have been more successful on the inflation front in the past two years than at any time in the past 30 years. That has been as a result of the conduct of monetary policy and the determination of the Governor and myself to take no risks with inflation.

The Opposition always used to demand lower interest rates, come what may. Even in the late 1980s, they were demanding lower interest rates when they had to increase. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) always used to demand lower interest rates on every occasion, but he has stopped doing that for the past six months. As far as I can see, he has no opinion at all about interest rates or inflation that he will share with anyone at the moment.

Mr. Austin-Walker: Today's inflation rates show that the figures have already exceeded the figures that the Chancellor estimated in his Budget speech. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has given several different figures at different times. Would he say what he really anticipates the figure to be? Does the Governor of the Bank of England agree with his optimism about inflation rates and, more importantly, in his estimates has he consulted the First Secretary?

Mr. Clarke: The figures today entirely coincide with the summer forecast, which we debated yesterday, and the answer that I have just given about the likely pattern of inflation. There is absolutely no doubt about the inflation target among anyone who takes it seriously; it is 2½ per cent. or less by the end of this Parliament and through the next Parliament. People try to reinterpret that, but I set the policy. They are my decisions and I repeatedly say plainly on what basis I am setting them all the time. I work with the Governor of the Bank of England, with whom I discussed those decisions, and he and I are determined to achieve the Government's stated inflation target.

Sir Peter Tapsell: May I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on the impeccable judgment on interest rates that he has shown so far, especially in resisting the considerable pressures for him to increase interest rates a few weeks ago, just before the American and Japanese rates were lowered, and set off a world bull market in bonds?

Mr. Clarke: I always have the greatest respect for my hon. Friend's advice. That is because he is always constructively but fairly critical when he feels critical and I am grateful for his agreement when he gives it. I believe that the economic evidence supports the decision that I took. I am grateful to know that it has his full support. I do wish that someone on the Opposition Benches had a serious opinion to offer on the subject.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: Does the Chancellor accept that irresponsible tax cuts would worsen the outlook for inflation? Does he accept the discipline of his own words—that public borrowing is taxation deferred? Does he accept that, if he introduced tax cuts which could be funded only by increased borrowing, they would be bad for inflation and would have to be reversed soon afterwards, perhaps after a general election?

Mr. Clarke: I hope that we are all against irresponsible tax cuts. I am against doing anything that is irresponsible. We will not have tax cuts unless we can afford it. What we have done so far is to halve the public sector borrowing requirement over the past two years and we have set it on a firm downward course, aiming at our clearly stated intention of achieving balance over the medium term. Tax cuts will come, but only when we can afford them and when it is in the interests of the economy to have tax cuts.

Mr. Darling: Inflation has edged up today. Can the Chancellor explain why it has now emerged that the Central Statistical Office wrongly calculated the rate of inflation over the past few months and understated the rate of inflation? Can he also explain why he insists on maintaining not just one but three different targets for inflation? He used the figure of 2½ per cent. for the City and the figure of 3 per cent., which he said would be a triumph, for a newspaper interview.

In his own hand, the right hon. and learned Gentleman wrote to the Chairman of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service saying that his target was in the range of 1 per cent. to 4 per cent. most of the time—in other words, not all the time. Is it any wonder that people do not believe him when he says that he has a target? Is it any wonder that people believe that the Government will take risks with inflation if that is what it takes to win the next election?

Mr. Clarke: First, it is true that an error was made in calculating inflation for two months earlier this year. The Central Statistical Office has explained that it was a straightforward error. Someone made an error in the calculation which led to an under-recording by 0.1 percentage points in the months of March and May 1995. The new director insists, in his press release, on accepting personal responsibility for this, although he has been in post for only a fortnight. It was one of those human errors which we all make.

Secondly, I find this level of political debate absurd. One thing that I do in explaining Government policy is to state clearly what the objectives are. The inflation forecast is 2½ per cent. or less. In the same way, the Prime Minister and I made perfectly clear our attitudes towards such things as inheritance tax and capital gains tax. The press is capable of taking any daft half-quotation to claim that what we say is not what we claim to say. These bad habits are extending even to the Chamber and are lowering the Opposition's performance. I could not have been clearer in every statement I have made that the inflation target is 2½ per cent. or less from the end of this Parliament. I set the policy and I am telling the hon. Gentleman what the policy is on which I set other policies.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Will my right hon. and learned Friend resist the calls which come from some people who say that a bit of inflation would be good for negative equity and for house owners? Does he agree that there has never been a better time in the past decade or so for people to buy their first new home? We have low inflation rates which means low interest rates. That makes buying one's own home very affordable and that is the right way in which to get the house market moving again.

Mr. Clarke: I agree strongly with my hon. Friend. If the public feared that we were going back to what would begin as a bit of inflation, which would mean higher interest rates and the old double figure levels, it would be extremely damaging to the housing market. It is the fact that some people still fear that we may do that that is holding back purchasers from the excellent bargains at affordable prices in the market. I hope that the expert opinion of people such as our hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell), with his view about where interest rates are likely to go—at a time when they are well below half the peak that they hit at similar stages in the economic cycle in the past—will have some effect on those contemplating house purchases.

Low Pay and Unemployment

2. Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his assessment of the economic impact of low pay and unemployment. [32548]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. William Waldegrave): Low pay and unemployment result from low productivity and inflexible labour markets. Government policies have successfully tackled these problems. Real take-home pay has risen at all levels since 1979 and unemployment has fallen by 661,000 since December 1992.

Mr. Ainsworth: Is it not a fact that low pay is now costing every taxpayer £100 a year? Is that subsidy for bad employers a good use of £2.4 billion of public money? Is it not a fact that without a minimum wage, the good employer is undermined by the bad employer, who is undermined by the worst employer, and that the taxpayer winds up picking up the tab?

Mr. Waldegrave: I am very surprised that the hon. Gentleman should lead with an argument for the minimum wage. One of the most robust Labour politicians I know, the deputy leader of the Labour party, said:

"I knew the consequences of a minimum wage were that there'd be some shake out, any silly fool knew that".

To bring the script up to date, Lord Healey—the only Labour politician I know who is more robust than the deputy leader—said:

"Don't kid yourselves—the minimum wage is something on which unions will build differentials . . . Therefore the minimum wage becomes a floor on which you erect a new tower".

Those are the facts, and the people with courage in the Labour party know that they are the facts.

Mr. Dunn: Can my right hon. Friend inform the House how those on low pay or the unemployed would benefit from the introduction of a minimum wage, given that a minimum wage would destroy jobs and be a nightmare in the labour market?

Mr. Waldegrave: The irony must be that either one sets the minimum wage so low that it does not affect anything, or one moves differentials—unless the trade union movement has completely abandoned virtually everything that it stands for. Common sense tells us that the minimum wage will destroy jobs and that it will not benefit the unemployed one whit.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Minister aware that some of us have a figure for the minimum wage? We have done a comparison of those Tory Members of Parliament who receive £10,000 a year from consultancies that they do not declare in the Register. Some £10,000 a year is £5 an hour and the people in my constituency would settle for that. Unlike the moonlighting Tory Members of Parliament, my constituents want only one job.

Mr. Waldegrave: It is not uncharacteristic for the hon. Gentleman to have the courage of his convictions. He has put a figure of £5 an hour on the minimum wage. Let us have a figure from the Labour Front Bench. If Labour Members below the Gangway have the courage to give a figure, why will those on the Front Bench not do the same?

Mr. Harry Greenway: Has my right hon. Friend estimated the number of jobs that would be lost if the minimum wage were pitched at the level suggested by the Transport and General Workers Union? Does he not think—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Worsley (Mr. Lewis) should wake up—and so should the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). Does my right hon. Friend not think that people are most motivated and happiest when they are in work, even if they are not paid £1 million a year for doing the job?

Mr. Waldegrave: The estimates vary, but I have seen an estimate of anything around three quarters of a million jobs. On the basis of the figure advanced from below the Gangway opposite, it would probably be a little higher than that.

Trade Balance

3. Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the economic impact of the latest balance of trade figures. [32549]

Mr. Waldegrave: Recent growth has been export led. In the year to the first quarter of 1995, exports were 9 per cent., while imports rose by only 0.5 per cent. That means that more than half of the United Kingdom's gross domestic product growth of nearly 4 per cent. is accounted for by net exports.

Mrs. Jackson: Does the Minister not see that our very weak trade position—a £1.4 billion deficit in April—reflects the Government's failure to invest in the economy? Does he not understand that the people in the special steel sector in south Yorkshire want to see a doubling of investment in jobs, skills and technology? How can the Minister justify possibly wasting £4 billion by reducing capital gains tax and inheritance tax rather than investing in our manufacturing base?

Mr. Waldegrave: The country's trade performance is extremely good. It is very much better than most forecasters predicted—including the forecasts that came from the Labour Front Bench in the days when Labour Front Benchers used to give forecasts. The hon. Lady referred to the steel industry. British Steel is one of the best steel companies in the world and it is exporting very strongly. That was not the case when it was nationalised. Any tax changes that may be introduced—when we can afford them—which will help capital markets and the economy will only strengthen that position.

Mr. Spring: Does my right hon. Friend recall that economic recoveries since the war have been blighted time and again by balance of payments crises? Does he agree that the present economic recovery is precisely the opposite, in as much as we are seeing an astonishingly good export performance?

Mr. Waldegrave: It is the first recovery since the war that has been led by exports. It used to be the holy grail that we all sought, and the country can be proud of achieving it. Above all, manufacturing industry, and the invisibles sector too, can be proud of it. If a few years back we had been told that the United Kingdom would, for example, export more televisions and microchips than either France or Germany, as we did last year, people would have thought that we were in cloud cuckoo land. Yet that is what we are now achieving.

Mr. Milburn: Can the Chief Secretary confirm that our weak balance of trade position is a reflection of the Government's failure to secure adequate investment in the economy? Which areas of investment does he propose to cut to finance the abolition of capital gains tax and inheritance tax?

Mr. Waldegrave: The premise of the hon. Gentleman's question is absurd. The trade position is extremely strong. I would like to know why he thinks that, under the Labour party's proposals, which are the same old proposals for directed investment, he would not produce more advanced gas-cooled reactors, more Concordes and more of those pretty catastrophic investment proposals which were produced in the past by that very system.

Investment Level

5. Mr. Betts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he has to increase the level of investment in the economy. [32551]

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mrs. Angela Knight): Our objectives of low inflation and sound public finances are designed to ensure a stable macroeconomic environment, within which businesses can plan ahead with confidence. Industry is now responding. Manufacturing investment rose by more than 6½ per cent. last year.

Mr. Betts: Given that, between 1979 and 1994, Britain had the worst investment record of any of the G7 or European Union countries, and given that manufacturing investment fell in the first quarter of this year and that total investment is still 10 per cent. below its level prior to the recession, will the Economic Secretary answer the question which the Chief Secretary has failed to answer on two occasions? When resources become available, will the Government use them to assist investment in this country or will they waste them by spending £4 billion of public money on cutting inheritance tax and capital gains tax, which will benefit only a few relatively affluent people and do nothing to improve the underlying capacity of our economy? Will she answer that question?

Mrs. Knight: I find it very difficult to take seriously anything that the hon. Gentleman says about investment, as when he had opportunities and was in charge of Sheffield city council, he wasted £150 million building palaces of leisure for the world student games. That financial millstone has hung around the neck of everybody in that city for a generation. However, he will be pleased to learn that the latest investment figures show a strong pick-up in manufacturing, especially in the north of England.

Sir Timothy Sainsbury: May I first congratulate my hon. Friend on her very well deserved promotion to the Treasury Bench? I am sure that I speak for all Conservative Members in so doing. Does she agree that most investment, particularly in industrial companies, is funded from retained profits and therefore we should all welcome the increased profitability of British companies?

Mrs. Knight: I thank my right hon. Friend for his kind remarks. I entirely agree with his point. Since company profits are high, companies are managing to retain far more money which they can use for investment, to the benefit of companies and the country.

Mr. Beggs: Does the Minister agree that the availability of a highly skilled, well-qualified work force is always attractive to inward investors? Does she also agree that each right hon. and hon. Member has a duty to encourage teachers, students and those presently unemployed to obtain qualifications and skills in order to attract inward investment and generate wealth-creating jobs from which the whole economy will benefit?

Mrs. Knight: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. Education and training are very important indeed, which is why the Government have given them such a high priority. Since we are attracting so much investment into the United Kingdom, we are obviously doing a very good job in that respect.

Mr. Allason: Does my hon. Friend agree that the best way to improve the level of investment is to reduce bureaucracy, red tape and interference not only by local government and national Government, but by the European Union?

Mrs. Knight: My hon. Friend makes a very fair point. As part of my job, I shall certainly scrutinise European regulations to ensure that they benefit British industry.

Ms Armstrong: While I welcome the Minister to her first Question Time, can she tell us why manufacturing investment fell in the first quarter of this year? Is she confident that she will be able to sort out the fact that total investment is 10 per cent. lower than it was in 1989 before the recession? With all that going on, how does she justify the priority given to getting rid of capital gains tax and inheritance tax?

Mrs. Knight: The hon. Lady has been mixing her figures. I am sure that she will be delighted to learn that there is a strong pick-up in manufacturing investment, which increased by 8¾ per cent. in the first quarter of this year over the same period in 1994. That is an increase, not a reduction. One factor that aids investment in British industry is a strong economic climate. We have one now and will continue to have one.

Correspondence

6. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he received a reply to his letters of 12 May and 14 June to the right hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). [32552]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I regret to say that I have received no reply from the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) to my letters to him of 12 May and 14 June. I assume that he is still unable to decide on an inflation target and whether or not he agrees with my decisions on interest rates.

Mr. Thurnham: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that Labour cannot answer serious economic questions because it does not have a serious economic policy—only classical exogenous waffle to camouflage the job-destroying minimum wage and social chapter?

Mr. Clarke: I agree that members of the Opposition Front Bench find themselves in a sad position. There cannot be a Member of the House of Commons who has not at some stage expressed an opinion on the movement in interest rates. The markets have since moved, there has been a wide range of financial comment and all the data—including the Bank of England's advice to the Government—are before us. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East cannot even answer a letter because he cannot make up his mind whether or not he has an opinion.

Mr. Andrew Smith: As the Chancellor is so upset about replies to letters, will he now answer my letter to the Treasury of 23 June, which refuted fraudulent Conservative spending claims? While the right hon. and learned Gentleman is at it, will he account for his evident loss of control over the Prime Minister and his new spending commitment, now amounting to more than £11 billion? Answer that.

Mr. Clarke: At least the hon. Gentleman wrote only on 23 June. I shall certainly let him have a prompt reply based on the experience of having taken £45 billion out of my colleagues' spending plans already, so I must rebuff the hon. Gentleman's claims about spending. As to the repeated theme concerning my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, I was present when he made his excellent speech confirming his leadership of the party. I was not startled by his remarks, and I checked the text to remind myself why.

My right hon. Friend said of capital gains tax and inheritance tax:

> "My aim is to see these taxes reduced and if possible abolished altogether. I make no promises about when we can do it . . . no certainty that we can do it in the near future. But it should be set down now as a clear objective of any Government that I lead that I wish to see an end to inheritance tax and capital gains tax."

That is, if anything, slightly more cautious in tone than my agreement with the remarks made by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister yesterday. We have set that long-term objective because we believe in the benefits of low taxation and that one generation should be able to hand on the wealth that it has earned to the next generation.

We believe also that capital gains tax should be re-examined because it can impose damaging effects on investment, particularly in unquoted companies. The Opposition, because they have no policy on anything and cannot answer straight questions on any economic policy, keep inventing fraudulent misquotations to try to make an issue of something else.

Mr. David Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend surely is aware that a considerable amount of taxpayers' money goes to the Opposition in Short money, so that they can reply to letters from him asking about the Opposition's policies. Should we not examine the value that taxpayers receive for that money? Should we not be getting answers from the Opposition about their policies, so that taxpayers can see and understand them?

Mr. Clarke: I share my hon. Friend's feeling. I can only assume that the Short money all goes to the hon.

Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) and the many public relations assistants that he must employ. As we all know, the hon. Member for Hartlepool plays the role in the Opposition that they mythically believe my right hon. Friend the First Secretary will be playing in the Government.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Will the Chancellor now answer the question that he did not answer yesterday? Does he support the principle of abolishing inheritance tax and capital gains tax? Will he confirm that that would cost at least £3 billion? Will he further confirm that the main beneficiaries would be 5,000 people, who would get half the gains from abolishing the two taxes? Will he now tell us who is in charge of the Treasury and of tax policy? Where is the Budget being written—in No. 11 Downing street, No. 10 Downing street or No. 10a Downing street?

Mr. Clarke: If the hon. Gentleman is having difficulty with his correspondence, he could have given me a reply just now when he was on his feet. Let me read again what the Prime Minister said:

"My aim is to see those taxes reduced and if possible abolished altogether. I make no promises about when we can do it."

I said:

"The Prime Minister set out these objectives as a long-term aim for the Conservative party".

I do not see the faintest difference. I remain in charge of economic and taxation policy, with the full support of the Prime Minister. The Government's aim is to achieve low taxation, as and when we can afford it and when it is in the interests of the economy.

The hon. Gentleman seems to think that we have a lot of people in charge of economic policy, but it is clear that absolutely no one in his party is in charge of it.

Mr. Salmond: Is the Chancellor aware of just how desultory and pathetic many of us find the exchanges between him and his shadow? Why cannot we have an economic debate conducted on real economic aggregates, such as employment, productivity and output? Surely that would be better than debates that seem to turn on whether the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) is aware that there needs to be a half-point correction in interest rates so as to meet one of the Chancellor's many inflation targets.

Mr. Clarke: We had a debate on the economy in the House yesterday. Unfortunately the hon. Gentleman seemed to have a prior and pressing engagement elsewhere and was not able to join us. Hardly any nationalists from Scotland or Wales were present from beginning to end, as far as I can recall.

I prefer to talk about the 3 per cent. growth that we are going to achieve this year; about keeping inflation to 2.5 per cent. or less at the end of this Parliament; about the 660,000 people who have come of the unemployment register; about the need to get unemployment down further; and about the need to give this country a modern, industrial economy that will sustain growth throughout the rest of this decade. It is the pathetic nature of the official Opposition and the absence, when we debate the economy, of the Scottish nationalists, that reduce us to the kind of drivel that we have just heard.

Gilts Registration

7. Mr. French: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about the registration of gilts. [32553]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Representations about the registration of gilts are rarely received.

Mr. French: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that answer. Is she aware of the extent to which stock held on central gilts office accounts is exposed to the risk of misregistration and misallocation, whether intentional or otherwise? As the Pensions Bill contains no provisions relating to gilts custody, will she have discussions with the Bank of England to ensure that this real risk is covered?

Mrs. Knight: My hon. Friend asks a specific and detailed question. I assure him that the Pensions Bill regulates fund managers. As my hon. Friend rightly points out, they are involved in the central gilts office; but thousands of gilts are traded each week in that office and so far not even one alleged case of a breach of security has been reported.

Mr. Stevenson: In view of the Chancellor's recent announcement that he intends to limit the scope of taxation on gilts, will the Minister assure us that the Government have no intention of extending, and will not extend, the rate of VAT in a similar spirit? Or does the Minister agree with the Chancellor that far too many goods are still exempt from VAT?

Mrs. Knight: The hon. Gentleman will have to wait until the Budget.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I congratulate my hon. Friend on her well deserved promotion. She is one of the 1992 intake and, on behalf of that intake, I may say that we are delighted to see her.

Small, prudent savers will certainly welcome the written parliamentary answer on the taxation of gilts given to my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Banks), stating that 99 per cent. of small savers will be exempt and that they will have until April 1996 to get their investments in order. That is extremely welcome news to small savers.

Mrs. Knight: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who makes a good point. We consulted large and small holders of gilts. I believe that the announcement that has been made satisfies everybody.

Privatisation

8. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has for further privatisation; and if he will make a statement. [32554]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Michael Jack): The Government continue to look for opportunities to transfer public sector businesses to the private sector. For example, we are proceeding with plans to transfer the operation of British Rail to the private sector and to privatise the major part of the nuclear power generating industry.

Mr. Mullin: It would be wholly irresponsible, would it not, to use the proceeds of the sale of public assets to fund tax cuts for the purpose of purchasing the result of the next general election?

Mr. Jack: I am rather surprised that the hon. Gentleman, who normally deals with these matters in considerable detail, poses a question in that way, because he will know that, since the process of privatisation was begun, what used to cost this country £50 million a week now is now generating income to the Treasury of £55 million a week in terms of receipts from taxes on profits. That is the benefit of privatisation that we support.

Mr. Tim Smith: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his appointment and welcome him to his first Question Time. Does he agree that privatisation has been hugely successful both for taxpayers and for customers, that we should continue to privatise Government services wherever we can, and that we should export the successes of privatisation wherever we can?

Mr. Jack: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind words. We debated this matter yesterday and have already had an exchange on it. He is right to draw attention to the tremendous opportunity and contribution that the private sector has given to the Government—£455 million of savings have been posted so far. He is also right to attest to this country's great expertise in privatisation. It is good to see that Britain leads the world in that area.

Ms Primarolo: If the Chancellor is still in charge of economic policy, and not the resident of No. 10a or No. 10 Downing street, will the Financial Secretary tell us whether, in principle, he supports the taxing of income from executive share options and whether he will deal with the scandal of taxpayers who are being ripped off under these privatisation processes?

Mr. Jack: Rewards in this area are extremely important. The hon. Lady touches on a subject which as she knows full well, will be dealt with when Sir Richard Greenbury reports. [Interruption.] It is not a question of Sir Richard Greenbury or anybody else being in charge. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave a clear indication that he wanted that area to be investigated. He was entirely supported by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor, who has given a robust defence of who is in charge of economic policy. He is and the Government are: the Opposition are not.

Mr. Stephen: Further to my hon. Friend's reply to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), does my hon. Friend agree that all political parties are in the business of bribing the electorate? The difference is that Opposition Members do it by promising more and more public expenditure, whereas we do it by promising to leave more and more money in the pockets of the people. It will be for the people to make their choice at the next general election.

Mr. Jack: My hon. Friend touches on an interesting area. The only problem with his analysis, if I may take a point of difference with him, is that our economic policies, which are appealing to people, are based on sound fundamentals. We have real numbers to show where we are going; how anybody could be bribed by a blank piece of paper from the Opposition I do not know.

Single European Currency

9. Mr. Tipping: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consideration he has given to the name for a single European currency. [32555]

The Paymaster General (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): There is no need for a decision now on the name of a possible future single currency.

Mr. Tipping: Does the Minister recall the Chancellor's recent comment that he was in favour of calling a new single European currency the crown or the shilling? Does that mean that he is now in favour of abolishing the pound? What discussions has he had with the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) on that over the past month or so?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My right hon. and learned Friend participates in the technical discussions, but the hon. Gentleman should not be too worried either way about the name, as the important point is that we are not committed to stage 3 of monetary union—unlike the Labour party, which is committed to monetary union and a single currency while at the same time being committed to inflationary policies. That combination would be a recipe for ruin.

Mr. Brooke: In the centenary year of Wilde's greatest play, does the Paymaster General recall the advice of Miss Prism:

"The chapter on the Fall of the Rupee you may omit. It is somewhat too sensational"?

Does he agree that a couple of years of silence on the single European currency would do nobody any harm and might well do the exchange rate some good?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Yes, particularly on the name of a single currency, where no decision is required and no decision is imminent.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: Will the Minister ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he still agrees with the principle of European monetary union? If so, does he still agree with his remarks reported in The Times in February that the Conservative party has run out of ways of making it clear that there are no divisions?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The policy is absolutely clear and it has been repeated by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor and by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister both to the House and outside: we are not committed to stage 3 of monetary union. We achieved an opt-out during the Maastricht negotiations. A future Parliament and a future House of Commons will make that choice in the circumstances of the day.

Private Finance Initiative

10. Mr. Garnier: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what contribution he expects the private finance initiative to make to the provision of capital for infrastructure projects. [32556]

Mr. Jack: My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in his Budget speech that contracts leading to £5 billion of capital investment are due to be signed in 1995 under the PFI. He announced a further £1 billion of projects in January.

Mr. Garnier: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the PFI is available across the national infrastructure and is available to every Department of State? Will he comment on the lamentable failure of the Opposition to come to grips with that excellent initiative?

Mr. Jack: My hon. and learned Friend precisely states the situation. The fact that we can post £5 billion-worth of new economic activity at a time when the Opposition are criticising us on investment shows the true effectiveness of our economic policy. I note that, with regard to private finance in the Prison Service, on the one hand the Opposition call for tougher measures on law and order and then announce that in principle they are against private money building new prisons.

Mr. Timms: The Minister will be aware that the Belgian high-speed rail link to the channel tunnel is being built and that the French high-speed rail network has been operating for a number of years, yet in Britain this week fundamental questions have been raised about whether our high-speed rail link to the channel tunnel can be funded. In those circumstances, does the Minister agree that the Government's priority should be investment in infrastructure before the abolition of capital gains tax and inheritance tax?

Mr. Jack: What is fundamental is that the high-speed channel rail link—a project valued at some £2.7 billion—is being actively competed for; the four original bidders are now down to the final two. Private sector companies want to make this investment and they will do so, to the benefit of our transport infrastructure.

Mr. Wilkinson: Does my hon. Friend agree that the crossrail project offers one of the best prospects for private finance and is of particular importance for the regeneration of the economy of London and the south-east? Will he and his colleagues in government do everything possible to facilitate it?

Mr. Jack: My hon. Friend is right to point out how private capital can further develop London's transport infrastructure. I add to his joy on that, because we also have PFI help for 100 extra trains on the Northern line. Again, that is an example of how much-needed public investment in infrastructure has been achieved under this remarkable initiative.

ECOFIN

12. Mr. Soley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next expects to attend an ECOFIN meeting; and what subjects are on the agenda. [32558]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I attended a European Council of Economic and Finance Ministers meeting on Monday 10 July at which a variety of subjects was discussed. My intention is to attend the next ECOFIN meeting on 18 September. As yet, no firm agenda for this meeting has been agreed.

Mr. Soley: Is it the Government's intention to keep the pound in the European currency fluctuation band even if ECOFIN decides to narrow that band in the next two years?

Mr. Clarke: We have no intention of re-entering the exchange rate mechanism, at least for the duration of this Parliament. [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. This is wasting time. I call Mr. Cash.

Mr. Cash: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that, at the most recent ECOFIN meeting, there was absolutely no question of the United Kingdom submitting to any kind of threats from other member states with regard to the possibility of the creation of a "hard core" in Europe? That would result in their imposing tariff barriers, penalties or sanctions on us, or trying to push us into a second-rate, disastrous exchange rate mechanism.

Mr. Clarke: I can reassure my hon. Friend on all those points. The reports of ECOFIN meetings that I read when I return from them rarely bear much resemblance to what took place. I answer written questions in the House, however, and I suggest that my hon. Friend read those answers if he wants to find out what actually went on. It was reported that, at the last meeting, the French were threatening the imposition of all kinds of penalties on those who were not in the hard core, but I have yet to meet a Frenchman who has ever heard of the suggestion.

Income Tax (Self-assessment)

14. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on progress on the introduction of self-assessment of income tax liability. [32561]

Mr. Jack: Work is proceeding to the planned timetable for the introduction of self-assessment for personal tax, and the issue of the new tax returns in April 1997.

Mr. Thompson: I thank my hon. Friend and his colleagues for the briefing sessions on self-assessment that they have been giving Members of Parliament. Can he assure businesses and, indeed, individuals that the introduction of self-assessment will not mean added burdens, extra form filling and the like? There are still some worries on that score.

Mr. Jack: One of the key elements of self-assessment is simplification. I assure my hon. Friend that, just as we have sought to inform Members of Parliament, there will be a major information campaign throughout the coming 12 months to inform all sectors of business and all private individuals about the changes.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 13 July. [32458]

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Sir Peter Tapsell: May I urge, yet again, the withdrawal of British troops from Bosnia—particularly because Bismarck's wise advice, quoted yesterday by our right hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire, North (Mr. Biffen), was ignored by his successors, so that eventually the road to Sarajevo was paved with the bones of Pomeranian grenadiers? We do not want that road to be paved with the bones of our young men.

The Prime Minister: I know that my hon. Friend has held a consistent view about the difficulties that we face in Bosnia, and that some others share that view. There can be no certainty about what will happen in the present circumstances, but I hope that I can tell my hon. Friend why I believe that it would be unwise for us to decide to take that action now.

I believe that, if UNPROFOR withdrew, a number of things would be at risk. We would certainly put at risk the peace that remains in central Bosnia, not least because of the presence of British troops; and we might put at risk the hundreds of thousands of lives that have been saved as a result of the presence of United Nations troops.

Let me touch on the wider point on which my hon. Friend also touched. One of the primary reasons why I felt it right to send British troops to the area in the first place, and why I would be reluctant to remove them unless it became imperative to do so, is the danger of a wider Balkan war. That risk exists, and it is for that reason that I felt it right to ask British troops to go to the area in a peacekeeping capacity and try to ensure that such a war did not occur.

I concede to my hon. Friend that the situation is serious. As I have told the House before, circumstances could arise in which it would be impossible for United Nations troops to remain; but until and unless those circumstances arise, I believe that it is right for them to do so, and to contribute to peacekeeping in the way in which they have so far.

Mr. Blair: Will the Prime Minister confirm that his leadership election pledge to abolish inheritance tax and capital gains tax would amount to £3 billion a year, and that almost half that £3 billion would go to just 5,000 people?

The Prime Minister: I understand that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) has been dancing around with all sorts of fraudulent and distorted quotations. I will make it quite clear to the right hon. Gentleman—as I have done, both publicly and privately, for some time—that when it is appropriate and we can afford to do so—[Interruption.] That is what I said. When it is appropriate and we can afford to do so, I wish to abolish both capital gains tax and inheritance tax. I repeat the point for the right hon. Gentleman: I have made that clear and it must wait for when resources allow. I make no apology for that. The distortion of capital gains tax will need to be tackled. Unlike the Labour party, I believe in trying to pass wealth down between generations, whereas it squirms and wriggles whenever we talk of any tax reduction.

Mr. Blair: I might remind the right hon. Gentleman that, during the leadership election, he said that he wanted to do that at the earliest opportunity. I do not know whether No. 11 Downing street or No. 10a has now changed the line, but, in any event, would it not be the most mistaken sense of priority to cut inheritance tax or capital gains tax when we know today that, as a result of Government cuts in spending, we are short of teachers and that classroom sizes are rising? Should not the interests of the many in a decent education for their children come before the Tory obsession with the interests of a privileged few?

The Prime Minister: I am astonished that the right hon. Gentleman thinks that home owners right across the country, increasingly hit by inheritance tax, are a privileged few. They will be interested to hear that they are a privileged few. It is true that they were a privileged few when the Labour Government were in power and many former council home owners, now home owners, would have remained without that privilege had we been left with a Labour Government. The reality is that the people of this country would like to see changes in those taxes and, when it is prudent to do so, we will change them.

Mr. Blair: As a matter of fact, the vast majority of people do not pay inheritance tax or capital gains tax and the right hon. Gentleman did not dispute that more than half the benefit would go to 5,000 people. As for tax, let me remind him that he pledged to cut tax at the last election, that he increased the standard rate of income tax by 7p and that only one tax cut has been introduced since the 1992 election: a cut of VAT on fuel by Opposition Members.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman knows very well that he and his colleagues have voted against every tax reduction that we have introduced throughout most of the past 16 years. Even at the suggestion of tax cuts, one sees the instinctive reaction of Opposition Members. They hate the thought of leaving money in people's pockets. They would rather have it themselves to spend for themselves. I have made it clear that it is my ambition to abolish inheritance tax and capital gains tax as and when we can do it. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made that clear, too. It remains our ambition, and we will pursue it.

Mr. Tracey: What message would my right hon. Friend send to the people of Wales, whose Labour Members of Parliament boycotted the House and Welsh Question Time at the beginning of this week? Would he suggest a forfeit for them, because surely their behaviour jeopardises the future representation of the Principality in the House?

The Prime Minister: There is no doubt that those hon. Members' behaviour was juvenile—sufficiently juvenile, no doubt, to qualify for nursery vouchers as soon as we fully introduce the scheme. When the Labour party thinks up ill-judged stunts such as that, it would do well to remember that two of its past five or so leaders have been Englishmen sitting in Welsh seats.

Q2. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 13 July. [32459]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Llwyd: Following the rather dramatic departure of the Prime Minister's very good friend, the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), the right hon. Gentleman has appointed someone to the Welsh Office who, nominally at least, is from the same planet as the rest of us, but in so doing he has appointed the fourth successive Member of Parliament to that office who has no interest at all in Welsh affairs. Has the Prime Minister not shown that he has no confidence in Welsh Conservative Members of Parliament and is it not really a pathetic reflection on them?

The Prime Minister: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman chose his question before listening to what might have been asked earlier. He might bear in mind the fact that we are one United Kingdom. It is perfectly proper for a previous leader of the Labour party to be a Welsh Member of Parliament seeking to be Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. It is perfectly proper for two English Members to sit in Welsh seats, one of whom became Prime Minister and one of whom tried to do so. It is only the Welsh nationalists who wish to wrap themselves up in a little country and damage that country and its prospects within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Charles Wardle: If the new directive to abolish internal frontiers is the Commission's response to the action it faces in the European Court for not having dismantled the frontiers under existing treaty law, what credible defence is there for Britain in talk of a veto, or the worthless Luxembourg declaration? If my right hon. Friend means to protect our sovereign borders against unchecked immigration, will he get the treaty amended? If not, he will face the wrath of not just the Euro-sceptics in the House but virtually the entire British electorate.

The Prime Minister: The European Commission has produced three proposals. It made it clear that the proposals must be taken together and must be agreed unanimously. Unless those proposals are agreed, there is no matter upon which the European Court can adjudicate. I can tell my hon. Friend that there must be unanimity and that that will not happen. The United Kingdom will veto the proposals.

Q3. Mr. Battle: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 13 July. [32460]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Battle: Following the leadership election and his new-found determination to stamp his views and authority on the Cabinet, will the Prime Minister now tell us whether he agrees with the proposals of the Nolan committee on sleaze that amounts earned from consultancies by Members of Parliament should be openly declared?

The Prime Minister: I have made it perfectly clear to the House on a number of occasions since the outset that I favour greater transparency. I have made it equally clear that we will wait until we have the Select Committee report before I say any more.

Mr. Sumberg: Will my right hon. Friend join me in condemning tomorrow's rail strike, which will bring massive disruption to the country? Is it not revealing that, when it comes to standing up for the consumer and criticising the trade unions, new Labour remains totally silent?

The Prime Minister: That follows neatly from the previous question. There has been absolute and total silence from the Opposition Front Bench when it comes to looking after the interests of passengers. We have not heard a word about the RMT or ASLEF or about the inconvenience to passengers. All I can say is that it is a good job that one does not go to Australia by train.

Q4. Ms Corston: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 13 July. [32461]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Ms Corston: In the light of today's report from school governors that teachers are being sacked and that class sizes are increasing, despite the Prime Minister's repeated assurances that neither of those things would happen, will the right hon. Gentleman now apologise to the British people?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Lady might well acknowledge the increase in resources to education year upon year: it is 50 per cent. up on the level that we inherited some time ago. She might also acknowledge the improved examination performance, improved teaching, improved choice and the improvement in the number of our youngsters going to university. All those things have magically waved by the hon. Lady without her apparently noticing them.

Lady Olga Maitland: Has my right hon. Friend seen the report in today's newspapers, including The Daily Telegraph, that 100 terrorists could be released from gaol early? Does he agree that that is totally untrue and that there are no plans to release terrorists early into the community until they have served their full and rightful sentences?

The Prime Minister: The position is as it has always been and as the House knows. There is no question of an amnesty for prisoners in Northern Ireland. There are no political prisoners anywhere in the United Kingdom. We keep remission rates under review. That has been the case and it will remain the case for some time. Remission rates were introduced some time ago and, as I have said, we keep them constantly under review. I do not think that the time is yet right for a change.

Madam Speaker: We now come to Question 5.

Ms Church: Question 6—no, Question 5, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Yes, Question 5.

Q5. Ms Church: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 13 July. [32462]

The Prime Minister: Whichever question number it may be, the answer is the same.

Ms Church: Does the Prime Minister agree that external regulation of the insurance market, as desired by both Lloyd's and the Select Committee, would increase the global credibility of the London market? Will he amend the Lloyd's Act 1982 to bring that about?

The Prime Minister: I do not think that I necessarily accept the hon. Lady's premise. It is clear that, because of the difficulties at Lloyd's over the past couple of years, we need to look carefully at the methods of regulation. However, until we have examined them properly, I am not inclined to make any suggestion of a changed regime.

Mr. Rowe: Has my right hon. Friend noticed that the moment the opinion polls give even the illusion that there might conceivably be a Labour Government some time in the future, the trade unions queue up to threaten the customer and the patient with industrial action? Does not it frighten him as much at it frightens me that new Labour will be as much a pawn in the hands of the trade unions as old Labour used to be?

The Prime Minister: There is no doubt about the pre-emptive obeisance shown by the Labour party on the minimum wage, the social contract and a range of other issues. Of course, we do not have to fight with the trade union movement if we offer it exactly what it wants, when it wants it—and even before it has asked for it.

Defence Equipment

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Michael Portillo): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to make an announcement of two important defence equipment programmes.

In this year's defence White Paper, the Government reaffirmed their commitment to maintaining world-class armed forces to defend our vital national interests in a disordered and turbulent world. To that end, we are continuing our programme of investment in forces and equipment that provide us with enhanced flexibility, combat power and mobility.

The Government have been considering the bids from industry to supply an attack helicopter for the Army to replace the Lynx anti-tank helicopter around the end of this decade. Six companies responded to our invitation to tender—Agusta, offering the A129; Boeing-Sikorsky, with the Comanche; Atlas, with the Rooivalk; Westland helicopters, with a version of the McDonnell Douglas Apache; British Aerospace, with the Eurocopter Tiger; and GEC-Marconi Avionics with the Bell Cobra Venom. All the bids were of high quality, offering capable helicopters. I am grateful for the assistance that each of those companies has offered to us in this competition.

The Ministry of Defence has conducted a competition of the utmost rigour and objectivity, assessing the military capability and cost-effectiveness of each bid in the varied war-fighting scenarios where we might need it. The assessment criteria included operational effectiveness, crew safety, through life costs, technical risk and industrial implications.

I can announce that, subject to the negotiation of satisfactory contract terms, we have decided to buy 67 Westland Apache helicopters with Rolls-Royce engines. They will operate, as required, in support of the Army's two armoured divisions, 24 Airmobile Brigade and the Royal Marines.

This order, with a value of around £2.5 billion, will be warmly welcomed by the armed forces. Apache has demonstrated its value in service with the United States army, and the version that we shall buy is equipped with the new Longbow radar, which will significantly enhance its effectiveness. It will provide the British Army with a world-class capability, a generation ahead of the Lynx helicopter, offering us the right combination of mobility, rapid deployment, reach and firepower. I regard it as vital that those who risk their lives for this country be provided with the helicopter that we believe can destroy the highest number of enemy targets with the least loss of life among our crews.

This decision will bring many jobs in British industry. Westland, Britain's only maker of helicopters, will assemble Apache and manufacture its transmission at Yeovil. Around 180 other UK companies will participate in the programme, including Rolls-Royce, which at its plant in Bristol will manufacture the RTM 322 engine. That modern engine will provide long-term growth potential and commonality with the engines in the Navy's Merlin and the RAF's EH101 helicopter fleets.

There will be significant work for Shorts of Belfast on the Apache's Hellfire anti-armour missile. We are ordering a helicopter built by Westland, powered by Rolls-Royce, and equipped with missiles supplied by Shorts.

In total, British industry will do at least 50 per cent. of the work on the Apaches that we buy. Moreover, Westland's US subcontractors have undertaken to provide additional defence work for British industry, including work on Apaches for supply to the US army, to the full value of the overseas content of the contract. That means that orders worth £2.5 billion will be placed with British companies, of which half will be for work on the British Army helicopter.

We believe that in total the order will sustain some 3,000 jobs a year in our defence industry. In addition, we have negotiated rights for the maintenance and repair of Apache in the UK and will be offering that service to all other Apache users in Europe, with further significant benefits to UK industry.

I have a second announcement. My predecessor, now the Foreign Secretary, announced last year that the "Front Line First" reforms would allow us to proceed with a programme of investment necessary to maintain operational effectiveness within a reduced defence budget. He said that the Government were examining the case for acquiring conventionally armed Tomahawk land attack missiles. Feasibility studies with the US Government and with industry have confirmed that we can operate Tomahawk from Royal Navy nuclear-powered submarines.

Tomahawk's very long range and great accuracy will enable the UK to threaten limited action against selected targets as a means of persuading an aggressor to desist from hostile activity. In today's strategic conditions, it is important to have that capability to carry out precision attacks, minimising the risk to our own forces, as well as to civilians.

We believe that that system will provide a significant addition to our military capability. Today we have formally applied to the US Government to acquire Tomahawk. Subject to the necessary agreements, our aim would be for the system to enter service with the Royal Navy by 1998. Although we are buying an American weapon, we expect over 30 per cent. of the value of the work to be done in Britain.

The Government are committed to ensuring that the British armed forces receive the best possible equipment available. With these announcements they can continue, in the next century, to have the flexibility, mobility and firepower to engage in a range of operations, from war fighting to peacekeeping, with the skill and professionalism that all of us in the House admire.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): May I welcome the Secretary of State to his new Department? He comes with quite a reputation—a factor which I feel has been reflected in today's announcement.

The Opposition welcome this afternoon's announcement that the Army has finally got the attack helicopter that it wanted, although I would suggest that it will be somewhat disappointed that it is getting a much smaller number than it originally anticipated.

We share the relief of the workers at Westland, Rolls-Royce and Shorts and their subcontractors that they have been successful, and we commiserate with the losers. However, a number of questions are raised by the Secretary of State's announcement, especially as it affects our industrial base.

[Dr. David Clark]

We note that the Secretary of State has brought with him the rigours of Treasury thinking and that the Army is getting fewer helicopters than it and the Ministry of Defence considered the minimum for our effective defence. He will recall that the tender specification was for 91 helicopters, and in the Army debate as recently as 23 February, the then Minister of State for Defence Procurement spoke of "approximately 100". Sixty-seven is not approximately 100. It is nowhere near 100. What has changed? If 100 was necessary for the effective defence of Britain three years ago, why can we settle for 67 now? I press the Secretary of State to say what has changed, or is this further cut another example of his Treasury thinking?

May I also ask the Secretary of State whether any of those helicopters are being adapted to operate from ships? As the Americans would say, are they being "marinised"? Given the possible future scenarios for theatre operations by the Army, that would be a sensible option. Has the Secretary of State taken that into account?

Will the Secretary of State also say a word about the long-range TRIGAT missile system, which would have been part of the Euro Tiger deal? Will he confirm that the taxpayer has already invested £210 million in that venture and that, contractually, British Aerospace will have to pull out of the collaborative scheme now that Tiger is not being ordered by the British forces? What implications do his decisions have for British Aerospace factories at Lostock and Stevenage? Does he anticipate any redundancies?

As the Secretary of State said, all the helicopters met the specifications and I therefore presume that wider industrial and political implications were considered. The Secretary of State's well-known Euro-scepticism clearly meant that the European collaborative Tiger was not in the running. But what assessment has been made of the effect of that order on future European collaboration? Has he examined the implications that buying American in this instance will have for other collaborative ventures? What assessment has he made of the employment prospects for the unsuccessful bidders? Are we likely to see further job losses among our most skilled workers? Will we see further factory closures and a restructuring of the ownership of the British defence industry?

The Secretary of State mentioned offset. What specific guarantees has he obtained? As he knows from his previous experience, there is considerable evidence that, more often than not, those offsets are not delivered, especially in the high-tech field.

We accept that Tomahawk missiles proved to be an incredibly accurate and effective weapon in the Gulf war and that they will enhance our forces' capabilities, but we are disappointed to note that only 30 per cent. of British work is involved and there is no mention of offset. Will the Secretary of State say a little more about that aspect and assure the House that it is not envisaged that those Tomahawk missiles will carry nuclear warheads?

We hope that today's decision will prove to be wise. We hope that, by turning his back on European collaborative ventures, the Secretary of State has not jeopardised further other European collaboration. If we are to retain the skills of our workers and the presence of a defence industry in Britain, not only must we keep pressing for orders in the United States, but we need to work much more with our European partners.

Mr. Portillo: I thank the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) for his welcome to me and his welcome, at least in his first sentence or two, of the order and the provision of these important new capabilities for our armed services.

I thought it a bit rich that I was being criticised for announcing a cut. I have announced an order of £2.5 billion for the attack helicopter and made a further important announcement in respect of Tomahawk. I thought it especially ironic and paradoxical that the accusation of a cut in defence spending should come from a party that, at its last conference, was pledged to reduce our defence spending by £6 billion. It makes one wonder how many helicopters could be bought in such a situation.

The hon. Gentleman wants to know why there are 67 helicopters. We are buying a helicopter with an enhanced radar—the Longbow radar. We have subjected it to the most intense scrutiny and we are convinced that it can do the job that we need it to do in those numbers because it has a very good survivability rate. That is one of the main features of the aircraft and it also means that it will save lives among British forces.

It is true that about £200 million has been invested in the long-range third-generation anti-tank guided weapons system, but I do not believe that decisions for the future can be taken on the basis of sunk costs of the past. We must make the decision about the best equipment for our armed forces for the future. We are not considering using it on ships. It will be able to operate with the Marines, but it is basically a land attack helicopter and tanks will be among its most important targets.

I cannot anticipate the consequences at British Aerospace and GEC. They competed very well. There will be many other opportunities for defence orders and I wish them well for the future. What I can say with precision is that today's announcement creates 3,000 jobs in British industry.

On European collaboration, the hon. Gentleman reached the zenith of his absurdity—as if my ideas about Europe, whatever they might be, would have influenced a decision of that magnitude, and during the past week.

Recently, the Dutch decided to buy the Apache. I assume that the hon. Gentleman will not rise in wrath in his place, point the accusing finger at the Government of the Netherlands and accuse them of Euro-scepticism. We have more collaboration with France than with any other single country on defence matters. We continue to have about 30 joint projects with Europe, and I have written to my colleagues in Europe—in France and Germany—assuring them of on-going collaboration in other projects.

We have a guarantee that 50 per cent. of the helicopter will be British work, and we have a promise of offset agreements taking us up to the full 100 per cent.

On the Tomahawk, I believe that the hon. Gentleman will recognise that there is no British or European equivalent that can be bought. In the circumstances, I think that to get 30 per cent. of the work in Britain is a considerable achievement. There will be many opportunities for future collaboration with the United States, and I am pleased to confirm that that is a conventional missile; we have no intention whatever of nuclear-arming that missile.

I am disappointed that the hon. Gentleman did not rise to give a more cheery response to an order that means that our armed forces will be equipped with the very best. Our primary consideration in the House should be the way in which we can enable our troops, our men, our forces, to have the equipment in which they have the greatest confidence when we in the House are potentially asking them to put their lives at risk.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend, not only on his appointment, but on making a statement that will certainly earn him cheers in Middle Wallop, where the Army Air Corps is based? It has lobbied hard for that aircraft.

Can my right hon. Friend confirm that the £200 million spent on long-range TRIGAT will not be wasted, because that weapon can be used in armoured vehicles to knock out tanks? Will he tell us what will happen to the Lynx helicopters at present used in an anti-tank role? Will they be converted to light support helicopters to replace the Wessex? Lastly, can he confirm that it will be the Army Air Corps that will fly that aircraft?

Mr. Portillo: On the last point, yes, this helicopter is for the Army to operate. It is, effectively, a flying tank and it seems best that it should be operated by the Army. I reiterate that we also see it being used by the Royal Marines. The Lynx helicopters will be converted to general purpose and reconnaissance use. My hon. Friend is right to say that the fact that the long-range TRIGAT is not being purchased by the Government for this order does not mean that the £200 million has been wasted. In turn, I congratulate my hon. Friend because he has just become Chairman of the Select Committee on Defence.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): I welcome the Secretary of State to his new post and I welcome, without qualification, his statement, especially the decision to order the Longbow version of the Apache helicopter. Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise two points of similarity between the two programmes? First, both the Apache and the Tomahawk cruise missiles proved their effectiveness during the Gulf war. Secondly, both bring to the United Kingdom additional flexibility, which is undoubtedly necessary during a time of static defence budgets.

Mr. Portillo: I am pleased to receive the hon. and learned Gentleman's welcome—I am not sure whether it is influenced by the position in Yeovil. The announcement will, indeed, be good news all round. The hon. and learned Gentleman is absolutely right to say that these weapons have recently proved their effectiveness. I made the point in my statement that we are in an era of limited defence budgets. Through the defence costs study, we have been able to find savings in the defence budget, and my predecessor made it clear that that gave us the opportunity to provide flexible, up-to-date equipment for our forces to make them battle-ready and to give them the firepower that they needed.

Dame Peggy Fenner (Medway): My right hon. Friend will understand that, although his announcement may be good news for Yeovil, it is not good news for Medway because we hoped very much that the GEC-Marconi Avionics Cobra Venom would win the battle. It is extremely unusual for the Treasury to spurn the lowest tender, so one must be impressed by the service chiefs who insisted that the Apache was their favourite option.

My right hon. Friend added that the Apache gives 3,000 extra jobs. As I understand it—different companies around the United Kingdom will be affected—the GEC-Marconi Avionics Cobra Venom would have given rather more jobs than that. What considerations meant that the lowest tender was not accepted? I am, of course, impressed by the support for the Apache in the west country, but I believe that it is not quite such a marvellous decision for my workers, who suffered the biggest loss from the peace dividend when they lost 7,000 jobs at Her Majesty's dockyard and naval base.

Mr. Portillo: Nothing could give me greater sorrow than to disappoint my hon. Friend as I have to today. It is, however, inevitable that in a competition in which there are three finalists, approximately two thirds of Members of Parliament may be disappointed by the decision, at least vis-a-vis their own constituencies. I hope none the less that my hon. Friend and others will be able to see the merits of the decision and the high quality of the equipment that we are buying.

The circumstances, conditions and criteria were as laid out in my statement. We were dealing with considerations such as the effectiveness of the aircraft, the cost-effectiveness of the decision, the industrial implications and the industrial risks. That combination of circumstances led to our choice. It would not be helpful at this stage to go into any greater detail about how one bid compared with another, not least because they were all good bids and I hope to see all the contenders doing well in world markets.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): May I compliment the Secretary of State on his good fortune in being able to announce to the House, so early in his new-found position, the acquisition of a piece of kit that has an attrition rate, proven in action, that is so low that it is mathematically incalculable? Will all 67 models that we are buying have the Longbow radar rather than the less effective system bought by the Netherlands? When can the military expect the first delivery? How long will the programme take and when will the contract be completed?

Mr. Portillo: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his warm words of welcome. On his last point, I am not prepared to say more than that we see an entry into service date of the end of the decade. As to his first point, all the helicopters that we are ordering will be equipped with the Longbow radar.

Sir Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): My right hon. Friend has made a very auspicious start in his new office. His announcement today will be warmly welcomed by the many friends of Westland in the House. But it goes beyond that. The friends of Westland are thinking not just about that company, but about the other companies and subcontractors that will also benefit from the order.

Could my right hon. Friend go a little beyond his announcement and say whether it is a good platform from which Westland could take off and move into export orders on a scale that we have not seen previously, with an attack helicopter that will almost certainly dominate all the export orders from this country and from the United States in the next 15 or 20 years?

Mr. Portillo: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend. He is very generous in saying that I have made an auspicious start, but it must be apparent to him and to the House that I have inherited a huge amount of work done by my predecessor.

I am very pleased for Westland. My right hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for industry and energy visited Westland this morning and presumably he was extremely upset that he was unable to give any hint about the good news. I hope that export opportunities will be created. There is obviously a huge advantage in being linked with a very successful United States programme that already has a very large order book.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): I am very grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. As the hon. Member for Dorset, West (Sir J. Spicer) said, it is his first substantive decision in his new post. If the rest of the decisions that he takes in that post show an equivalent wisdom, I am sure that the nation's defences will have nothing to worry about.

The right hon. Gentleman will understand that my constituents warmly welcome his announcement and, as the hon. Member for Dorset, West said, so will many others across Britain, because the built-in content of the helicopters will provide a boost to British industry across the spectrum. Perhaps one of the most significant features of the decision is the fact that, during a time when everyone recognises that the world helicopter market will change substantially, it places Westland and British industry in a very good position to be able to take advantage of that period of change from a position of strength. That is a considerable testimony to the strength and the skill of Westland and its work force. As I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will agree, it also puts Westland in a very good position in the long term.

Mr. Portillo: I thank the right hon. Gentleman very warmly. I quiver under the gusts of his praise. I am not sure that I aspire to be always so popular with him, but I am very pleased to be so today.

Westland is well placed. If the right hon. Gentleman will be so generous as to share the day with Rolls-Royce, I think that the larger Rolls-Royce engines offer an opportunity for expansion and development of the model over time. That engine has greater flexibility to take us into the future.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): My right hon. Friend will understand that, like my hon. Friend the Member for Medway (Dame P. Fenner), I am disappointed by the result of the competition. GEC has produced a leading-edge technology avionics cockpit. Has my right hon. Friend investigated the possibility of persuading Westland that GEC might make a contribution to the order? Can he confirm whether the fact that we are ordering 67 rather than 91 helicopters is a measure of how much more expensive the Apache was compared with the other two contenders?

Mr. Portillo: There is always great disappointment among those who are not successful in a bid, but I do not think that it benefits anyone to start knocking one model or another. We established a series of criteria and we judged the helicopters on that basis. One criterion was cost-effectiveness. We are able to do the job with the 67 Apaches, as I announced to the House today. I do not want to engage in any sort of banter about the prices of the different helicopters or their performance capabilities, other than to say that it was a fair and objective competition and that there has been a winner.

We have been able to negotiate a 50 per cent. UK content in this helicopter deal. I do not at the moment envisage other opportunities, but of course I would be very happy indeed if different British companies were able to collaborate and if there were any way of increasing, in this or in future orders, the quantity of UK content.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I welcome the Secretary of State's new appointment. Some of us have been concerned about a fair bit of what we called cowboy advertising, so we are delighted that the Apache has been selected. The decision encourages industry all over. Specifically, on behalf of the people not only in Belfast but in Northern Ireland, I welcome the fact that Shorts will have a part to play. Does the Minister agree that there is also international co-operation, since Bombardier in Canada, Thomsons in France and Shorts in Belfast are all joining the team?

Mr. Portillo: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman. His point is perfectly valid. Nowadays there is international collaboration in almost any defence contract one cares to mention. Certainly, it is very good news that Shorts will play such an important part in the production of the Hellfire missiles.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): Does my right hon. Friend accept the unmitigated praise of people in the west country, not only because of our constituents who will work on the contract, but because it meets the Army's demand? Will he answer two questions? Is it a fixed-price contract, or will there be any escalation of cost in later deliveries above that announced? Further to other questions, will he ensure co-operation between his Department, Westland and the Department of Trade and Industry, to do everything to maximise the export potential of this aircraft? It seems that, as long as such co-operation can be brought about, there is a very good chance of obtaining overseas orders that we have never achieved before.

Mr. Portillo: I thank my right hon. Friend. Certainly, on his last point, I give him an absolute reassurance that we shall collaborate to maximise export potential, as on all defence issues and products. We have not yet signed the contracts, of course, but it is my intention that they should be most rigorous. The propositions put forward during the bidding process should be confirmed and cemented in the contracts to be signed.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): May I also most warmly congratulate my right hon. Friend? He has fulfilled two crucial criteria: the operational and the industrial. On the operational side, has he not bought the aeroplane that best met the Army's requirements on payload, range, survivability and all-weather operation? In the industrial context, will he not greatly bolster the long-term future of GKN Westland, in as much as the last aeroplane, the EH101, was an Italian-British collaboration, but the Apache balances that co-operation with an American dimension—the McDonnell Douglas—and furthermore a French dimension, since a significant part of the power plant, the RTM 322, is built at Pau in the south of France?

Mr. Portillo: My hon. Friend has made some helpful additional points. He is absolutely right to say that the Rolls-Royce engine has a large French component. Perhaps I should have been quicker on my feet and mentioned that when I was replying to the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark). It is worth emphasising—I mentioned it in the statement—that Westland is this country's only helicopter maker and the deal is a very important buttress to its position. Certainly, my hon. Friend can be assured that the operational needs of the helicopter were very high in our minds indeed. As I have said before to the House, we are asking people to risk their lives and it is important that the equipment should be able to do the job and that they should have absolute confidence in it.

Sir John Cope (Northavon): My right hon. Friend's decision was bound to please some and disappoint others. In my constituency, there will be great disappointment at British Aerospace on the dynamic side because the long-range TRIGAT was not chosen, but on the other hand there will be great pleasure at Rolls-Royce at the choice of engines. The Anglo-French engine is a very good example of European co-operation, which my right hon. Friend has backed. Will he do his best to try to ensure that the Dutch also choose that engine for their Apache helicopters?

Mr. Portillo: As to my right hon. Friend's last point, I am unsighted as to the stage that the Dutch have reached in making their decision, but it is certainly a good engine. We are buying it partly because we believe that it is suitable for the helicopter and partly because of the commonality that it offers. As to my right hon. Friend's dilemma, in that some of his constituents find themselves happy this evening and some disappointed, I wish him all good luck on his interviews with the local media tonight, but I am sure that he is up to the task.

Sir Kenneth Carlisle (Lincoln): Does my right hon. Friend accept that although we need a reliable attack helicopter, he has made a wrong and strange decision in respect of the engine? The T700 is fitted to existing Apaches and has proved reliable and cheaper. The Americans have it on their attack helicopter, and the Dutch have chosen it for their helicopter. With a fighting machine, one wants something that is proven, can protect lives and has a reliable history. That is certainly not true of the Rolls-Royce engine. The T700, which has as much UK content as the Rolls-Royce engine, is also wanted by the Army. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the Army requested the T700 engine?

Mr. Portillo: I am sorry that my hon. Friend thinks that my decision is wrong and strange. I do not think that it is, although it may be disappointing from my hon. Friend's point of view. As many other hon. Members said, for them my decision is most welcome. My hon. Friend exaggerates when he says that the Rolls-Royce engine is not proven, because clearly it is. It is flying today and available on the EH101 and the Merlin, but it has not yet been used on the Apache. It obviously offers the possibility on the Apache of future growth.

I hope that my hon. Friend, on reflection, will not feel that my decision is as he said. I make it perfectly clear to him that the decision taken today was more broadly based than consideration of the Army. The unit that we established in the Ministry of Defence to conduct the competition took into account the full range of criteria mentioned in my statement, which went beyond some of the criteria of direct concern to the Army—such as the industrial implications. The decision was taken on the basis of the full range of criteria, including the choice of engine.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. I am anxious to call a number of Back Benchers who are still trying to catch my eye, but I cannot do so if there are long statements by Back Benchers and from the Dispatch Box. I hope that questions and answers will be brief.

Mr. Mark Robinson (Somerton and Frome): I join hon. Members who welcome my right hon. Friend's decision, which is good news for Somerset and the west country, and a good confidence booster for Westland, which now has important work to do in export markets as well as in the domestic market. With reference to the comments of the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), one always knows good news—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is the first to offend. I asked for questions, not statements. If the hon. Gentleman has a question, let me hear it. I am not prepared to listen to further statements by any other Back Benchers. Does the hon. Gentleman have a question?

Mr. Robinson: Yes, Madam Speaker. My question is, is not my right hon. Friend's statement good news in our export markets?

Mr. Portillo: It is good news. I am pleased that my hon. Friend is pleased, and I value his support.

Sir Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): Will my right hon. Friend acknowledge that the absence of a purpose-built attack helicopter has been a serious deficiency in the British armed forces for some time and that one important aspect of his announcement is the rectifying of that problem? As I represent a constituency in which Westland is the largest employer, I need hardly say that I welcome my right hon. Friend's announcement, but will he condemn some of the irrelevant and misleading advertising that accompanied the contract and deplore it for the future?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is it in order for him to ask his own question?

Madam Speaker: Order. It is not in order to answer one's own questions.

Mr. Portillo: This is certainly an important capability, which our armed forces must have. Any deficiency that there has been is to be dealt with by my announcement today. I do not want to get into battles with any contractor over this matter. We have had a fair competition and a fair result.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): My right hon. Friend will not be surprised to learn that his decision will come as a shock and a disappointment to those of us from the north-west of England, as he has picked the wrong helicopter with the wrong engine. Can he confirm that all the Apaches will be equipped with Longbow? Will he tell the House the extra costs of fitting the Rolls-Royce engine to the

[Mr. Keith Mans]

Apache, because it has not flown with it before? Will British companies be involved in the production of the long-range TRIGAT?

Mr. Portillo: Our commitment on the TRIGAT was to the end of the development phase: that remains the position. We cease our involvement at the end of that phase. I am sorry that my hon. Friend thinks this the wrong decision. I can confirm again that the helicopters will be equipped with Longbow. There is a small additional cost, which I am not at liberty to reveal, for the Rolls-Royce engine. Nevertheless, the decision passed the test of cost-effectiveness.

Sir Alan Haselhurst (Saffron Walden): On the basis that we must look to the future rather than the past, does my right hon. Friend agree that there must be some further consolidation of British resource in helicopter manufacture if we are to maintain the research and development capability that will enable us meaningfully to participate in future projects?

Mr. Portillo: Those matters go beyond my remit, but perhaps into the remit of the President of the Board of Trade. Certainly, a decision to award a £2.5 billion contract in itself has a fairly important formative effect on the industry.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): My right hon. Friend will understand that, in a collaborative venture such as this, the likes of Westland, Rolls-Royce and Shorts will inevitably hit the spotlight; but he should know that the many other companies that he mentioned will also greatly welcome the success of the contract. I am thinking particularly of Racal Defence in Chessington, in my constituency, and in New Malden. Will my right hon. Friend ensure by means of publicity that all the towns and cities affected by the contract in the form of new jobs are told the facts about it?

Mr. Portillo: My hon. Friend makes an important point. We estimate that 180 companies will benefit from this order, spread throughout the length and breadth of the United Kingdom. Some of them may even be in the constituencies of hon. Members who today have sounded disappointed.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that this decision will go down particularly well in East Anglia, where the Airmobile Brigade is based and where it is shortly to have a new training facility at the former RAF Sculthorpe? As the brigade prepares to go to Bosnia, does he agree that today's decision will do a great deal for its morale?

Mr. Portillo: I thank my hon. Friend. I believe that the decision will indeed be good for morale. It is important that our troops should know that they will get the equipment that they need and that the defence cost studies translate into better equipment for the future.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): May I, as a recent visitor to 24 Airmobile Brigade in Colchester, confirm what my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) has just said—that the order just announced will be widely welcomed in military circles? May I also urge my right hon. Friend and the new Minister of State for Defence Procurement—I congratulate them both on their new appointments—whenever there is an opportunity to place large orders of this sort, to keep the British element in the components package well to the fore? If, for example, he is thinking of buying new heavy trailers for tanks, he should think hard about King Trailers in Market Harborough.

Mr. Portillo: I congratulate my hon. and learned Friend on getting in an early bid for a future announcement. I also echo what he said about 24 Airmobile Brigade. As this is my first opportunity to say so as Defence Secretary, I send that brigade my best wishes on its deployment.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I welcome the fact that 3,000 new jobs are likely to result from the decision to buy the Apache helicopter, but will my right hon. Friend tell us how many jobs could have been created by the alternative bids?

Mr. Portillo: I am not prepared to get into that discussion this afternoon, if my hon. Friend will forgive me. The decision has been taken on a whole range of criteria, including the effectiveness of the aircraft, the cost-effectiveness of the aircraft, its performance in the battlefield and its implications for industry. It has been on the balance of those considerations that today's decision has been taken. I put it to my hon. Friend that if I started to unpick one element of that, I would have to start talking about the comparison across the range of how one helicopter performed against another. I am just not at liberty to do that.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): As my right hon. Friend has shown today, his first concern must be to ensure that our armed forces are properly equipped and supported, to enable them to fulfil their necessary task of defending Britain and our interests. Will he as Secretary of State for Defence think anew and deeply about the economic, strategic and ethical distortions that arise from Britain's excessive dependence on arms manufacture and exports?

Mr. Portillo: I am bound to say to my hon. Friend that my view of the world is different from his. I do not believe it to be disproportionate. I believe that we are involved in equipping our own forces, and in the process we very often produce products of great use to other countries, and other countries have the right to defend themselves, as well as the United Kingdom.

Business of the House

4.15 pm

Mrs. Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): Will the Leader of the House state the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 17 JULY—Proceedings on the Appropriation Bill.

Consideration of Lords amendments to the Licensing (Sunday Hours) Bill.

Consideration of any Lords amendments that may be received to the Child Support Bill.

Consideration of any Lords amendments to the Criminal Appeal Bill.

Motion on the Local Government Elections (Changes to the Franchise and Qualification of Members) Regulations.

Motions relating to the Housing Benefit (General) Amendment regulations and the Social Security (Income Support and Claims and Payments) Amendment Regulations.

Motion on Parliamentary Pensions.

TUESDAY 18 JULY—Motion on the Special Grant Report (No. 15) (Metropolitan Railway Grant 1995-96).

Motions on the Fishing Vessels (Safety Improvements) (Grants) Scheme and the Fishing Vessel (Decommissioning) Scheme.

Motion on the Appropriation (No. 2) (Northern Ireland) Order.

The House will also wish to know that European Standing Committees will meet at 10.30 am on Tuesday 18 July.

[Tuesday 18 July:

European Standing Committee A—Relevant European Community document: 7514/95, Financial Assistance for the Environment. Relevant European Legislation Report: HC 70-xxi (1994-95).

European Standing Committee B—Relevant Community Document: 4966/95, Relations with Mexico. Relevant European Legislation Committee Report: HC 60-xi (1994-95)]

WEDNESDAY 19 JULY—Until 2.30 pm, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House, the first of which will be the three-hour debate on matters to be considered before the forthcoming Adjournment.

Until about 7 o'clock, debate on the First Report of the Select Committee on Standards in Public Life.

Debate on sport on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

The House may be asked to consider any Lords messages that may be received.

As the House may by now have realised, it is proposed that, subject to the progress of business, I intend that the House should rise for the summer Adjournment on Wednesday 19 July. The House may also like to know that I propose that the House should resume on Monday 16 October.

The provisional businesses for the first week back after the summer Adjournment will be as follows:

MONDAY 16 OCTOBER—There will be a debate on a Government motion to approve the Defence Estimates 1995 (CM 2800).

TUESDAY 17 OCTOBER—There will be a debate on a Government motion to approve the Defence Estimates 1995 (CM 2800).

WEDNESDAY 18 OCTOBER—Opposition Day (18th Allotted Day). There will be a debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced.

European Standing Committee B will meet at 10.30 am on Wednesday 18 October.

[Wednesday 18 October:

European Standing Committee B—Relevant European Community document: COM (95) 73, Relations with Japan. Relevant European Legislation Committee Report: HC 70-xiv.]

THURSDAY 19 OCTOBER—Opposition Day (2nd Allotted Day—2nd Part). Until about 7 o'clock there will be a debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced. Followed by a debate on motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 20 OCTOBER—Debate on a science and technology policy on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Mrs. Taylor: I thank the Leader of the House for his statement.

The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Select Committee on Procedure is to report on several issues next week. Will he ensure that there is a debate in Government time on one aspect of its report, the Jopling changes, which have been introduced on an experimental basis this year? When we have such a debate, is it the right hon. Gentleman's intention to provide an opportunity for the House to reach a decision about continuing the new procedures with which we have been experimenting this year?

Secondly, is any change to be made in the scope of Question Time to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster? Is it true that the Deputy Prime Minister and First Secretary of State will be answering questions to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster? If such changes are to go ahead, as we have heard indirectly, will the time allowed for such questions be lengthened in any way from the 20 minutes on a Monday, as I am sure that the Deputy Prime Minister will not be able to say all that he wishes in just 20 minutes?

Thirdly, as the Prime Minister and others have refused to take action on the abuses of executive pay and share options and have refused to comment on what action might be needed until the Greenbury report is published, and as we hear almost daily of ever higher salaries and ever bigger profits from share options, will the Leader of the House ensure that, when the Greenbury report is published, any statement by the Prime Minister or other Ministers is made to the House, so that Ministers can be directly questioned about the need for real action to curb those excesses, which are so offensive to our constituents?

Finally, should we not have a statement before the recess or even a debate in Government time on the implications for the comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty of the French nuclear testing in the Pacific—activities which the Opposition consider to be completely unwarranted and which could jeopardise progress on the test ban treaty?

Mr. Newton: It will not surprise the hon. Lady to know that on the last point I have nothing to add to what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said on Tuesday.

With regard to executive pay, the hon. Lady will know that there is widespread expectation that the Greenbury committee will produce its report in the relatively near future, and I shall of course bear in mind the points that she has made.

With regard to how Question Time will be arranged, no definite decisions have yet been taken and I would envisage further discussion within the usual channels before any such decisions are taken.

Lastly, the hon. Lady is right to anticipate a report from the Procedure Committee on the Jopling reforms and their working in the first year. Again, I would not want to take decisions on that—the hon. Lady might be quite cross with me if I did—before even seeing the report, let alone having chance to discuss it with her. The hon. Lady well knows, however, that I am sympathetic to maintaining the reformed procedures, which have worked well.

Mr. Warren Hawksley (Halesowen and Stourbridge): Will the Leader of the House try to arrange for the Secretary of State for Transport to make a statement next week on the future of Birmingham airport? The need is urgent because the Labour councillors, who have refused to date even to consider offers from West Midland Travel, the Richardson Brothers or other companies in the west midlands, are likely in the next fortnight to enter into a cosy arrangement with an American company to buy a 51 per cent. holding in that airport at less than the best price which could be obtained in the marketplace. It is important that we either debate the matter on the Floor of the House or have a statement from the Secretary of State for Transport.

Mr. Newton: For reasons that my hon. Friend will understand, it would be rash for me to make a promise from the Dispatch Box this afternoon of either a statement or a debate, but I have already mentioned the three-hour pre-recess debate on Wednesday morning. If my hon. Friend cares to raise the matter with me, I will try to ensure that I have some useful information to communicate to him.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): I, too, thank the Leader of the House for his statement.

Following the Government's defeat yesterday in the Statutory Instruments Committee on the draft broadcasting orders, will the right hon. Gentleman tell us when he expects those orders to be debated on the Floor of the House?

Will the Leader of the House also give an assurance that, if a major change in the disposition of British troops in Bosnia is likely, the House will be recalled during the summer recess?

Finally, is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the growing concern which has followed the announcement by the Secretary of State for Employment and Education about nursery vouchers, and the considerable confusion which now exists about the value that those vouchers will have for redemption purposes? Is it possible for the Secretary of State to write to hon. Members during the recess and for a debate to take place during the spillover period?

Mr. Newton: I do not anticipate a debate about the broadcasting orders on the Floor of the House, but I will certainly give the hon. Gentleman such information as I can when I have had a chance to make further inquiries. As for Bosnia, I have made it clear to hon. Members on both sides of the House for a long time that, if events develop in a way which seems to call for a statement, a statement will be made. It can fairly be said that such statements have been made at appropriate times, including one yesterday.

I have the impression that the plans for nursery vouchers have been widely welcomed, but there is more detailed work to be done. That is the purpose of the current consultation.

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): May I endorse the call by the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) for a debate on procedure? Such a debate would enable Conservative Members to explain to the Liberals the rights that they enjoy under the rules of the House to protect the interests of their constituents. Twice this week, Liberal party spokesmen have failed to understand what they can do for their constituents. On one occasion they thought that they could not speak during a debate that they had initiated; on another, they wrongly thought that their speaking time had been limited to 10 minutes. Such debate would provide a valuable opportunity to teach Liberals how to protect their constituents.

Mr. Newton: Given what I have heard, that is rather a good point. I must say that the usual channels on the Government side thought it rather strange that they should, in the end, have to assist the Liberals to keep their own debate going.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Why is next week's debate on Nolan to last for a maximum of three and a half hours? Will not Government statements, speeches by Privy Councillors, amendments moved by individual Members and Front-Bench speeches completely wipe out any Back-Bench contributions? That is not Parliament speaking: it is a rigged debate. Why can we not have more time to deal with the matter?

Mr. Newton: I can only say that the arrangements that I have in mind have been the subject of discussion through the usual channels, and that I believe that they are for the convenience of the House. That is not to say that everyone will necessarily support them, but almost nothing in this place is supported by everyone.

Mr. Roy Thomason (Bromsgrove): Will my right hon. Friend arrange time for a debate on Hackney borough council in the near future, so that the Opposition Front Bench can dissociate itself from that council's actions and from the deplorable attacks on one of its officers and on civil servants that were made in the House yesterday?

Mr. Newton: As it happens, I have been given an account of some of the things that have happened in Hackney, which certainly do not make very happy reading. They include the suspension of the council's director of housing after he had complained that some of his staff were illegal immigrants involved in fraud. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will bear my hon. Friend's comments in mind.

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): May I draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to early-day motion 383?

[That this House welcomes the introduction of the Energy Saving Materials (Limitation of VAT) Bill by a cross-party group of honourable Members on 11th January; notes that the Bill will reduce the level of VAT payable on energy saving materials to 8 per cent. and that this is the same amount of VAT payable on fuel bills; agrees with the view of the former Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Right honourable Member for Kingston-upon-Thames, that a higher level of VAT on energy saving than that existing on energy use 'makes a nonsense of any attempt to use the tax system to improve the environment'; and hopes that the House will find the time to enable the Bill to become law.]

The motion relates to a Bill that I submitted, which proposed a reduction in VAT on energy-saving materials. Will the Leader of the House note that it now has the support of more than half the House? Will he accordingly arrange a debate next week, in Government time, so that we can debate the matter and my Bill can become law, and can receive the support of the House as well as that of the country as a whole?

Mr. Newton: I think that the answer to that is that it was a nice try. I see that the hon. Gentleman considers that fair comment. As he knows, his private Member's Bill is due to have its Second Reading on Friday and its fate is a matter for the House to decide.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): May I join my hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Thomason) in asking for a debate on Hackney council, which is rapidly becoming known as the Monklands of the south? Apart from acting as a haven for illegal immigrants who are employed there, it has a deplorable record, with a large number of empty council houses and large rent arrears.

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend will have heard me say that, on the accounts that I have, the story does not look like a happy one. He may wish to raise it further with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment at Question Time next Wednesday.

Ms Angela Eagle (Wallasey): May I, too, ask the Leader of the House whether it is possible to have a longer debate on the Nolan proposals next week? As a Back Bencher and a relatively new Member of the House, I stand little chance of getting into a debate of the length proposed. In the last Nolan debate, only two new Back Benchers got into the entire debate—I was one of them—although the proposals affect new Members perhaps more than some of the Privy Councillors, who may be leaving us and retiring at the next election. These matters are important for the reputation of Parliament and we need time for a proper debate about them, not a quick run around the houses in two and a half hours. Will the right hon. Gentleman please reconsider, especially as this Session is ending so early in July and there would definitely be extra days, when we could take time to debate those serious and important issues?

Mr. Newton: I cannot add to what I said earlier, although obviously I take note of the hon. Lady's representations, in line with those from the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours).

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): Will my right hon. Friend consider a debate on Islington council, which has been described in a leader in The Times as a "rotten borough"? Is he aware of the strength of the White report into Islington social services, investigating dreadful stories of child abuse, prostitution, drug taking and paedophilia? Does he agree that it is right that the Labour party should come to the House and explain how it came to give that rotten borough so much support?

Mr. Newton: There are an awful lot of questions that I should quite like Labour Members to come forward with answers on, but that has continued to be a triumph of hope over experience and I dare say that it will remain so in relation to Islington.

Mr. Mike O'Brien (Warwickshire, North): May we have an urgent statement from the Attorney-General on the serious allegations made to the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service by senior Queen's Counsel that during the Roger Levitt case the Serious Fraud Office and its counsel provided information to the Attorney-General which caused him to mislead the House on relevant and material matters? In relation to that matter, should we not have an urgent statement and a judicial inquiry into the circumstances?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman will not expect me to accept what he says, but I will of course draw it to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): May we have a debate on the different standards applying to Members of Parliament and to the people who provide the goods and services here in the restaurants and other such places, and on the contrast between the 88 days' holiday that Members of Parliament will be getting and the vile treatment handed out this week to some of the waiters and others who work in the Tea Rooms and elsewhere, who have been told that they must sign a fresh contract involving lower wages and worse conditions, and that if they do not sign it they will get the sack? One of the proposals by the Select Committee on Catering is to get rid of those workers' staff room and to provide a wine bar. Will the Leader of the House withdraw those proposals and ensure that proper negotiations continue?

Mr. Newton: There are two or three points there. First, the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) was dying to answer the point about holidays. I think that I will leave Bolsover to Workington for that purpose. On the other points, the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) will be well aware that those matters are for the Catering Committee, but I draw his attention to the fact that large-scale proposals exist for improving the catering facilities, not least in the interests of the staff. [Interruption.] I do not think that I will bother to go on as the hon. Members for Workington and for Bolsover are having their own wrangle on the other side of the House.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): When can we have a full debate on a subject raised this afternoon in a telephone call to my office—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. If there is to be an argument between the hon. Members for Workington

[Madam Speaker]

(Mr. Campbell-Savours) and for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), perhaps they would have it outside. We all know what they are arguing about and most of us disagree with Mr. Skinner on the point in question.

Mr. Flynn: When can we have a full debate on the subject raised with my office by an elderly man two hours ago? He said that he gave his sick wife, who is suffering from multiple sclerosis, a new medicine which led to her having her best night's sleep for 30 years. In the eyes of the Government, that man and his wife are criminals who could be fined £2,500 and thrown into prison. He could have given her heroin or cocaine, which are legal, but instead he gave her a drug which has never killed anyone, which has been used for 5,000 years, is less poisonous than aspirin and is known to provide relief for serious pain. Why do the Government not accede to the request made by doctors, patients, relatives of patients and many others that they should allow cannabis to be used, not for general medical use but for serious cases—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is making the case that he should make in an Adjournment debate rather than simply asking for such a debate. Let us hear from the Leader of the House whether there will be such a debate next week.

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise a debate. The hon. Gentleman, who is well informed about these matters, will know that there are proper advisory arrangements for Government decisions about such matters. I am sure that his comments will be considered by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health who, as it happens, is due to answer questions on Tuesday.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): In view of the Government's defeat yesterday on the statutory instrument on broadcasting, may we have an early debate to discuss the Government's ability to carry through their own legislation so that we can discuss why the Government were putting forward secondary legislation which could not command the support of their own Back Benchers?

Mr. Newton: That was another nice try. When I was a Back Bencher I engaged in one or two exercises of the kind which appeared to occur yesterday. The hon. Lady will know that she is making too much out of that.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I welcome the fact that the Leader of the House has once again given us advance notice of the October resumption. Is it possible to find out from the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether, in those early weeks in October, he will be introducing the new parliamentary boundaries for Northern Ireland? If not, why is there such a delay?

Mr. Newton: I am not in a position to provide an immediate answer to that and I shall not pretend that I am. I will ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is aware of the hon. Gentleman's points.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): I draw the Leader of the House's attention to early-day motion 748 relating to unpaid Kuwaiti debts in London.

[That this House is gravely concerned at the plight of London businessman Mr. F. Salus, virtually bankrupted by the refusal to pay debts of £75,400 owed to him by two princesses of the Kuwaiti Royal Family, Princesses Nadia and Fatemah Al-Sabah, daughters of Sheikh Jaber Al Alim Al-Sabah, who engaged Mr. Salus to help build luxury flats in South Kensington at Manson Place, SW7, yet have persistently refused to pay Mr. Salus on the ridiculous grounds that they lost money on this investment which is their problem not their contractors, despite the entreaties of such British personalities as the Noble Lord Bethel, Sir Dennis Walters MBE, the honourable Member for Corby, Robert Evans MEP, the honourable Member for Brent East and many others; and considers that, especially in view of the great debt the Kuwaiti Royal Family owes to this country, the Emir of Kuwait should instruct his errant relatives, who are both multi-millionairesses, to make good their obligations to a British businessman whom they have all but ruined.]

The motion deals with the bankrupting of a London business man by two princesses of the Kuwaiti royal family. That royal family was returned to its throne at the point of British weapons just a few years ago. The early-day motion has been signed by 61 hon. Members from both sides of the House and includes in the first six names several knights of the realm, so great is the feeling that this act of meanness and hard-faced hypocrisy on the part of the Kuwaiti royal family should be acted upon by the British Government.

May we have a discussion about our relations with the emirate of Kuwait so that that British business man, who carried out works in good faith for members of the Kuwaiti royal family, can receive the relatively small amount of money for which he was bankrupted and so that relations can be normal between this country and the emirate? I fear that this issue will be a running sore in those relations if we cannot have such a debate and clear the matter up.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman will acknowledge that that is a matter of commercial debt and not something in which the Government could or should intervene. There are methods available to pursue such matters, if appropriate, in the civil courts.

Mr. Don Touhig (Islwyn): Will the Leader of the House find time for a debate on the decision by two universities for large salary and severance payments to be awarded to two vice-chancellors? One vice-chancellor was awarded £411,000 because he agreed not to make any comment for four years about the reasons for his dismissal. Should public money be used to buy the silence of a public servants in that way?

Mr. Newton: I will bring that question to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment.

Mr. John Spellar (Warley, West): Does the Leader of the House accept that, although the Government may wish to avoid parliamentary scrutiny for three months, the public outside do not understand why Parliament is shutting down for three months? It leads to the sort of misunderstandings that we have just seen. Does the Leader of the House accept that it does the image of Members of Parliament no good with the public, and will he reconsider that policy for the future?

Mr. Newton: We are experiencing the usual cross-fire at this time of the year. Most of the House recognises that it is proper for the House to have a break, not least so that Members of Parliament can attend to matters in their constituencies, which they cannot do when the House is sitting four or five days a week. That is widely understood by our constituents and others, but frankly it is not helped when people like the hon. Gentleman seek to mislead them about the true position.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): May we have a ministerial statement next week on today's award of all the contracts for running the Scottish national health service computer centres to a private firm—CSC—especially as I understand that there was under-specification in the contracts to create the illusion of savings in the NHS, as well as a hidden subsidy to the private company through the undervaluing the assets of the computer centres?

Mr. Newton: I will, of course, bring that question to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. I am bound to say, however, that it is my experience that considerable advantages have been secured by using the private sector to undertake computer operations, very much including the social security system.

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): Press reports suggest that the Deputy Prime Minister has expressed the wish that the House should have the opportunity for a debate rather than just a statement on the report on Barings being prepared by the Bank of England. I do not know whether the Deputy Prime Minister has taken over the job of the Leader of the House as well, but can the right hon. Gentleman tell us whether we are to have such a debate?

Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it is high time that we had a debate in Government time on the whole question of supervision and regulation so that we can discuss not only the problems at Lloyd's but those relating to the failure of self-regulation generally? That debate should be held in Government time—rather than in Opposition time, as has happened until now.

Mr. Newton: The right time to start thinking about such a debate is when we have the report of the Board of Banking Supervision.

Points of Order

4.42 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Yesterday I raised a point of order with you about a rave party that had been arranged at county hall and the possibility of it disturbing your peace and contentment. To prove the efficacy of points of order, I can inform you that I have received a letter from the Serjeant at Arms telling me that, following my point of order, permission for the rave event has been withdrawn by the owners of county hall, so you will now be able to enjoy a weekend of peace and contentment and the whole of London will rejoice with you.

Madam Speaker: I shall not be here this weekend, but in my constituency. Nevertheless, I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, although it was not a point of order today any more than it was a point of order yesterday.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. May I have your guidance on how a certain problem can be remedied? Page 4593 of today's Order Paper shows that this evening there will be opportunities for two one-and-a-half hour debates, one relating to the Food Protection (Emergency Prohibitions) (Paralytic Shellfish Poisoning) (No. 5) Order 1995, and the other relating to the No. 6 order on the same subject. We can have up to three hours' debate on that matter; yet the preliminary draft budget for the European Community is not debateable. Surely it is time that we found some way to ensure that Parliament debates issues which matter to many millions of people rather than giving preference to orders about paralytic shellfish, which can be debated for up to three hours.

Madam Speaker: Some of the people who may eat poisoned fish might not appreciate what the hon. Gentleman is saying. The debates are perfectly in order. If the hon. Gentleman wants to change our procedures, he should approach the Procedure Committee.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I want to bring to your attention a matter relating to the statement on defence equipment an hour or so ago. The Ministry of Defence did not deliver any copies of the statement to the Vote Office, with the result that hon. Members from both sides of the House could not obtain copies and so could not question my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in the necessary detail. That appears to be a singular breakdown of the procedures of the House.

Madam Speaker: The usual practice is for the Minister concerned to determine at what time the statement is to be placed in the Vote Office. Some Ministers have the statement put in the Vote Office as soon as they stand up to make it—others when they sit down. It appears that today's statement was not available when the Minister made his statement, but it was for the Minister to determine when it was to be made available. I take the view that it is rather better to have the statement available as soon as the Minister stands up, so that hon. Members can be made aware of what is in the statement and therefore ask rather more intelligent questions.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. I do not think that there can be a further point of order because I have answered it very fully. I do not usually take further points of order. If the hon. Gentleman can make it into another one, I shall listen.

Mr. Thompson: I can make it another one because it relates to the issuing of statements to the Press Gallery, which has not been mentioned. Many hon. Members are disturbed when, as so often happens, the press get statements and information long before Members of Parliament. It is something about which I have felt strongly for 10 years. I hope that you will allow that as a separate point of order.

Madam Speaker: I certainly will, because I feel as strongly as the hon. Gentleman does. I quite understand why Government Departments have to keep the press informed, but there has to be a strict embargo and often, I suspect, the embargoes are not kept. That is when Members of Parliament get very upset and rightly so. I give them full support in their strong feelings on that.

BILLS PRESENTED

Right to Work

Sir Ralph Howell, supported by Mr. Frank Field, presented a Bill to establish the right to work and to impose a duty on the Secretary of State to offer work instead of income support or unemployment benefit to persons who would otherwise be without work in the United Kingdom; to establish a system of grants to certain parents; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 158.]

Fair Employment (Duty on Northern Ireland Industrial Development Board)

Mr. Michael Connarty presented a Bill to make it a duty of the Northern Ireland Industrial Development Board to promote equality of opportunity: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 166.]

ESTIMATES DAY

[3RD ALLOTTED DAY]

ESTIMATES, 1995-96

Class XIII, Vote 1

Social Security

[Relevant documents: Third Report from the Social Security Committee of Session 1994-95 on the Review of Expenditure on Social Security (House of Commons Paper No. 132) and the Social Security Departmental Report: The Government's Expenditure Plans 1995-96 to 1997-98 (Cm. 2813).]

Motion made, and Question proposed.

That a further sum, not exceeding £18,829,738,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges that will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1996 for expenditure by the Department of Social Security on non-contributory retirement pensions, Christmas bonus payments to pensioners, pensions etc., for disablement or death arising out of war or service in the armed forces after 2nd September 1939 and on sundry other services, on attendance allowances, invalid care allowance, severe disablement allowance, disability living allowance; disability working allowance; on pensions, gratuities and sundry allowances for disablement and specified deaths arising from industrial causes; on income support, payments of spousal and child maintenance, child benefit, one parent benefit, family credit, and on the vaccine damage payment scheme.—[Dr. Liam Fox.]

4.46 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I thank you, Madam Speaker, for calling me and I am grateful for the opportunity to debate this group of expenditure measures. It is perhaps a sign of the difficulties that the House has in coming to grips with expenditure that, just as we are about to debate a social security budget fast approaching £90 billion, those few hon. Members who were here have left. The House was moderately crowded for the defence statement, but the defence budget is small compared with the total social security budget.

We must try to apply our minds to where that £90 billion is going, how good a job of stewardship the Government have done in safeguarding the taxpayers' interest and, perhaps more important, how successful the Secretary of State has been in his stated objective of controlling public expenditure on social security.

As I wish to be somewhat critical of the Secretary of State's stewardship, perhaps I should begin with some complimentary remarks. When he was moved to the Department of Social Security, the media, who do not always possess the greatest intelligence, reported his move from Trade and Industry to Social Security as an example of a Minister being dumped by the Prime Minister. Slowly, they have woken up to the fact that if one is not fortunate enough to be Prime Minister or Chancellor of the Exchequer, the place to be for someone who wants to be a big player at the top end of Cabinet table is in charge of the social security brief.

The Secretary of State has brought clear ideas about what he wants to do with his budget. This is, I think, the first full-scale debate that we have had in which we can examine at ease his stated objectives and see how well he is achieving his goals. I should, however, sound a note of warning before we begin.

If we go back to Tory election manifestos and the excitement of election campaigns, we find that the talk was a little looser than it is today—it was about cutting social security expenditure; the goal then became to cut real growth in social security spending and it was limited to whether expenditure could be restrained so that it grew at a lower rate than the underlying rate of growth in the economy. I want to consider the Secretary of State's programme within that framework.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said yesterday that he thought that the economy was growing at 4 per cent. a year. For the purposes of our debate, we should look carefully at the Government's record on growth and use it as our yardstick to compare how successful they have been in bringing the rate of growth of social security expenditure below the rate of growth of GDP.

Before I do so, I want to emphasise how important the debate is to many of our constituents. A short while ago, I was invited to write a column in The Sun and I willingly accepted. When I write a piece for the broadsheets, I am lucky if I get two or three letters—I am very lucky if I get two or three reasoned letters. I received about 50 letters as a result of that article in The Sun. One or two people said that if Labour had views like mine they were going to vote Tory.

I am not sure what they read into the article. A recent article in Nature suggested that the ear does not relay messages to the brain but that the brain controls what the ear hears. It is clear that the brain also controls what some people's eyes see. I received two outstanding letters, one of which I shall quote later. The other was written by one of my constituents and said how important it was that we consider carefully how our social security budget is spent. She wrote:

"I am 65 and have been a widow since 1985, but I am still working 3 full days each week with a Liverpool based company, which enables me to maintain my home (which I own) and to keep a reasonable standard of living.

I realise I am lucky to have a job and an employer who is prepared to retain may services at my age, but because of my State pension, I am paying Income Tax to the tune of approximately £130 per month on my salary. Money, I may add, which I worked quite hard for and which, if it remained in my pocket, would make a considerable difference to my way of life.

However, I look around and see, not far from me, people much younger than I who are not working, some possibly because they cannot get a job, but a great number of whom, I am sure, do not want to work, and do not see the necessity to work, whilst they are receiving such good benefits from the Welfare State, and I know that the tax I have to pay is helping to provide these benefits."

We do not approach this debate in a light mood. We are very mindful of the fact that every day the welfare state has to be paid for by people in work such as my constituent, who is a pensioner and who pays £130 a month towards our welfare state. I shall return in a moment to how we should deal with a dependency culture and meet some of the other points in that letter.

Not long ago, the Secretary of State give the Mais lecture, in which he gripped his audience by saying that, on average, each day everybody in work pays £13 towards the cost of maintaining the welfare state. Less than 18 months later, he gave a similar lecture which updated his point to the Social Market Foundation. In it he said that, on average, every day people in work paid £15 towards the cost of underwriting our welfare state.

[Mr. Frank Field]

We have a paradox. The Secretary of State—of whom, I should have thought, most of us now have the measure—is serious about reforming the welfare state and wishes to cut growth in expenditure on it. A range of Bills has scrapped earnings-related supplements to national insurance benefits, cut benefits for disabled people and scattered asunder the remains of SERPS, but the daily cost of the welfare state to those in work has risen.

On one criterion it does not appear that the Secretary of State is succeeding. Welfare bills are increasing, but we can look at those figures another way. We know that the Secretary of State has made cuts: I am not accusing him of dishonesty or deceit. At general election time, the Government have always been clear about their programme. If ever a Government have had a mandate for their programme, it is this one.

After the latest round of cuts, the real budget for social security in the period 1994-95 to 1997-98 will rise by 1.3 per cent. The hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) is a member of Social Security Select Committee. When we were drawing up the report that forms the backdrop to our debate, he noted that the rapid upward push in the cost of benefits is continuing. Between 1997-98 and the end of the century—not many years—the real cost of welfare will rise by 2.1 per cent. That is another criterion by which to judge the Government.

Over the period of the Government's stewardship since 1979, the growth in the economy has been 1.9 per cent. After the latest rounds of cuts in welfare provision, the real cost will go up by 2.1 per cent. The Government's much-modified objective of controlling expenditure to below the real rate of increase in the economy is going to fail. I look forward to hearing how the Secretary of State will reply to that.

Their failure, of course, is not across a broad canvas; it is a failure on quite a narrow focus, on which I wish to make my contribution. I hope that it will be followed up by many other hon. Members.

The welfare state has three forms of benefit—national insurance benefits, for which we pay into the national insurance fund; what are called non-contributory national insurance rates or non-contributory, non-means-tested benefits, which go to people in certain categories such as parents who claim child benefit; and benefits that go only to those whose income is low and who qualify after a test of income. It is crucial that we consider which benefits are growing fastest and cause the most concern among not only the Government and Opposition Front Benchers but people outside such as my constituent who have to pay the bill. They wonder, if the present strategy continues, what scenario will meet us shortly after the turn of the century.

Let me break down the figures. The Government's record up to 1992-93 shows that the real-terms growth in contributory benefits was 1.6 per cent. The increase in non-contributory benefits, many of which are disablement benefits, was 6.9 per cent.

What has been the real-terms rate of increase in the means-tested side of the welfare state? I hope that we shall note from the Secretary of State's response to this debate, if he is lucky enough to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that there has been a subtle change in the Treasury's approach to means testing. In the early Thatcher years, Ministers would wave their arms and legs and say that means testing was the way forward to concentrate help on those in greatest need and to target benefits. We hear a slightly different message from the Treasury Bench now, and I hope that we shall hear a development of that theme a little later in the debate.

Income support for pensioners has risen by 5 per cent. For those below retirement age, it has risen by 10.6 per cent. and for rent allowances it has risen by 15 per cent. Before the latest attempt to extend family credit to those without children, the figure for family credit had risen by more than 20 per cent. The Secretary of State's failure to control the social security budget is not a failure across the whole broad sweep of policy. His failure to meet his objective is caused by the great emphasis that the Government place on means-tested assistance.

Means-tested assistance is the destabilising part of the welfare state. The Secretary of State argued before the Select Committee that the present bill was not sustainable because of the impact that it would have on the functioning of the economy. There must clearly come a point when, if welfare bills are pushed up to a gigantic level, the economy is impaired. I think that the instability is caused by something much more important: the number of people whom we are now putting on means-tested assistance.

When I make a charge against that side of the welfare state, I make a charge against us—specifically the Treasury Bench. I am much tougher than the Secretary of State on fraud, and have no room for those who wrongly claim benefit. I am sure that other hon. Members will try to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and talk about how partial the Secretary of State still is to dealing with the issue as we would wish to see it dealt with, but he is a happy recidivist on that. Each time, he tries to take a tougher approach to deal with fraud and we are here to encourage him in that.

Means tests have a double effect on our constituents. First, they teach them to behave rationally and work the system—I shall give an example of that in a moment—and I do not blame my constituents or those from Colchester, where someone who wrote another letter is from, for doing so. They are behaving rationally within the framework that the House has set for them and in which they must operate.

On the other side of the coin, some people decide that income support and means-tested benefits should be some form of basic income and that they should claim it and continue to claim it while they work and do all sorts of other activities. I am now talking about how it destroys people's sense of worth, their desire to behave as decent citizens and the importance that we stress on working, saving and being honest.

The second letter says:

"I am 59 years of age and was made redundant in August, 1994 (for information this was the 7th time I have been made redundant since 1976). In the past, I have always managed to obtain employment, mainly due to my knowledge and management skills. However, although I have applied, written, and telephoned over 300 companies during the past 10 months seeking any form of employment, even down to collecting empty trolleys at supermarkets or cleaning offices/factories, I have had no success mainly due to my age."

The person goes on:

"My wife and I have always been great believers in helping ourselves as against making claims against the State and, therefore, when I was unemployed in the past we used our savings, plus our then borrowing power, to pay our bills, rather than claim benefits. This obviously has meant that we have not had a holiday for over 10 years.

As my wife presently works between 40 and 48 hours per week and has a net wage of an average of £100 per week we are unable to claim any benefits other than unemployment benefit. We are advised by the benefits agency that, due to my wife working over 16 hours per week, once my unemployment benefit ceases in August 1995, we shall have to exist on her wage, or, as suggested by the social benefits and employment offices, my wife should cease work and my claim for benefit would then be considered . . .

I am informed that, based on current benefit figures, my wife and I would receive approximately £100 a week plus possible mortgage interest assistance, that being applicable when I reach 60 years of age in September of 1995."

Is it not absurd that rather than that man's wife continuing to work for £100 a week, he can draw benefits of perhaps £125 or £150 a week if his wife stops working? Would not it be better for him to be able to continue to draw unemployment benefit and for his wife to continue working? The cost of that to the taxpayer would be a third of what will happen under the rules in September, when his wife will be forced out of work because they will be better off on benefit. They are skint, they have used their savings and they are afraid that their house will be repossessed. They continue in the letter:

"We have already had to live through the loss of our 2 daughters in 1969 and the loss of our home now would be more than we could stand."

They will stop working and will draw three times as much in benefit. It will appear as a saving in one account but, the following week, it will appear as a deficit and help to explain why the Secretary of State cannot control the budget as he wishes. There is nothing dishonest about those people. As the House has just heard, they have worked hard all their lives, scrambled for jobs and used up their savings. They will now behave rationally within the rules that the Government have set. It often pays not to work and to work the system.

Others, of course, feel differently and are not quite so conscientious as that person from Colchester; they feel that income support and housing benefit are there for the taking as of right. They think that it is a basic income that people should use, and they add to it whatever income they can get from work.

The means-tested side of the welfare state is the fastest growing side. It penalises people if they get a job, confiscates their savings and taxes honesty. It cannot be sensible for a country to have a welfare state, the fastest growing part of which has those effects on human character. We have lived through an important time in which the Secretary of State, with a clear vision of what he has wanted to do, has come to his Department, seen the enormous opportunity to apply his own ideas and ideology and bring about change. Yet as I said at the beginning, the figures do not look good given his objectives for the welfare state.

We can all learn lessons from this tale. I do not believe that we can control public expenditure, or the largest part of it—a third of all the money contributed by taxpayers—if we have a strategy like the one pursued by the Government, which pushes more and more people on to means tests and then finds it impossible to control that part of the budget. It is impossible to control it because, as I described using the example of the gentleman from Colchester, it is rational. The only option is to work the system, and doing so, in that instance and many others, increases the cost of welfare not onefold but threefold, and people feel a failure because they have been unable to get a job. They must now exist totally on benefit—something that the family from Colchester have fought all their lives.

Other people believe that welfare is an easy touch. I welcome the statement that the Secretary of State made recently—and, I believe, the other eight that he has made—on clamping down on fraud, but he has a long way to go.

The Select Committee is considering that matter with deadly seriousness. It is easy enough to pick on single mothers and those who work on the side—although the Secretary of State has not quite got the measure of either of those yet in the fraud clampdown that he has announced—but we are equally worried about the fraud that sophisticated gangs must be perpetrating against that £90 billion budget. It is inconceivable that the budget is somehow gated by behaviour characteristic of the garden of Eden. Given what we know about City fraud and fraud in financial institutions, it is unthinkable that similar techniques are not being used against our budget of £90,000 million.

I believe that we do not yet have the measure of people committing that type of fraud. I fear that the task will be fraught with danger for those officers who begin to get a grip on it. Not so long ago, some people were sentenced to life imprisonment for shooting officers who were checking up on MOT frauds. We shall be tackling very nasty, very vicious, very violent people who are uninterrupted in their activity in ripping off our £90,000 million social security budget on a mass scale.

For that reason, I call for officers of the highest quality—of Special Air Services quality and rewards—to undertake that task for us, for I fear that it may not be that long before the Secretary of State has to come to the Dispatch Box to announce what has happened to some of the officers in his Department when they do get to grips with fraud in that sector.

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North-West): Does my hon. Friend agree that, if the Secretary of State's recent estimates about the scale of fraud are correct, it must mean that, during the stewardship—to use one of my hon. Friend's favourite words—of the present Government, billions and billions of pounds have been fraudulently used? Is that not a matter of great concern? In spite of the platform rhetoric at seaside resorts every year, the Government have effectively been soft on fraud.

Mr. Field: I like teasing the Secretary of State that he is soft on fraud and soft on the causes of fraud, but he is getting better and we should encourage him in that endeavour.

My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We have always heard such rhetoric from the Conservative party at elections and at party conferences. Given the partial nature of the current measures, if they had been introduced in 1979, not only would we have ensured that improved anti-fraud measures were now in place but huge tranches of money would have been saved for taxpayers. My constituent who pays £130 a month in taxes on her three days of work a week is the type of person who has been cheated.

[Mr. Field]

I do not believe that the Government have a strategy other than cutting entitlement and, late in the day, trying to screw down on fraud. If we are to bring the budget under control successfully, we must propose an alternative programme.

In conclusion, I shall mention three things that I believe that we must do. Before the millennium, we shall receive the full force of taxpayers' opinions about what they want to happen to public expenditure. The thought that we can maintain public expenditure at the present level is an illusion that politicians should not have.

Opposition Members may pretend that it will not happen—and allow public opinion to hit us in the face—or try to devise strategies whereby we leap ahead of where the electorate will be in a few years' time and set out an alternative stall.

I hope that we shall consider carefully the proposal of hiving off the national insurance side to a corporation or perhaps, to use a more friendly phrase, an organisation run by the punters themselves—both contributors, employers and employees—with the Government having a say. That organisation would set rates of benefit and gradually take over what is currently the national insurance system.

It would cover the whole of that sector in time, but it would, for example, tackle the problems that the letter that I have just read reveals. If people could quickly requalify for insurance benefit when they were unemployed, as they could under the 1911 scheme, many more people would be prepared to take risky jobs, hoping that the job would last long enough that they at least got their insurance credits back so that they could again benefit. We know that, if they received benefit, their wives and other members of the family could continue to work and they would not get caught back on means-tested assistance. We know that, once most of our constituents are on means-tested assistance, it is almost impossible for them to break free.

The second long-running reform is to ensure that everyone has at least one pension other than the state retirement pension: in other words, universalise private provision of pensions; everyone will have to be in. If Tesco can run a pension scheme that admits part-time workers after the first hour of work, everyone can run an equivalent scheme, or at least allow people to opt into a national scheme that provides such coverage.

The final thing that we must do if we are ever to control the estimates that we are debating today is to change totally the culture of income support, which is that of a passive agency, paying out benefit, into one that is proactive, helping people back into the labour market.

I propose that everyone on income support who is below retirement age should be expected to draw up career plans and use their income support payments to achieve those objectives.

In previous debates, my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Wicks) has given us a powerful example of why that change should occur. He gave us the example of a single parent in his constituency, visiting her income support office, saying to officers that she wished to become a traffic warden. The officers fell about laughing. They said, "You've got it wrong, love. Our job's to pay out money; it's not to help you get a job."

That is an appalling state of affairs. Those officers were behaving properly. Their job was to pay out money, not to help claimants achieve the objective of getting back into work.

I know that problems are involved with such a scheme, such as how to ensure that child care is available—which probably goes beyond giving a few people already receiving child care, vouchers worth £1,000 a year. However, we must change that culture of drawing benefit and then merely existing on benefit if we are to achieve significantly greater success than the Secretary of State in controlling growth in social security expenditure.

I finish as I began. The Government have made wild claims about the way in which the social security budget, the largest of any Government budget, will be controlled. Their first objective was to hack it back, then it was to cut it in real terms, then it was to control the increase in real terms and then it was to cut it enough so that in real terms it was growing slower than the real long-term growth in the economy.

The figures that I gave at the beginning show that the Government have failed on all those objectives. I do not present those figures merely to crow at the Government. This is an immensely serious debate. The social security budget is the largest part of expenditure to which taxpayers contribute each week with their hard-earned money, and the Government have failed to control it. I hope that, before the general election, we shall make proposals that show that there is an alternative to the present regime.

5.19 pm

Ms Liz Lynne (Rochdale): I want to praise the report by the Select Committee on Social Security. It is very constructive and it has a great deal of common sense in it, especially the call for more regular information on expenditure and growth and the recommendation for more research, which is needed for the wide range of benefits that we are discussing. The most radical idea in the report is that Government Departments should estimate the cost of their policy decisions on the social security budget. I sincerely hope that the Government will take that idea on board. There are so many areas that such estimates could cover, including housing and employment.

The abolition of the wages councils obviously had a tremendous effect on the social security budget. The Government spend £2 billion subsidising low-paying employers and they top up the earnings of 1.7 million people. Far from the Government learning from the abolition of the wages councils, they have taken matters a step further and we now have the jobseeker's allowance. On Report in another place on the Jobseekers Bill, the Government opposed an amendment that would have given the right to every person to turn down a job for which the wage was lower than benefit. In other words, the Government have rigged the labour market, because benefit will be stopped if the claimant does not take the low-paid job. Employers will be able to offer wages lower than the wages that they offer at the moment, because they know that unemployed people will have all their benefits cut unless they take the low-paid job.

For single people and couples with no children, the introduction of the jobseeker's allowance could mean that they will live below the poverty line. I know that the Government are introducing pilot schemes to look at benefits similar to family credit for those with no children and for single people. Already, however, couples with children have to have their earnings topped up by family credit and the family credit budget is continuing to soar; it has doubled in the past four years. Employers are exporting their wage bills to the taxpayer, which is totally unacceptable.

The same point applies to housing. If Government Departments had to estimate the cost of their policy decisions on the social security budget, would the control of council house receipts remain? I very much doubt it. If that policy were adopted, unemployed building workers could get back into work. Other employers would be able to take on people, because the knock-on effect of houses being built would be to the benefit of suppliers to the building industry. If councils were allowed to spend the receipts, there would be low-cost, local authority housing, which would stem the rise in the housing benefit bill. It must make economic sense for the Government to adopt that policy.

The Select Committee stressed the disturbing growth in means-tested benefits; it talked about the unemployment trap and about the low-income employment trap. The Committee looked, but it failed, unfortunately, to recommend that the tax system should be looked at at the same time as benefit reform. By close integration of the tax and benefit systems, the effects of unemployment and the poverty trap would be somewhat mitigated.

At the time of the Budget, the Liberal Democrats suggested that we should take 50,000 low-income earners out of the tax system, which would have helped with the family credit bill. I know that, with all the publicity last week, another report by the Select Committee on Social Security, which dealt with the compensation recovery unit, was somewhat ignored. Reforms would reduce the injustice suffered by personal injury victims and would mean that, instead of the money being clawed back by the Treasury from the victim, it would be clawed back from the employer. That proposal would be revenue-neutral for the Treasury. I would be grateful if the Minister, when summing up, would refer to the proposal.

Another area that has been well documented in the past few days is benefit fraud and I welcome the Government's initiative on that, although it has to be said that they have introduced many initiatives, but have not followed them through. The initiative will not be taken seriously by the claimants who are defrauding the system unless they can see that tax fraud is treated equally. I welcome the survey by the Department of Social Security and its estimates of the money that is lost in benefit fraud. I would like the Treasury to carry out a similar exercise on tax evasion. How can we persuade people in a lower income bracket and those who defraud the benefit system to be honest when people at the higher end defraud the tax system?

The main aspect of the Select Committee report which I welcome is that all Government Departments should assess the cost of their policies on the social security budget. That is the way in which to get the social security budget down instead of penalising the people whom the Government penalise at the moment—the unemployed, who will be affected by the cut from 12 months to six months of benefit, and disabled people. I hope that the Government will look seriously at the initiatives set out in the Select Committee report, which I commend to them.

5.26 pm

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I say for the record that the London borough of Newham is the most deprived local authority area in England and Wales, according to statistics from the Department of the Environment. As someone who represents and lives in the area, I can bear witness to the general level of poverty in the east end of London—in Newham, Stratford, Upton Park and West Ham. Strangely, I get far angrier—it is not synthetic anger—than my constituents when I see the poverty that they have to deal with.

I am unmoved by talk of the need to crack down on fraud, not because I am in favour of fraud, but because I am far more concerned about people who do not receive benefits to which they are entitled. I am more concerned about them than I am about those who are trying to get more out of the system than they should. I am a great supporter of those who want to crack down on fraud, but I am an even greater supporter of those who want to make sure that the benefits go to those who need them most and that people are receiving what they are entitled to.

I do not understand how some people in my area exist from breakfast to dinner—assuming that they get either a breakfast or a dinner. They have to live on levels of income that Members of Parliament have no experience of whatever. Members of Parliament will spend more on the Terrace this evening—so will I—than some individuals have to spend in a week. I am not claiming that I am impoverished—far from it. However, when I hear Members of Parliament going on about levels of benefit and about how we need to ensure that they are appropriate, I realise that there is a great stench of hypocrisy, as ever, hanging around this place.

More than 18,000 people in Newham are unemployed and there is an unemployment rate of 19.5 per cent. Some 85,592 people in the borough depend on income support. Unemployed people make up 41 per cent. and lone parents make up 19 per cent. of income support claimants. Those figures show the extent of the poverty in my part of the east end. This evening I draw attention to the changes that will be introduced on 1 October in respect of mortgage interest payments.

Mr. Frank Field: The figures that my hon. Friend has cited from his borough are very interesting, because they are the exact opposite of the national figures, which show that the number of unemployed people drawing benefit is exceeded by the number of people heading single-parent families and trying to raise children on their own. That illustrates the fact that recent labour market policies have decimated jobs to the extent that inner-city areas do not reflect the national average, which shows that twice as many single parents are drawing benefits compared with unemployed people. In our areas, there are twice as many unemployed benefit claimants as lone parent benefit claimants.

Mr. Banks: As usual, my hon. Friend makes an excellent point and we all defer to his expertise in such matters.

Speaking as a lay person, I would like the Secretary of State and his Ministers to sit in my advice surgeries and hear what is going on. I want them to see the situation for themselves, instead of sitting in Departments and receiving advice from civil servants. I am not suggesting that the Secretary of State and his Ministers do not visit offices in their constituencies and listen to people's problems, but if they could visit the east end, be a fly on the wall and listen to people's stories, perhaps they might show greater concern for low levels of benefit rather than constantly making accusations and creating the impression that people are living the life of Riley on income support or social security benefit. It is certainly not the sort of life that I would want to lead—even on the most generous level of benefits currently available.

I want to ask the Secretary of State about some of the changes to come into effect on 1 October. It appears that most people under 60 years of age who buy a house or take out a loan for repairs after 1 October will receive no income support assistance with mortgage interest or service charges for nine months. That is outrageous. Ministers have been lobbied about the matter and some groups have been granted a reprieve. As I understand it, they will be classed as existing borrowers. But what about recently deserted or widowed people, who will be included in that group only if they have children? We believe that the decision will cause great hardship to many women in my area who have spent years as carers and so do not have any employment. The Minister must consider that point.

There is also the question of the standard rate of interest. Income support mortgage interest is currently calculated on the actual amount of interest. The change to a standard rate of interest for all claimants will be set at the average mortgage interest rate for probably an annual period. Those with high interest rates will have a shortfall, which benefit will not cover, and that will affect particularly those people on low incomes who end up with expensive loans. That will create enormous problems in my area.

Assistance with accumulated arrears is to be abandoned. Interest will no longer be paid for arrears built up during the initial non-payment period and that will lead to increased debt and homelessness. The Government's excuse for abandoning that assistance is that the calculations are very complex—but so are the calculations for child support, and it has not been abandoned. The calculations could be made if the Government had the political will to do it.

I return to the effect of the changes in Newham. After 1 October, they will take effect slowly and insidiously over two or three years as new claims are made and more people are affected by the restrictions. Last year, Bow county court dealt with 4,000 mortgage repossession cases. Where do people go after that? They turn to the local authority. I get very angry with the Government for deflecting those problems to the local authority, which then has a statutory obligation to try to house the people whose homes have been repossessed.

Bed-and-breakfast accommodation comes into play. We are still spending millions of pounds on the provision of short-term and bed-and-breakfast accommodation. The Government simply shift the problem from their jurisdiction to that of the local authority. Conservative Members then talk about high rent arrears and empty local authority housing stock. They say that the problems are the responsibility of the local authority and they ask why nothing is being done. The Government think that they are dealing with the problems, but they are not: they are simply shifting them somewhere else.

Mr. Field: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way again. Last Friday I visited Salford, where the citizens advice bureau provides a service in the courts for people who face homelessness through repossession. That work underlines the point that my hon. Friend made earlier about people receiving the entitlements that they deserve. The CAB finds that many people who face eviction because of mounting debts—the situation will worsen when the changes are introduced—are not receiving their proper entitlements. There may be minor savings initially but, as my hon. Friend pointed out, there is a massive increase in public expenditure when people whose homes have been broken and whose families have been torn asunder are placed in bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

Mr. Banks: My hon. Friend represents a constituency that is not dissimilar to my own, and he has seen the evidence. We are not making up the stories. The changes will not affect our personal circumstances, but they will affect the people whom we represent. Members of Parliament have a duty to bring those facts to the Secretary of State's notice. Instead of listening to arid discourse from departmental staff, he should listen to those who represent the people who are most affected. That is why we bring our cases to the Secretary of State.

The Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Peter Lilley): In addition to bringing the cases to my attention—I have listened attentively to his comments and I know that his argument has a great deal of force—has the hon. Gentleman had any success in persuading his own Front Bench to increase the level of benefits? Did he hear his leader say this week that benefits should be altered and that there should be massive reform of the welfare state, so that benefits out of work are less than what people receive in work?

Mr. Banks: Only time will tell whether I am having any success. I assure the Secretary of State that I would be far happier taking my case to a Secretary of State of my own political persuasion, because I am sure that my colleagues understand the problems better and would take a far more realistic approach to the level of benefit.

I shall be honest with the Secretary of State: my argument will not alter—in fact, I shall be twice as angry—if a Labour Government do not address the problems of the east end, because the people of the east end have loyally supported the Labour party for generations. They are entitled to expect assistance from a Labour Government whom they elect. I am sure that they will receive that satisfaction. But if they do not, I assure the Secretary of State that my voice will be raised most stridently on their behalf. However, I suspect that my support will not be needed to the same extent that it has been needed since 1983.

I shall not detain the House much longer. I seek clarification from the Secretary of State about two more issues in the context of the estimates debate. I understand that the new in-work benefit pilot, the earnings top-up, is a benefit like family credit, but for people without children. It is a means-tested top-up for people on low wages. It will pay up to £54 per week, with an average of £23 per couple and £19 for a single person aged 25 and over. It amounts to a subsidy for low wage rates.

Conservative Members ask what a minimum wage will cost, but what is it already costing the taxpayer to subsidise rotten employers who pay lousy, stinking, strip-out wages? No one in this place would work for such wages. They would laugh; they would not even get out of bed. If Members of Parliament were offered that sort of rate for a BBC or an ITV interview, they would turn it down. Of course, I would not turn it down; I would do it for free, as hon. Members well know—but that is another matter. Money does not interest me in the same way as it interests so many on the Government Benches. We are talking about ludicrous wage levels, and we are asking the taxpayer to subsidise rotten employers. The sooner we get a decent minimum wage in this country, the better. In the end, it would be a saving for the taxpayer.

In the earnings top-up pilot scheme, a number of areas have been selected, but none of those is in London. I would like to know rather more about that. Even though I do not over-approve of the idea of subsidising rotten wages, why has not any area in London been chosen? There are plenty of rotten, low wages paid in London.

The Secretary of State announced new initiatives to combat fraud on 11 July. I made the point at the beginning of my speech that I am not here to support fraud, but I am also not here to support this hue and cry about fraud and its use as a divisive mechanism in our society. The idea that, nudge, nudge, wink, wink, anyone receiving social security is on the fiddle, seems gradually to be creeping into the public consciousness. It is expressed so often in vulgar opinion. I might add that I heard my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) talk about his article in The Sun. I understand that it pays very well for articles, incidentally.

Mr. Field: I am still waiting.

Mr. Banks: My hon. Friend is waiting to be paid. Perhaps he needs a good agent. I am quite prepared, for a reasonable remuneration, to hurry it along a bit.

The Sun is one of those newspapers that tends to suggest that somehow people who are on benefit are getting some sort of handout to which they are not entitled; it is really a fraud being perpetrated on the population at large. It is very dangerous to use such words and give that impression.

We understand that fraudulent claims cost the taxpayer £1.4 billion a year and it is absolutely right that something should be done about it. But when do we hear Ministers waxing about the number of people who fiddle their Inland Revenue claims, or employers who fiddle national insurance? Where are all the initiatives to bang that stuff out? Such white-collar fraud in the City, by employers and by those who are evading tax, amounts to billions and billions of pounds and makes the fraud on social security seem like money in the old back pocket.

I would be much more impressed by the Government's determination to crack down on fraud if they took an even-handed approach; if they were as rigorous in trying to deal with Inland Revenue and national insurance fraud as they are with respect to the payment of benefits.

I want to ask the Secretary of State a specific question about home visits, because I notice that, in the endeavour to cut fraud, there is talk of 300,000 extra home visits across the country. When a home visit is deemed to be required—for example, when the person involved is a single parent—are they planning to reduce income support until that visit has taken place? This is important. I want to know whether my constituents will lose while they wait for a home visit. Although 300,000 extra home visits are planned, I suspect that the Department will soon start saying that it has not got the staff for them. I do not want to find that potential claimants are penalised for waiting for a visit when there are simply not enough Benefits Agency staff to ensure that that visit takes place.

I return to the question of those who do not get the benefit to which they are entitled, as my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead said. From Government figures, we estimate that in Newham something like £12 million a year in means-tested benefits is simply not being taken up. What is the Secretary of State going to do about that? When he shows as much enthusiasm for ensuring that people who are entitled to benefit get benefit, I will be equally enthused by his attitude towards some of the other things that he constantly talks about, such as fraud and targeting benefits on people who are most entitled to them.

Perhaps those points put a little flesh on these bare estimates. They come as a witness from someone who has to deal with a whole range of poverty. The worst poverty of all that I have to experience in the east end is the poverty of expectation. The people I represent have a very low level of expectation. I want to ensure that their sights are heightened and that they have a vision of a better society in which they can receive a decent level of benefit when they need it. That is what we want, and I am quite sure that, when my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) is the Secretary of State for Social Security, that is exactly what we shall get.

5.44 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), who explained well the plight of the people whom he represents and the poverty throughout the east end of London. Indeed, one would find similar levels of poverty in every inner-city region in England, Wales and Scotland. The Evening Standard report on the levels of poverty in London makes very grim reading. Within a 15-minute car journey from this House, one can find people living third-world levels of existence, health and expectation in a supposedly wealthy and prosperous society.

The Government complacently preside over a social security budget which they claim is growing very fast, and say that it cannot continue to do so, yet at the same time, statistics have shown that, since the Government came into office, the biggest growth in inequality of any industrialised country, the biggest growth in poverty among industrialised countries and the biggest growth of the super-rich among industrialised countries have all been in Britain.

That is a direct result of a taxation system and policy that has given huge tax breaks and rewards to the already very rich and soaked the poor to the extent that they now pay more in taxation than ever before. The poorest 10 per cent. of the population, who tend to reside in the inner cities, although not exclusively, have seen their living standards fall by at least 14 per cent. over the past decade and more, and it is getting considerably worse for them.

[Mr. Jeremy Corbyn]

Within that context, we must measure the Government's proposals and plans. I am fed up with social security debates being dominated by two factors: the costs of the social security system and the question of benefit fraud that goes with it. I have no time for fraud, any more than any other hon. Member. The speeches of my hon. Friends the Members for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and for Newham, North-West outlined that. The Government have an obsession with dealing with the idea that somebody has over-claimed 10 quid on housing benefit or somebody has worked two hours more than he is allowed under the benefit rules and therefore is a serious fraudster.

Meanwhile, high levels of white-collar crime go on and huge syndicates are at work defrauding the housing benefit system. The London Labour boroughs got together as a consortium to try to sort that out, with precious little thanks or support from the Government for doing so. In fact, the Government condemned the boroughs for allowing such fraud to exist in the first place. It was not the assiduousness of the Department for Social Security or of the Secretary of State that sorted that out, but the inner-London boroughs.

Mr. Frank Field: Does my hon. Friend recall that some of the London boroughs wishing to bring prosecutions against landlords and landlords' agents who were ripping off the housing benefit budget to a tune which I do not think that the House yet properly understands, and were told when they presented their information to the Serious Fraud Office that it did not understand enough and that the boroughs should bring the cases. Yet those boroughs either have been rate-capped or face capping and therefore do not have the funds to bring the desired prosecutions. Is that not an extraordinary state of affairs?

The Government say that they are serious about fraud, but when certain London boroughs support them and become serious about tackling it, and there is a chance of bringing into court some very rich people who are taking enormous sums out of the housing benefit budget, the case falls to the ground because nobody wants to foot the bill for the prosecution.

Mr. Corbyn: My hon. Friend is right. He makes a very important point with which I hope that the Secretary of State will deal when he replies. Those big fraudsters should be taken to court and the Government should ensure that the resources are available and that the Serious Fraud Office takes the cases. Whenever there is a growing problem to the extent that the Government cannot handle or control it, they pass it to local authorities. At the same time, the Government make damn sure that local authorities do not have the resources necessary, then criticise them for not solving the problem. Local authorities are the perfect enemy for a Tory Government. It is like an obsession for them.

The large increase in housing benefit expenditure does not benefit the tenant. The budget has grown because of rent deregulation in the private sector, the rapid increase in housing association rents and the almost as rapid increase in local authority rents. Local authorities do not benefit from administering the housing benefit budget but are penalised for so doing. I am glad that the Select Committee will examine the burden on local authorities of administering a housing benefit budget and all the grief that goes with it, when those authorities are not given the resources to perform that task.

It is extremely depressing that, any time that we want to examine part of the welfare state, yet another agency is created. Such agencies have succeeded in ensuring large job losses, with fewer people doing the work—often, less efficiently than in the past. The Government's attitude to people who have dedicated much of their lives to making the social security system work is to make sure that those people end up working for an agency, then to change their contracts of employment and conditions of service.

Government statistics often claim that UK pensioners are at least 33 per cent. better off than they were when the Government came into office. That figure varies—depending on which Minister one talks to, or on which television or radio programme he appears—between a low of 32 per cent. and a high of more than 45 per cent. I have never met pensioners who are better off to that extent. I do not doubt that some extremely wealthy pensioners are doing better than average, but the majority do not have huge occupational pension incomes—if they did, they would be taxed on them anyway.

Many elderly widows have no income other than their state pension and housing benefit and are often badly off. They have been penalised by the breach in the link with earnings made by Geoffrey Howe in 1980, who called it his greatest achievement as Chancellor of the Exchequer. We can imagine his aspiration. He succeeded in robbing every pensioner in the country of about £20 per week by breaking the earnings link and substituting one with the retail price index.

Ministers predict that the pension level will become nugatory by the end of this century. That is a standing invitation to everyone in middle age to make some sort of private pension arrangement, because that is the only way of guaranteeing a reasonable income on retirement. That attacks the principle of the state pension. Likewise, we witnessed the Government's use—or abuse—of the Government Actuary in the 1980s, to reduce the value of SERPS and thereby increase market opportunities for the private pensions industry.

I do not apologise for strongly supporting the principle of a high-level state pension and a fully funded SERPS that can eliminate poverty in retirement years. There is no security in private pension schemes sold by high-pressure salesmen working only for commission. A lot of tragedies are waiting to happen in the next 15 or 20 years. I hope that someone will be around to pick up the tab for the tragedies that will occur as those schemes collapse.

The Government have done much to make the benefits system more complicated and less effective, including the tragic removal of benefits from 16-to 17-year-olds, changes in the housing benefit system, family credit and now the publication "Piloting change in Social Security: Helping people into work". The Government deregulated the labour market so that hourly wage rates, particularly for young people in service industries, are shameful and a disgrace.

People throughout the country are being pushed into jobs offering wages of £2 per hour or less. The Government know that it is immoral for people to work for such low pay but, instead of doing something about it, such as restoring the wages council system or supporting a national minimum wage, the Government—to assuage their guilt—introduced family credit and now propose a wider variety of top-up measures, to subsidise low-wage employers. That is a disgraceful vista.

Some extremely prosperous and profitable firms are deliberately paying low wages because they know that they can get away with it. People in the worst situations will have to apply for social security benefits to top up those low wages, and that is wrong. I strongly support a national minimum wage, which should be fixed at half male average earnings, at about £4.20 per hour.

Large numbers of people who suffered accidents at work and became invalids now face the most rigorous medical checks possible in the interests of cutting their immediate and long-term benefits. Government expenditure predictions show that they expect to spend less and less on invalidity benefits, mainly in respect of injuries arising from accidents at work.

Will the Secretary of State comment on the operation of the habitual residence test, which he introduced after his idiotic speech to the Tory party conference, when he said that he would stamp out benefit tourists from Italy? He tried to put on an Italian accent and to speak Italian. He used xenophobic arguments to introduce his test.

I will tell the right hon. Gentleman how it works. People who go abroad to visit their families, work, or see sick relatives in west Africa, the Caribbean or anywhere else return to this country to be told that they do not merit benefits. They lose income support and the right to receive housing benefit. They can become homeless and children may go hungry—all to appease a xenophobic audience at a Tory party conference.

Mr. Tony Banks: What happens then is that such people turn up at the borough council's social services department to seek assistance. Again, the problem is shifted to the local authority as a result of Government policy. It is all very well for the Government to claim that they are dealing with the issue, but they are not. They are transferring responsibility to hard-pressed local authorities, which is a disgrace.

Mr. Corbyn: My hon. Friend is right. If people can get through the maze of appealing against a habitual residence test decision, in many instances the result can be reversed, but the family has to suffer the heartache and headache for weeks and weeks, if not months and months. All that was the result of the horrible atmosphere of xenophobia encouraged by the Secretary of State in his Tory party conference speech.

We have witnessed in our own lifetimes the development of a comprehensive welfare state designed to insure people against poverty, poverty in old age and poverty when out of work. Over the past 15 years, we have seen a systematic attack on those principles. The Government keep saying that the current level of welfare spending is unsustainable—that there are too many elderly and poor people and too many demands on the system. There are not. The Government are more interested in reducing tax for the already rich and redistributing wealth in favour of the wealthy, while letting the poor rot and creating an underclass.

The Government are fond of quoting international comparisons, but those comparisons show that this country spends rather less on the welfare state than do most western European countries. International comparisons also point up the big con that the Government are perpetrating as a way of cutting back the welfare state. I believe strongly in the principle of a community that supports those in need at all times, not a community that punishes them for being poor and needy.

We heard a great deal about the international competitive market in the course of the social security inquiry. We were told that our marginal rates of tax are too high in Britain and that we can no longer afford the welfare state. We cannot go on playing ducks and drakes with people's poverty around the world—large employers say that wages are too high in Britain so they will move their firms to Spain unless British workers are prepared to drop their demands. Then the people in Spain are told the same; then the workers in the far east will be told the same, and so it goes on.

We need international comparisons that eliminate, not create, poverty. We need comparisons that guarantee security instead of creating misery and insecurity. I hope that an incoming Labour Government will reverse the policies of this Government and introduce instead a poverty, or redistribution of wealth, index. Thus, instead of looking at the bald costs of a service, we shall look at the effects of that service and the effects of the social security system as it eliminates serious poverty. I look forward to that.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West and others, I see far too much poverty around me. I see far too many children unable to achieve at school because their families are so poor, with all the attendant poverty of expectations. There are many brilliant minds wasting away on dole queues, many children growing up in overcrowded accommodation—all of which leads to under-achievement at school.

Our benefits system is failing the people, and the Government are deliberately making sure that it fails them.

6.1 pm

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North-West): Much of the debate so far has dealt with past and current trends. We need also to recognise, looking ahead only 10 years or so, that there will be many demands on the social security budget and some newly recognised needs that will need to be taken fully into account. If any Government fail to go in for some radical thinking and some radical restructuring of the social security programme, their leaders, Conservative or Labour, will be left as frustrated Ministers.

One newly recognised need that I have in mind is the need for long-term care. If Sir William Beveridge were writing his famous report today and assessing, as he did in 1942, the risks that people face over their lifetimes—injury, sickness, unemployment and the likelihood of retirement—I think that he would argue that one of the risks that should be built into our social insurance system is the eventuality that a person will need, if not conventional care, then what we now call long-term care. Many of us who survive into our 80s or 90s will become frail, not necessarily needing urgent medical attention in hospital but needing intensive social care, in our own homes or, failing that, in various kinds of residential institution.

We all know that many of our constituents need long-term care requiring the payment of thousands of pounds a year, and many of them watch as their lifetime

savings disappear because they have to pay for the care if they are not protected by the social security system or social services departments. There is a strong argument for building into our social security system protection against that sort of risk. That will be debated a great deal in the coming months and years; we need such a debate, and we need to examine the different options. If we do cater for that risk, it will place new demands on our social security and national insurance system—

Mr. Frank Field: One of the other letters that I received was from a woman of 67 whose husband is 72. They have worked hard all their lives and are proud of the way that they brought up their children. They know, however, that, life expectancy being what it is, one or both of them may eventually need long-term care: and they know what the costs will be. They also know what the effects will be on their children; no doubt they will be supportive, but this couple are worried, with fees running at between £300 and £500 a week, that they may outlive any insurance policy that they have. It is not very nice for such people to feel that they may become a burden on their children, who in turn might begin to wish that they would "move over". The family's assets would certainly be endangered.

The lady writes in her letter that everyone says that she should be insured, but she wonders with whom to insure. It is one thing to know that any money not used up will be paid into the health service; it is quite another to think of a private company benefiting if people die before they need the care. Those problems face many of our constituents, who are worried about losing the free care in the health service for which they have paid but which has been taken away over the past 15 years.

Mr. Wicks: I thank my hon. Friend. He reminds us that the goalposts have been moved, partly by the Government. Once upon a time, many people spent their final months, when they were ill, in cottage hospitals. Now, increasingly, although we know more about the impact of the wider environment on health care, our national health service is—paradoxically—being encouraged to take an ever narrower view of its responsibilities towards the sick.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): The goalposts have been moved, but not exactly in the way suggested. Owing to an extraordinary distortion in investment over the years, property has been regarded as by far the best place to put money. An enormous number of people have put almost all their assets into their homes.

Secondly, the age at which children can expect to inherit has risen so much that it has greatly changed many people's need to inherit. Both aspects are ingredients in a debate which, I entirely agree, we desperately need to hold, because this is an important subject.

Mr. Wicks: I thank the hon. Gentleman. By an historical fluke, inheritance now affects a much greater proportion of the population than it did even 30 years ago—at the very time when long-term care has become much more important. That can set up some delicate problems between the generations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) is keen on examining the correlation between the social security system and behaviour—how some policies promote bad behaviour and others, one hopes, promote good. While some people, through no fault of their own, cannot accumulate assets, others who can, encouraged by the Government and indeed by all parties, own their own homes, or save and invest. It is therefore quite wrong that they should lose all those assets during the last few years of their lives, and watch them being swallowed up simply because they did the right thing and behaved in an economically responsible way.

Our political parties are turning their attention to this issue now: we are going to hear far more about it in future. One option relates to the social security system, but I must not get sidetracked into a wider debate about long-term care. My thesis is that there will inevitably be new demands on the system in future, so it behoves us to take a radical look at how we spend our social security pound. The needs of families with children, although hardly new, will be discussed much more in the coming months. We are increasingly aware that, in middle England—to use that over-worked phrase—many two-parent families who are not near the poverty line are struggling to bring up children. Increasingly, the costs of children go into the teens, into the university years, yet we are expecting families to pay those costs with less support from the state.

It is not surprising that people elsewhere in Europe are very worried about low birth rates. It is not surprising that European men, but particularly European women, are finding it too expensive to have babies, which is why on average the birth rate in the European Union nations is now as low as 1.5 or 1.6. In the early 1970s, it was 2.5 or 2.6—that is one child fewer because of the dramatic decline in birth rates. That has come about partly because the women of Europe—less so the women of Britain, where our birth rate is slightly higher—are discovering that it is very expensive to have children. Increasingly, Governments—I know that this Government are doing it in private—are looking at how they can enhance the economic well-being of such families.

If we want to turn again, so many years after Eleanor Rathbone, to develop a new partnership between the family and the state, that would put added pressures on Government expenditure on social security. Yet social security is already at record levels. Who would have believed 16 years ago—those foolish enough to believe the rhetoric that public spending was going to come tumbling down and that the social security budget would be constrained—that a Secretary of State for Social Security from the new right would be presiding over record levels of public spending in his Department? That is something that will tease the historians in future.

I believe that there is scope for a radical restructuring of the social security budget. I am not convinced—it would be worrying if one were—by the public expenditure tables and accounts that every social security pound is being spent effectively on what the House would regard as sensible social security objectives. Spending is out of kilter. I shall give three examples.

My first concerns housing benefit. It is quite extraordinary that the social security programme is so way out of control. Let us remind ourselves of the figures for rent allowances. In 1994-95, we are already spending £4.7 billion on rent allowances. By 2000-01, it will increase to a staggering £8.1 billion. It is quite extraordinary that we are spending that amount on housing benefit. If I, and, indeed, the House, could be convinced that that was sensible social security and housing policy, that would be one thing, but I am not so convinced. The Department of Social Security has been a victim of a housing policy that has neglected the idea of subsidising and encouraging bricks and mortar, and it has, through a means-tested system, with all the problems of the poverty trap that that occasions, decided to subsidise the individual. That has been a green light for the exploitative landlord.

In my advice surgery some two months ago, although he did not have an appointment, a gentleman rang to say, "I must see you as my MP." He came in with a henchman and said that his problem as the local landlord—a well-known landlord—was that he was no longer getting the money through from Croydon council as quickly as he had in the past. I said, "What do you mean? The housing benefit does not belong to you." He said, "Yes, but I always get my tenants to sign an agreement that the money will come direct to me." I told him that it should not be like that. His complaint was that the council was tightening up and toughening up a bit, was doing some checks and as a result he was not getting his cheques through on time. He was seeking my representations on that.

I do not believe that the taxpayer supports a housing benefit system that encourages inflated rents, and which in this particular case—it cannot be an exception—involves a cheque going from the public purse straight to the new Rachman landlords of the 1990s, who have been encouraged by the Government's policy.

Mr. Frank Field: Those cheques are not going only to the landlord, of whatever kind, as they are often for fictitious tenants.

Mr. Wicks: Indeed, and we have already explored the way in which the Government, despite their annual excitement with the sea air at Tory party conferences, have, in effect, been soft on fraud. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. Lilley: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, and he is making a thoughtful contribution. This specific issue has featured in a number of contributions. Housing benefit is the one benefit that is handled by local authorities. It was not until the Conservative Government introduced incentives for local authorities to crack down on fraud, and penalties when they do not, that they began to take the issue seriously, as they are now doing. I trust that the hon. Gentleman will also welcome the measures that we are taking to give tenants a stake in getting rents down on above-average rented properties from 2 January next year.

Mr. Wicks: Because of Government policy, there is a massive housing benefit system, administered by local authorities. We heard a well-earned tribute to those London Labour councils that are not just talking about fraud, because talk comes easy, but are being tough on fraud. Given the Secretary of State's keen interest in this, will he take the opportunity now—I am happy to give way again—to assure us that local authorities will be able to employ the staff to be tough on fraud in the future?

Mr. Lilley: I can certainly give that assurance. Indeed, they are required to do so. It was the Conservative Government who provided the computer system for 24 London boroughs to co-operate together in combating fraud in London.

Mr. Wicks: I am encouraged to hear that, but it contrasts rather sharply with some of the evidence that the Select Committee on Social Security is hearing from the Secretary of State's offices. On the one hand we hear evidence that every fraud officer saves the taxpayer a substantial amount of money; on the other we are told that the Benefits Agency is not able to employ more fraud staff because of some extraordinary constraints. The economics needs to be looked at. The rapidly increasing amounts that are spent on housing benefit neither enhance true social security nor represent sensible housing policy.

Let me move on to another example. Hon. Members have made reference to family credit. I remember when Keith Joseph introduced family income supplement in the House. I was not here, but read about it as a student of social policy. I recall that the cost was some £4 million or £6 million in the first year or so. I do not think that he would have ever dared imagine that spending on family credit would be heading toward £2 billion in a few years' time. We have stumbled into a hole, an expensive new social security policy that is about subsidising the exploitative employer. We cannot easily persuade our constituents as taxpayers that the social security pound should be spent on subsidising low wages.

There is a clear difference between the political parties. Our arguments for a decent employment policy and a minimum wage are mainly about justice and the fairness of the case, but they are also about using social security pounds effectively. If social security pounds are going to be scarce in the future, as they will be under any Government, it is absurd that we are developing new initiatives to introduce social security programmes for single and childless couples in recognition of low wages.

Another paradox of new right politics is that the belief that we should not intervene economically and in the labour market, and certainly not make employers pay decent minimum wages, means that the state, commanded by the new right, has to intervene socially through the social security system in a massive way which no Labour Government would ever have dreamed of doing. Soon, almost £2 billion will be spent on family credit because of Britain's low wage policy.

The third example is income support. Beveridge envisaged national assistance, later supplementary benefit, simply as a safety net. There was to be a national insurance framework and, if people fell through that, for a period of weeks or months they would receive national assistance. Income support has now become in part a major and often long-term social security programme to support one-parent families. Life on income support is a grim life for such families. I do not believe, as saloon bar homily would have us believe, that income support provides a good standard of living, a life of Riley. It provides a terrible standard of living for those mothers and their children, yet, this day, seven out of 10 one-parent families are dependent on income support. The Government have never said that one of their social security objectives is to use income support in that way. It has happened partly because Britain has failed to develop a decent family policy.

We are having to spend increasing amounts of different social security benefits on what is essentially, yet implicitly, an early retirement programme. Increasingly, many adults, particularly men, are thrown out of the labour market in their 50s. They then have to get by on invalidity benefit or income support with no prospect of work, waiting for their retirement pension. We are now spending substantial amounts of money on that, and again that is a misuse of social security policy.

We need to liberate the language of social security from social security jargon. The issue is how we promote true social security in Britain. That is an important question when a feel-good factor is absent because there is a feel-insecure factor. If one is concerned about social security, it should not be confused with social security benefits. One starts not with state benefits but with the foundations of social security in a society. The two crucial ones are employment and a strong family.

Employment has to be the major social security policy. If employment prospects are wrecked and worklessness encouraged, social insecurity is promoted. I mentioned the men thrown out of the labour market. Let me give a statistic because, unlike other hon. Members, I believe that statistics should promote good argument. At present, one in three men aged between 55 and 59—not the five years before retirement, but earlier than that—are not in work. Only two in three are in employment. Yet we have futile debates in the House about whether the retirement age should be 60, 63 or 65, as if that had meaning for the vast proportion of our people. One in three of those men are out of work. A minority of that group are technically unemployed, the others are called economically inactive.

If some of the economically inactive are new lottery winners, good luck to them. Frankly, new lottery winners will need a good deal of luck if the lottery prize is not to destroy their lives, but most of them are people who have either had to take redundancy packages or have been forced out of work. What we have seen is the rise of the inactive society in Britain. Because of the failure to move back towards full employment, simply too many of our citizens are economically inactive. That is bad news for them and for their families—most do not want it—but it is also bad news for the economy and the social security budget.

I bring my remarks to a conclusion. [Interruption.] I welcome the encouragement of the Opposition Whip, who I know would like me to go on longer, but I will not. I shall disappoint him as usual. Never please the Whips all the time.

The role of the Department of Social Security in the future is as a promoter of social security in the wider sense at which I have hinted. The Department of Social Security should not just be obsessed with state benefits. It should ask what are the trends in our society that make for social insecurity and what is the role of Government in promoting social security. The great failure to develop a family policy in Britain is a classic example. The rise of the single, unmarried mother is consuming more and more of the social security budget. Who in Government is taking hold of that issue and asking what are the preventative policies? [Interruption.] Apparently the Minister of State is. If so, he must be less silent on the issue. Who is asking what can be done about that trend, what are the implications for education in schools and for family planning, and what are the wider implications?

One could say that that is not the job of the Department of Social Security. The problem is that it is no one's job. In the old days, we had a thing called the joint approach to social policy. The Department of Social Security must become the major advocate for a joint approach to social security in the future. There is an absence now of clear social security objectives. If we could agree on clear objectives, we would see, as I hope that I have argued, that much of the billions of pounds of expenditure is now wasted; it is not used usefully.

I end with this point. At the moment, there is a correlation between the highest-ever levels of social security spending at a time of record levels of social insecurity. How we move away from that is the key challenge for the future.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): I begin by congratulating two people without whom tonight's debate would not have been possible. First, I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on his Mais lecture speech—it seems like ages ago now, but I believe that it was two years ago—when he started the debate and we began to realise that there were real questions about the affordability of our social security system, especially if changes were not made.

Some of those changes have been made and some of them have been tough for the Government. One will not please all the people all the time if one is having to say that there will not be benefits for certain groups of people in the future, or that benefits will be curtailed or restrained. Those are tough decisions that must be taken sometimes if one is to run a country on a fair and just basis so that everyone has opportunities in the future.

I also congratulate the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) who chairs the Select Committee. He has given us a most enjoyable time discussing this particular subject. We have dealt with many subjects, but on this one we have been able to range widely. We have had much enjoyable debate. There have been times when the hon. Gentleman has been put on the far right of, dare I say, every member of the Committee, and there have been times when the hon. Gentleman has resumed his traditional political position and his position in the centre of the Committee. It has been stimulating. We are confident that the hon. Gentleman finds it easy to stand in for any member of the Committee who may be absent on occasion and put his point of view no matter at which end of the political spectrum that member of the Committee is. Therefore, we have been able to ensure that virtually every perspective has been discussed.

Having said that, I find it sad that our report should cost £28 while the Department's annual report costs £16.35, a total of £34.35. Most people on social security will not be able to buy those reports. It is ludicrous that something that affects so many millions of people cannot be brought into their households because they cannot afford it.

Parliament and the Department must consider how to make the reports more widely available. I note from parliamentary answers that no more than 1,000 copies are sometimes available to a population of 57 million. I do not imagine that every man, woman and child in the country will want to read the third report of the Select Committee on Social Security, but many millions might be interested. I have long promoted the Internet and the information super-highway, and I hope that the Department, the Select Committee and the House as a whole will consider ways of providing a wider population with the reports by electronic means.

Our report started from the beginning, as it were, and asked, "Where is it all going?" Social security currently costs the country some £85 billion; the figure was heading towards £100 billion by the end of the decade before certain changes were made, and it may still touch that amount then. Social security spending amounts to nearly one third of public expenditure, and it has a habit of growing regardless. More people try to claim each year, and although many may cease to be eligible as a result of a change in their circumstances, claimants nevertheless form a never-ending group.

That causes problems. The main purpose of the original system was to help those in genuine need, but, given the fraud and abuse statistics, there is no doubt that it has failings. It does not always help people in genuine need; it provides money for households where the need does not exist, or is not as great as the claim suggests. We must do more to ensure that those in genuine need benefit.

We must also ensure that those in temporary need do not become permanent claimants. In many parts of the United States, two-year limits are being suggested in regard to certain types of benefit. Although such limits would clearly not be appropriate for, for instance, the disabled, they would be appropriate for other groups. We should provide incentives to encourage people to work, especially those on income support and unemployment-related benefits.

As the report points out, one of the main problems is that the social security bill has grown enormously as a proportion of gross domestic product. In the mid-1970s, when we last had a Labour Government, the proportion was 7.4 per cent.; today, even after many years of Conservative government, it is 12.6 per cent. I freely accept that that is an appalling state of affairs. The fact is that, regardless of which party has been in office, the social security bill has increased.

One good aspect of the way in which the bill has increased under a Conservative Government, however, is the fact that we are now putting nine times as much into benefits for the disabled as Labour did in 1979, the year in which we came to office. Some of that growth has benefited worthy recipients—genuine people whom we wanted to help. None the less, there is no doubt that some of the increase relates to less deserving groups.

The Joseph Rowntree Foundation and others produce reports suggesting that the growth in the social security bill can continue, but I question the validity of their assumptions. I do not believe that the vast bulk of people want the growth to continue; they recognise that we must invest in industry, technology and business, and that we cannot afford to put ever more money into social security. We must consider our international competitiveness.

We must also consider the way in which incentives operate. Many would say that, rather than being designed to help people to go to work, they are often designed to help them to stay away from work. Many would say that they are designed to help people to claim, rather than cease to claim. Many would say that they are designed to promote personal irresponsibility rather than personal responsibility. We should deal with such issues increasingly as the social security debate continues, as our Committee intends it to do.

In our report, we tried to take account of the possibility of gaining knowledge from other countries, in the context of our competitiveness in business, industry and public expenditure. If our expenditure is too great compared with that of other countries, our taxes and other disincentives will also be too great. We found that in Japan few if any single mothers are kept by the state: the family takes much more responsibility. We also found that the elderly are often cared for by their families, and do not impose a cost on the state.

There is no doubt that Sweden has a wonderful social security system, but the Swedes do not pay much for it. They have borrowed heavily from overseas, but they must pay the bills in the next century. There are doubts about whether they can afford to do so, as their national debt is now more than 100 per cent. of their national income. Ours is less than half our national income.

Many problems will arise in the next century, especially in relation to the elderly, owing to the demographic structures that now exist in many European countries. Reference is often made to the inter-generational contract, whereby one generation's contributions pay for the pensions of elderly people. That will be questioned in the future, however, simply because there has not been enough provision in the past for the pensions of the future. We must consider how we are to meet some of the commitments that have been made. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has already amended the state earnings-related pension scheme for purposes of affordability.

I should have liked to say more, but my main point is this. I hope that we shall consider ways in which the private sector can make a greater contribution in the future. Will contributory, non-contributory or income-related benefits point the way forward, or will the state have a smaller role? Will savings and the private sector provide more? I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will come up with low-cost saving schemes in the next few years, and that the Chancellor will support them, so that many more people can have pensions in the future—especially those on low incomes.

I thank the hon. Member for Birkenhead for a report—much of it the result of unanimity—which, I hope, will take the social security debate into a new phase. I trust that we shall have many similar discussions in which we can explore one of the most important issues facing the nation in the next decade and beyond.

6.38 pm

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): Like everyone else, I welcome the fact that this debate has taken place. It has not been over-well attended, but I congratulate the Ministers on the Front-Bench team. They are all loyally in their place, especially the new recruits on parade. The meaning of flexible labour and labour mobility has been given a new definition by the experiences of the Department of Social Security team in recent times. I thought that perhaps the Department was being used as a boot camp under the watchful eye of the Secretary of State for Social Security to put the younger raw material into some sort of shape.

At any event, I congratulate everyone who has attended the debate today and especially my hon. Friend the Member for Newham North-West (Mr. Banks)—who left just one minute ago but who has sat loyally throughout the debate and who made a speech—because he is the only one who could not, in social security terms, be described as a usual suspect in our exchanges.

I seriously congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and the Select Committee on Social Security. Its report is a valuable analysis. In conveniently packaged and presented form, it gathers together some important facts, and some opinions that, as he, I think, justifiably recorded, were held with remarkable vehemence by the various combatants during their evidence. The report must look forward because it is incomplete. It is a starting point and not a finishing point and it raises issues that are of fundamental importance.

Sustainability has become something of a buzz word for politicians in a number of sectors, but it is important as a defining factor in social security as well. There is an argument about what it means, and about whether there is a point of no return for social security expenditure and, if there is, where that point is reached. It is not possible to define it in that way as clearly there are burdens that are hard to bear and that one may feel one must bear as a Government and community. Clearly, the point of no return is a combination of the fiscal pain, the political will and the social judgment about the social casualties that may result if that burden is not shouldered.

All those problems interrelate and bear on each other. They cannot, of course, be reduced into one formula that can be applied irrespective of circumstances at any given time. I take the simple view that there is not a predetermined proportion of gross domestic product that one can say must never be breached, and where, when one has reached it—if one has brought expenditure down to it—one can rest in peace for ever and a day.

I was interested in the exchanges in our economic debate yesterday, when the Chief Secretary to the Treasury paid his touching tribute to the late R. A. Butler for having in 1955 brought public expenditure as a share of GDP down to 33.5 per cent. Then, in a gracious but inevitable anti-climax, he said that he did not think that he could achieve the same thing. Of course, he is right: he cannot achieve that and none of us could achieve that. It is wrong to conduct the debate in that way.

We must consider the problems. Some interesting points have been made about some of the new problems and difficulties that will emerge. We must try and balance them against the ways in which they can be tackled, both in the private and public sectors, because, of course, both have a role to play, and we must try to tackle them against the fiscal circumstances that the Government of the day face.

I am strongly in favour—it would be astonishing if I was not—of further information and having a debate that is based on public information and a well-informed public. It will, I hope, not discourage the Secretary of State to know that "The Growth of Social Security" is a document from which I probably quote more often than any other, because it does, especially if one reads the small print at the foot of the tables, give a fairer picture than is sometimes given of the position in which we find ourselves. I also often quote and find useful the document that the Department produced on international comparisons.

It is possible to argue that the European Union is spendthrift in its approach to social protection expenditure. That is a fair point to make, although I do not necessarily accept it, but it is still interesting and important to recognise, as someone mentioned earlier, that social protection expenditure as a percentage of GDP in this country is lower than in the European Union in general.

It is important that we do not forget the pressures that demographic factors will bring to bear, at least until 2030 to 2040, but it also worth remembering—to quote from paragraph 35 of the Select Committee on Social Security report—that

"This country is forecast to move from having one of the most burdensome dependency ratios in 1980 to one of the least severe in 2040."

There is nothing permanent about these states, although it is important that those factors are always borne in mind. I am therefore strongly in favour of information. It helps me, so it is a selfish point, but I hope that it will help the debate as well.

I also appreciate—I do not have time and it would be wrong to run them through them in detail—the report's points about particular sectors of interest and pressure. Housing benefit has been mentioned. Of course housing benefit is a great growth area of expenditure and it is common ground between myself and the Secretary of State that, whether the policy was right or wrong, it can be traced back directly to Government policy.

Of course, I want the problems in relation to lone parents to be addressed, but I would state the problems, not in terms of a judgmental condemnation, and certainly not in terms of the scapegoating politics that appeared at least in some parts of Government some 18 months ago, but much more in terms of why, for example, over the years, the number of lone parents in work as a percentage of the total has dropped so substantially. Why has that happened? Given that it has happened, if we can understand why, does it help us to find out how we can get over the problem by offering opportunity to those in that group?

My hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead has probably a more directive view of the social security system than me and possibly the Secretary of State, who has fairly said that he does not believe that one can necessarily change social habits by diktat or Government exhortation. I think that paragraph 57 of the report contains an interesting hint that may or may not represent the mind of the Committee. It remarks, in discussing the group of lone parents who have not had a long-standing relationship that has broken down to produce lone parenthood:

"How to question the wisdom of this trend, while not blaming the single parents as a group, will call for great political skill. The Committee will be looking in its future sessions at ways by which their route to (never married) single parenthood can be closed."

I do not know what inference is to be drawn from "can be closed", but I await with some interest how that will be achieved. It is a phrase that has already been commented on to me by quite a number of interested groups, usually with some lack of favour, but of course we will wait to see what emerges at the end of the day.

In its preliminary description, the Committee is right to draw attention to the fact that, for example, some member of at least half of this country's households receives means-tested benefits. It is right to draw attention by implication—and I am glad that the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) and figures of great respectability in terms of their dryness have signed the report—to the fact that a contradiction may exist between the condemnation of the growth of means-tested benefits and the by-products of the introduction of, for example, jobseeker's allowance and, to a large degree, incapacity benefit. There are therefore many interesting and important matters to be considered.

Unfortunately, I do not have time to talk about fraud at any length. I have said already in other forums that it is unfortunate that it has taken us so long to get down to the interesting and important job of trying to define what fraud consists of. The Public Accounts Committee considered that problem in its 58th report published on 27 October 1993. At that time, we were told that efforts would be made for the first time to define the types of fraud. It has happened only now and it is a little belated, but from it some interesting points flow.

I was slightly surprised to discover that the front-line attack on fraud would come from home visits. I endorse the point that, as some of my hon. Friends said, if there are to be home visits, they should be ensuring not only that fraud and abuse do not exist, but, at the same time, that proper entitlement that has not been taken up is taken up.

There should be a double purpose for home visits, but I cannot help saying to the Secretary of State that, from contact with the Benefits Agency, my understanding, and I may be wrong, is that, over recent years, home visits have positively disappeared as a result of Government policy. It is a little strange that we are now told that they are to be revived because they are an essential way of fighting fraud. The best thing that we can deduce from that is that fundamental errors have been made in the past.

Mr. Corbyn: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Dewar: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I am under pressure and I have given an undertaking to allow the Secretary of State some time to reply.

If the findings of the survey on fraud are accurate, in that only about 12 or 13 per cent. of the total fraud loss came from impersonation, forgery or the stealing of order books and giros—I do not believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead would accept that, judging by his passage on organised fraud—it puts a question mark against the savings that the Secretary of State expects to achieve with his benefit payment cards system. The vast majority of the fraud identified involves people who are working and claiming what they are not entitled to or people who pretend to be single when they are in fact cohabiting. Those things will not be dealt with by the benefit payment cards system.

I am not taking a hard line on this but, given that the vast majority of fraud will not be touched by that system, the expected saving from the 19 million cards that are to be issued, at an initial cost of £135 million and an estimated running cost of £77 million, could usefully be reassessed.

I am sorry that my speech has to be so brief, but perhaps we can find another forum in which we can discuss this. It would be helpful if the Minister could say a word or two about a subject raised in the report, which provoked—if that is the right word—the Committee's visit to Switzerland. I am talking about the suggestion about localisation which followed the Mais lecture.

I remember the arguments about that and I thought that they had been laid to rest, particularly the arguments about different levels of benefit in different parts of the country. It was raised again on 9 July in The Independent on Sunday. It was a prominent story entitled:

"Tories plan 'regional dole rates'".

It said that the cost of living in London is 17 per cent. higher than the national average, and that in Newcastle it is 12 per cent. lower. It suggested that the Secretary of State was considering whether that differential should be reflected in the rate of unemployment and other benefits.

I understood that that was not on the Secretary of State's agenda, but it would be worth hearing that from him again. It is unusual for a story such as that to appear without at least some prompting—[Interruption.] Well, the Secretary of State can deal with the matter quickly. In the original Mais lecture, the Secretary of State said:

"It is harder to mobilise local pride"— that is, under the present system—

"to generate positive alternatives to welfare dependence."

Although I approve of the sentiment that we want to end welfare dependence, given the recurrence of the story, it might look as if that principle still lives. If it does, it should be the subject of an important debate. It would be helpful if the Secretary of State could say a word or two about it.

I am sure that the House will believe me when I say that I would like to have covered many other things. The Committee's report is descriptive, not prescriptive. It draws attention to the framework for the future and for a continuing debate, which I welcome. There is a long way to go.

I was interested in paragraph 101, which neatly sets out the future work pattern for the Committee and answers some of the questions with which we are familiar—by "we", I mean those of us who have read the latest book by my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead, "Making Welfare Work". That book gives a hint about the future of the social insurance principle and so on. It outlines what my hon. Friend thinks should be the future shape of events. It will be interesting to see whether he can carry his Committee down that road as things unfold. Although he expresses his belief in the social insurance principle in a much stiffer way, its general outline is very much in line with what was said by the Commission on Social Justice.

I recognise that there is great public and political anxiety about where we are going. I may be wrong, but I imagine that the Secretary of State will be saying a word about the Labour party's position. He is not a man who can always resist temptation and I believe that I am safe in that assumption. The Labour party is in hot water with the Secretary of State because it persistently refuses to live up to the caricature that he loves to think is alive and well. The right hon. Gentleman is learning the hard and painful way that it will not sit up to be shot at just to please the Secretary of State.

The Secretary of State intervened briefly to suggest that the Labour party was in some way being unreasonable by continuing to stress that work should be worth while and that people should not find it financially advantageous to remain on benefit or give up work to remain on benefit. If he thinks that that is unreasonable, he must get used to that sort of unreason from the Labour party. I believe that that is a common-sense approach and that it is right for the future of the welfare system and for those who, at least on a temporary basis, have to use it.

[Mr. Dewar]

We shall continue to argue a responsible approach based upon social need and a system which we hope will reward those who take up the opportunity that it offers while protecting families, children and the vulnerable.

A number of detailed plans have already been unveiled on welfare into work, and more will follow. The argument is still to unwind, but the general approach set out by myself, my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition and others is right. The application will be different from that which is emerging in Government policy. However, we all believe that that is a matter for the electorate to settle, and on that basis I watch future developments with some confidence.

6.56 pm

The Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Peter Lilley): This has been an interesting debate and the standard of speeches, notably—as one would expect—from members of the Select Committee, has been high. Speeches have been made by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), the Chairman of the Committee, by the hon. Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Wicks) and by my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw).

There have been some nostalgic speeches from old Labour in the shape of the hon. Members for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) and for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn). There was the customary elegant speech from the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). With his characteristic courtesy, he curtailed his remarks so that I would have time to reply. I am grateful to him and the least I can do is respond to his specific question about localisation and the reports in the newspapers.

The hon. Gentleman expressed the belief that, when something appears in the newspapers, it might automatically have some foundation. I can assure him that that has not been my experience. I do not know the origin of the story, but the hon. Gentleman is correct: when I talk about the proposition that, whenever we make a change, we should see whether there is any scope for localisation of the delivery and handling of the benefit, I am not thinking in regional terms or of differences in regional rates. The regional variations in living costs to which the article referred represent mainly the difference in housing costs. The system already reflects that difference through the fact that housing benefit is related to the level of rents in each area.

I am looking much more to the type of changes that we have introduced on a large scale, through community care, and on a smaller scale, through the changes that I have announced in housing benefit that give greater discretion to local authorities in the handling of that benefit from January next year.

I particularly welcome the Committee's report on the review of social security expenditure. That report and much of today's debate show how dramatically views on the reform of social security have changed since I called for a national debate in my Mais lecture two years ago. At that time, there was a widespread view that all that our system required was a removal of any restraints on higher spending. In his report "The Future of Welfare—A guide to the Debate", the Labour academic John Hills blithely suggested that there would be nothing wrong, in the long term, with spending an additional 5 per cent. of gross domestic product on social security. By contrast, in this report, a Labour-chaired Select Committee now accepts that the "growth of Social Security spending is a cause for concern."

I recognise that the more realistic position taken by the Committee owes a lot to the hon. Member for Birkenhead, who is almost the only Labour Member who is prepared to face the facts. The very fertility of his ideas should shame his Front-Bench colleagues out of their reluctance to come up with some new policy ideas. To be fair, there were some hints from the hon. Member for Garscadden that they would be more forthcoming in future. I welcome that.

My medium-term objective when I announced the review of social security spending was not to cut spending, but to stop it outstripping the nation's ability to pay. As I never tire of pointing out, on average, just financing social security costs every working person almost £15 every working day. The cost was set to grow faster than gross domestic product, as it had been doing. Reform obviously takes time. As the hon. Member for Birkenhead said in his recent book:

"changing the social security budget can be compared to navigating a great oil tanker . . . once a decision is taken it is a full three miles before any further impact can be made on the direction of the ship."

The hon. Gentleman granted himself a rather generous 20-year horizon for his programme for reform of the welfare state.

Reform takes time because most change requires legislation. If, as I usually prefer, changes affect only new claimants, their impact takes time to build up. Nevertheless, the changes that have already been announced should reduce the growth of spending by £4 billion a year by the end of the century and by more than three times as much in the longer term. As it happens, growth in social security spending in real terms during my first three years—which the hon. Member for Birkenhead suggested marked a period of failure—has been less than the underlying rate of 3.3 per cent. a year, although I accept that that is as much to do with the economic recovery as to do with the initial impact of my reforms, which will take a considerable time to build up.

The real measure of success against which I wish to be judged will be the reduction in the underlying rate of growth in social security. The measures that I have announced should cut the rate from 3.3 per cent. a year faster than inflation to just 1.3 per cent. a year over the next three years, settling at about 2 per cent. thereafter. I do not pretend that that is necessarily enough, but it does mean that the share of GDP taken by social security, which has almost trebled since the war, should decline gently henceforth.

If Opposition Members complain that spending is still growing too rapidly, they should remember that the Labour party has opposed almost every reform that I have introduced. In effect, the Opposition are telling taxpayers that they want them to cough up the best part of £4 billion a year extra during the next Parliament and £14 billion a year extra in the long term—and that is before implementing any of their, I regret to say, still profligate spending plans.

The Select Committee was right to recognise that the growth of social security spending is a matter of concern not just because of the tax burden it imposes on people, but because it reflects a growth in welfare dependency. I hope that all of us would prefer people not to be dependent on benefit, but to be self-sufficient. The report illustrates the extent of dependency with the claim, which I am happy to say is mistaken, that half of all households contain someone on income-related benefits. That is incorrect. Some 27 per cent. of all benefit units contain someone on income-related benefits and about 30 per cent. of households do. That is still too high, but it is well short of the 50 per cent. suggested in the report.

Mr. Frank Field: The right hon. Gentleman should convey that view to the Prime Minister, who used those figures in an article in The Daily Telegraph the day before his re-election as party leader.

Mr. Lilley: I have a feeling that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister was generously quoting the hon. Gentleman, thinking that his figure had been audited. I am happy to put the record straight.

I want to take this opportunity to address a specific issue raised by the hon. Member for Birkenhead in his recent book, which was mentioned in the Select Committee report. The book "Making Welfare Work" is, like everything the hon. Gentleman writes, full of erudition, fascinating insight and interesting analysis and I agree with much of it, but in the final section he makes a number of assertions, as he did in his speech today, about the role of means-tested and contributory benefits which I venture to suggest are mistaken.

The hon. Gentleman states that the Government have pursued a policy of increasing the number of people on means-tested benefits at the expense of contributory benefits. I do not think that that was ever a deliberate policy of this Government—or, indeed, of previous Governments of most complexions, as there has been an increase in the number of people on means-tested benefits over a long period.

The hon. Gentleman knows that that growth primarily reflects three things—first, the growth in lone parents, which is the largest single cause of the increase, and he does not suggest that that could be replaced by contributory benefits; secondly, the impact of the earnings dispersion affecting lower-skilled workers, a subject with which I have detained the House frequently and which I spelt out at some length in my Ulster lecture; and, thirdly, the transfer of support for housing from bricks and mortar to housing benefit, which is a means-tested benefit.

I have certainly not had a preference for extending means testing as an end in itself. In my Mais lecture I criticised those

"proponents of means tested benefits who emphasise the fiscal savings but tend to ignore the disincentives on claimants."

I emphasised that other methods of targeting benefits were usually preferable to means testing. As a result, most of the reforms that I have made have involved such methods—changing or tightening up on conditions of entitlement other than people's financial means and making benefits, where appropriate, more conditional.

For example, my main changes involve equalising the age of entitlement to state pensions for men and women and ensuring that incapacity benefit goes to those genuinely incapable of work. Both remain contributory benefits. Only a tiny fraction of the £14 billion of savings announced so far—some £200 to £300 million—arises from the one reduction in the contributory element, that which relates to the jobseeker's allowance. That will be offset by other measures that will reduce reliance on means-tested benefits.

I have explicitly ruled out means testing the state pension because that would penalise and discourage people who make additional provision for retirement. The contributory basic pension provides a platform on which people can—and, I am happy to say, increasingly do—build extra pension provision. Indeed, as a result of that, the proportion of pensioners who rely on income support has fallen since income support was introduced. That is an area in which there has been less reliance on a means-tested benefit.

The hon. Member for Birkenhead is not being remotely realistic when he suggests that contributory benefits could replace means-tested benefits for everyone who is out of work, thereby—as he implied—restoring incentives, eliminating fraud and saving money. In the first place, any form of unemployment benefit, whether contributory or not, must be means tested against earnings. Both unemployment benefit and income support are withdrawn if people earn more than a certain amount. Consequently, both contributory and non-contributory benefits for people who are out of work are equally likely to act as a disincentive to work and to create opportunity for fraud through working without declaring the work.

The suggestion that replacing income support and housing benefit by contributory benefits could save money is simply untenable. All of us who look realistically at social security know that there is a great prize to be gained if the budget can be curbed, but we also know that there is a political cost to be borne from those who have to forgo the money that we save.

We would all love to find a philosopher's stone that enabled us to spend less without creating losers. The hon. Member for Birkenhead seems to think that replacing means-tested benefits with contributory benefits is the stone. If it was, I should have no hesitation in stealing it from him, but, alas, there is no such thing in the sphere of social security as a philosopher's stone that would enable us to curb benefits without creating some losers.

A switch from means-tested to contributory benefits could save money only if some people who currently get means-tested benefits did not get the contributory benefit that replaced it. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does not seriously propose to let people who have not been able to pay contributions starve or go without benefit. He plans to pay their contributions for them out of taxation so that they would still get benefits. It would be much like the present system, but with the names changed.

I will believe that the hon. Gentleman's system offers me the prospect of savings when he tells me who will be the losers from it. He is more forthcoming about who will be the winners. He implies that people who are not in work but excluded from benefit because they have a working spouse or sufficient savings to support themselves will be entitled to benefit. The cost of that would be very considerable indeed.

I hope that we can all agree that the best way to save money, and the way in which we are all obliged to seek to save money in the social security system, is by curbing fraud and abuse. I am glad that all hon. Members who have mentioned the subject have supported that view. The attack on fraud has always been a priority for me, and the Department has been increasingly successful in detecting and stopping it. The figures that I announced this week show that some £717 million of fraud was detected—well over £60 million ahead of the target that we set ourselves.

A couple of hon. Members suggested that we are not being sufficiently vigorous on housing benefit fraud; it is expected that an additional £170 million—double the savings last year—will be saved in the current year. That is in addition to the savings made by the Benefits Agency and is the result of the changes that we have introduced to incentivise local authorities to set about combating fraud in their areas. Many of them simply were not doing so before. In future, they will be penalised if they do not. They will be helped by the computer system that we have provided, initially for the London boroughs but which will possibly be extended nationwide, if it works, to help combat cross-border housing benefit fraud.

However, prevention is better than cure. We have been developing a strategy that is a quantum leap from a system based on detecting fraud that has already happened to one that prevents and deters it. In the past, we have been hamstrung by our ignorance of how much fraud there was and what sorts of fraud were going on. Unfortunately, those who defraud the system do not report to us. No one reports fraud as people report other crimes.

No other country has, up to now, found a means of measuring the amount of fraud. I have been wrestling with the problem since I came to the Department. During the past year or so, we have been carrying out pilot studies. We have tried to involve outside research bodies.

We have finally developed a system of benefit reviews which, I believe, represents a breakthrough, nationally and internationally, in providing us with a measure of fraud and a baseline against which we will be able to measure future success in preventing it. That, in turn, has enabled us to spell out our strategy and the three main methods that we are proposing in a programme of 20 different projects, details of which I have put in the Library.

First is the benefit payments card, which is designed, first and foremost, to stop abuse of the payments order book system. It will also contribute to the elimination of identity fraud, but the savings on abuse of the order book system—the giro system—will provide substantial savings that, alone, are sufficient to justify the change we are making.

The second method is more home visits and checks on people to ensure that they do not make a fraudulent or false claim initially and do not subsequently become false claimants through failure to report a change in circumstances which renders the original claim invalid. The third string to our bow is more data matching and the use of information technology so that we can identify false claims and focus our effort on areas where false claiming is greatest.

The programme that I have announced has generated a very positive response nationwide, as have the changes and reforms that I have introduced in the welfare state as a whole. Indeed, I found myself the recipient of rather unfamiliar praise from newspapers such as the Independent and the Evening Standard. That seems to have provoked the Leader of the Opposition into a speedy attempt to sing our song in another outbreak of karaoke conservatism, as I have labelled it in the past.

Hon. Members will recall that, last October, the Commission on Social Justice published its report. Most commentators rightly dismissed it as 400 pages of uncosted waffle, but the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) begged to differ. After all, it had been commissioned by his predecessor and was the product of almost three years work by 16 prominent Labour sympathisers. He described the report as "a remarkable piece of work . . . undoubtedly the most significant and comprehensive analysis of the welfare state since Beveridge . . . The Labour party", he pledged,

"will now discuss the proposals themselves."

Yesterday, the right hon. Member for Sedgefield gave another speech on welfare. He did not mention the commission or its proposals. Instead of 400 pages of uncosted waffled, it contained only 400 words of—hon. Members have guessed it—uncosted waffle.

The right hon. Gentleman went on to indulge in imitation—which, I am told, is the sincerest form of flattery—of my approach to the welfare problem. He first followed me by setting out six principles. He then tried to do so by aping Tory language, but Labour's approach has only three principles. The first is to mimic Tory rhetoric. The second is to oppose any policies that are actually consistent with that rhetoric, and the third is to avoid any commitment to specific policies of its own. In short, Labour's only consistent welfare policy is hypocrisy.

As the hon. Member for Birkenhead said, reform of the welfare state is becoming the central issue of the politics of our time. It is the key problem facing all Governments worldwide. It will be a key issue in the forthcoming general election, as it was in the major election upset in the United States. This debate has shown that we are winning the welfare debate. I believe that that bodes well for my party and for the country.

7.18 pm

Mr. Frank Field: The debate has shown, at least to me—and this is a surprising finding—how limited is the Secretary of State's view of the impact of social security changes on people's character. While he may worry about new Labour, we clearly have no need to worry about old Toryism. I think that we will continue this debate on Monday.

Question deferred, pursuant to paragraph (4) of Standing Order No. 52 (Consideration of Estimates).

Class III, Vote 3

Animal Diseases (Prevention and Control)

[Relevant documents: Fifth Report from the Agriculture Committee of Session 1993-94, Health Controls on the Importation of Live Animals (House of Commons Paper No. 347-I), the Government's reply thereto, Cm. 2735 and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Intervention Board Departmental Report 1995: The Government's Expenditure Plans 1995-96 to 1997-98, (Cm. 2803).]

Motion made, and Question proposed.

That a further sum, not exceeding £263,921,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges that will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1996 for cash limited and demand led operational expenditure by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to: promote food safety, take action against diseases with implications for human health, safeguard essential supplies in an emergency, and promote action to alleviate flooding and coastal erosion; to encourage action to reduce water and other pollution and by other measures to safeguard the aquatic environment including its fauna and flora, to improve the attractiveness and bio-diversity of the rural environment and protect the rural economy; implement MAFF's CAP obligations efficiently and seek a more economically rational CAP while avoiding discrimination against UK businesses (including expenditure on existing CAP measures and schemes), to create the conditions in which efficient and sustainable agriculture, fishing and food industries can flourish, take action against animal and plant diseases and pests, encourage high animal welfare standards; provide specialist support services and allocate resources where they are most needed; provide for some inter-agency payments and undertake research and development.—[Mrs. Browning.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): With this, it will be convenient to discuss vote 4. I should inform the House that Madam Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the leader of the Liberal Democratic party.

Sir Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): I am delighted to have this opportunity to debate issues raised by the Agriculture Committee's inquiry into health controls on the importation of live animals. I note that Madam Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Liberal Democrats, and I understand that the subject that they wish to raise is about the health of animals within the United Kingdom. I shall not, therefore, go down that road but shall simply deal with our report. I do not wish to minimise the importance of the other subject, which relates to tuberculosis in badgers. As my Committee will investigate the whole of the dairy industry, I have no doubt that we shall receive evidence from the west country on that emotive but important subject during the autumn when we take evidence.

When we set out to do this inquiry, we decided to concentrate on two separate subjects: first, the movement of live animals, particularly farm livestock, into the UK under the new single European market rules; and, secondly—the importance of this area became apparent to us—the rules concerning rabies, quarantine and the importation of pets, particularly dogs and cats. We were fortunate to be advised by Mr. Howard Rees, formerly chief veterinary officer with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, and the late Mr. Tony Crowley, formerly head of the MAFF rabies section, who had advised the channel tunnel company on rabies prevention. We were shocked to learn that, sadly, he had died shortly after our report was published.

Those who simply believe everything that they read in newspapers may think that our report was only about rabies. It was not. However, the interest in that matter is fully understandable so I shall deal with our findings on rabies and quarantine first. Before doing so, I quote the Government's response to our report as it relates to farm livestock. It says:

"The Committee's investigation of this subject, including those incidents in 1993 linked to imported animals, is a valuable service to the public as it puts the disease threat firmly into perspective and refutes the more extreme and alarming predictions about imported disease made by some in the agriculture industry and the veterinary profession."

We approached the question of rabies in a similar fashion. We were open-minded, sought perspective and appropriate solutions, listened and made recommendations. I may not speak for the whole Committee, but it would not be unfair if I said that at the outset the majority of us felt that quarantine was absolutely necessary. The fact that we then unanimously agreed to move away from quarantine shows that we took evidence with great care. The result is perhaps all the more remarkable for the fact that our initial prejudices were moved.

The deep-seated concern—indeed, hatred, worry and fear—about rabies is well merited. Rabies is an extremely unpleasant disease. If no treatment is given, it results in a lengthy, horrible and painful death. Furthermore, the antidote to a dog bite in a country where dog rabies is endemic consisted of a series—more than 30—of extremely unpleasant injections straight into the intestine. So not only was it a frightening disease but the treatment was none too good, either.

MAFF has been spending some £750,000 a year on advertising the horrors of rabies in all ports, airports and some railway stations. It has been issuing leaflets about the dangers of rabies and a great culture of fear of the disease has been generated.

Let us examine the position as regards human beings. There are two sorts of rabies: fox rabies, which is endemic in Europe; and dog rabies, which is endemic in Africa, India, South America and elsewhere in the world. I have never met a Frenchman or German who worries about getting rabies. Our European neighbours do not regard the fact that some wildlife has rabies as a particularly frightening factor.

Moreover, science for human beings as well as for animals has moved on. I understand that, if one is bitten by a rabid dog in India today, provided that one receives the antidote within two to three days, one would have no problem in surviving. The antidote is now a series of injections—five or six—rather like tetanus, so it is not as frightening as it was. The official advice from doctors if one is travelling in those countries is that, unless one expects to be more than a week away from medical attention, there is no need to be vaccinated against rabies. So we must put the whole matter in context. The world has moved on, and medical science has changed.

Nothing that the Select Committee has recommended or would want to do would increase the chance of rabies entering the United Kingdom. We emphasise that point at the beginning of our report and say that our recommendations would not endanger the desirable rabies-free status of these islands. I remind the House, however, that the Rabies (Importation of Dogs, Cats and Other Mammals) Order was passed in 1974 and is therefore more than 20 years old. As I said, science has moved on in the human and animal worlds and the current rules are now outdated and expensive. I shall say a word about animal welfare in a moment.

Our recommendations should provide protection at least equal to, and arguably better than, the present quarantine arrangements. We have recommended a belt-and-braces system whereby a pet cat or dog would be permanently identified by tattoo or implanted chip. It would be vaccinated and then tested to ensure that the vaccination had taken. In any event, we have recommended importation of cats and dogs only from Europe and countries where rabies is not endemic.

The present system has two great weaknesses. The first is cost. Various figures have been given to us, but it seems unlikely that six months' quarantine for a dog would cost less than £1,200 and it could be as much as £1,800 or £2,000. For a cat it would be less—£800 or £900. None the less, it means six months' confinement. We all know that smuggling goes on and I have some figures on that. However, the inducement now is to get over those expenses and there is a very positive financial advantage if one can smuggle an animal into the UK.

I shall now discuss animal welfare. My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) is sitting behind me. He takes a strong interest in animal welfare matters. I would say to him and to the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals that to lock up a domestic pet in strange surroundings for six months, if not cruel, is highly stressful. The figures show that a proportion of cats and dogs do die in quarantine, and it is probably accepted that that is frequently a result of the stress induced by being parted from their owners.

We recommended that animals would be allowed into the United Kingdom without quarantine only in certain circumstances. The animals must enter from another European Union state or a country that is recognised as being rabies-free and which carries out appropriate policies to maintain its rabies-free status. They should be permanently identified by a unique number, which should be marked as a tattoo or contained in an electronic microchip. They should have spent at least six months continuously in the approved country before becoming eligible to enter the United Kingdom. Thus, a dog that had come from India would have to pause elsewhere in the European Union for at least six months if it were to be eligible for the scheme, and there are very few cases of dogs carrying rabies for six months.

The animals would have to have been vaccinated with an approved inactivated rabies vaccine at the age of three months or older. About four months after vaccination, a blood test would have to be carried out by an approved laboratory to determine whether the animal is immune from rabies. The four months between vaccination and blood testing would act as a pseudo-quarantine period.

After being blood tested, animals can enter the UK within 12 months of the initial vaccination. If they travel frequently between the United Kingdom and approved countries, they must receive annual booster vaccinations and travel within one month of such vaccinations being administered, and then only subject to a satisfactory blood test.

The pet owner would have to obtain an import licence from MAFF, specifying the port and time of entry into the UK, and the divisional veterinary officer responsible for the point of destination would have to be informed. Finally, the animal would have to be accompanied by a passport giving a record of its vaccinations and its health certification. That is a pretty demanding and onerous requirement—certainly more than we require of any human being that I know. If there was any failure to comply with such requirements, the animal would have to go into quarantine or be re-exported. We recommended that, at this stage, quarantine should be required in all other circumstances.

What are the risks? What are the real risks of a rabid dog entering the country? They are very slight. Since 1972, 100,000 dogs and 50,000 cats have been through the UK quarantine system, of which only two developed rabies—one dog from the United States and one dog from Zambia, countries which, under our proposals, would continue to be subject to quarantine.

It is worth bearing in mind the fact that, as I said earlier, the rabies in Europe—the strain adapted to foxes—is not nearly as threatening to human beings as dog-adapted "street" rabies in other parts of the world. Dogs and cats can contract fox-mediated rabies, but it would seem that they are unable to pass it on.

We have recommended a system similar to that introduced in Sweden. Sweden has been rabies-free since 1886. It has two borders, one with Norway and one with Finland, which are open borders. It has a high reputation for animal health. It wishes to remain rabies-free, yet it has adopted that system. Even more remarkable, when we went on our visit to Denmark, we found there a country with a 50 km open border with Germany, where there is endemic rabies, and not far away—and from time to time a rabid fox will cross into Denmark and cause trouble.

The Danes have gone much further than the Swedes; they have allowed importation of dogs from any country in the world, with a passport, a certificate of vaccinations but no double test. I doubt whether any country in the world relies more for its living on a clean health chit than the Danes do. Their main livelihood lies in dairy and pig products, and without a high reputation for health standards, Denmark would find it extremely difficult to make its living exporting, as it does, worldwide.

In addition, the prevalence of rabies in Europe is decreasing rapidly. The World Health Organisation report shows that, between 1989 and 1994, the annual number of cases of rabies in European Union member states fell from a peak of 8,509 to 1,582, and it continues to fall. That is entirely due to the European Union's oral vaccination programme, using inoculated baits for foxes. We were privileged to have a briefing on that matter. The original bait was chicken heads. The foxes thought that that was quite clever and used to collect them up, 15 or 20 at a time, so it was not the most economical method of vaccination. A new and more luscious bait was therefore devised which apparently produces in excess of 80 per cent. successfully vaccinated foxes. Once the amount of rabies in a fox population has dropped below a certain level, there are not enough host animals to sustain it, so that programme is proving extremely successful. I should say that it was never our intention that we should import foxes or, for that matter, any other wildlife from the European Union.

The Standing Veterinary Committee in Brussels calculated that, if 1,000 unvaccinated dogs per year were picked randomly from the population and imported into the United Kingdom, it might be expected that a dog incubating rabies would be imported once every 1,250 years. If 5,000 dogs were imported randomly each year from Germany, which is the European Union country with the greatest incidence of rabies, only one animal every 31 years would be expected to be incubating rabies. With vaccination and blood testing, that already remote risk would be reduced even further.

We should consider what motive might drive someone to seek to bring in a rabid dog. Every pet owner wants their pet to be healthy. They spend money on inoculations; they will take it to the vet; they want it as their companion. If some malicious person wishes to introduce rabies into the country, they could have done so a long time ago illegally anyhow, so what are we defending against? The answer must be the cost and welfare considerations.

I have explained that the vaccine technology has changed since the Waterhouse report. The Waterhouse committee was set up after a case about 20 years ago. The modern vaccines were available in the late 60s and early 70s and even then quarantine was recommended, but nowadays there is a substantial smuggling problem. Like my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security, who earlier said how difficult it was to find or quantify cases of social security fraud, I fear that we have no way of quantifying smuggling, but it is worth bearing in mind that, between 1985 and 1993, HM Customs and Excise dealt with 492 cases of illegal entry involving dogs and 273 involving cats—and I suggest that that is very much the tip of the iceberg. One does not have to go very far to find examples. Among our forces in Germany, one can hear a good deal of talk about how they might get over some of the little problems, such as the six months of quarantine and the cost involved.

We see the present system as a ludicrous and unnecessary waste of money. We believe that it is bad for animal welfare and distressing for the owners, and that it restricts freedom of movement. I read in an evening paper today that the Battersea dogs home spends £40,000 on advertisements about the problems associated with people turning their pets out at the beginning of their holidays, leaving them on the streets and abandoning them. Pets could go with their owners to Spain, Italy, France or wherever these people go. Much more importantly, the French, the Italians and the Spanish could bring their dogs here. I understand, although it is not mentioned in our report, that the barrier to bringing pets here is a serious inhibition to tourism. If we had the arrangements that we have in mind, people could bring their pets with them and it would be good for business.

The Government's response was that they were quite happy about our recommendations on farm livestock, presumably because they suited the Government's purposes. We remain extremely surprised, however, at the negative response to our recommendations on rabies. I am delighted to see my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary in her place and I am sure that she will wind up with encouraging words.

She will recall that on many occasions we have argued strongly that Ministers, when taking advice on technical matters from their scientists, should do what their scientists tell them. We do not understand why the scientific advice that Ministers are being given on this subject is so at variance with the experience of countries such as Sweden and Denmark. I shall therefore press my hon. Friend to make her case clearly.

This week, the British Medical Association sounded off on the subject of rabies. There followed a series of statements in the association's report, mostly restricted to the basic principle that if we have not had rabies we should not change anything because the system has worked. Of course it has worked. We are simply saying that there is a better way to achieve the same objective. There is quite a piece in the BMA recommendations about foxes—I was a bit mystified by the BMA's apparent expertise on foxes—and the British Veterinary Association took a similar view. It just so happens that Mr. De Vile, who is president of the BVA, served on the BMA committee as well. Presumably his prejudices have been carried from one organisation to the other.

Sir Roger Moate (Faversham): I think that I heard my hon. Friend say a moment ago that he recommended that the Government should accept scientific advice. Does my hon. Friend not cast the BMA and the British Veterinary Association as sources of good scientific advice? Why does he reject their advice?

Sir Jerry Wiggin: I certainly do not. However, if my hon. Friend studied the BMA report, he would find that there is nothing at all scientific about it. It is simply a statement of prejudicial facts, written on BMA paper. It is very irresponsible of such an organisation to produce statements based on prejudice and not on fact.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is it not the case that, if the hon. Member for Faversham (Sir R. Moate) had been on the Committee six months previously, he would agree with the hon. Gentleman today? He would have changed his mind too.

Sir Jerry Wiggin: I look forward to hearing what my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Sir R. Moate) has to say in a few moments.

When the Community passed the Balai directive, the United Kingdom found itself in a difficult position. Here was a directive which said that, if people complied with a series of precautions not dissimilar to those that we have suggested—although somewhat more stringent, I admit—so-called traded dogs and cats could come in and out of the United Kingdom without quarantine. In theory at least, that system has been working for a few months.

The conditions are so stringent that, I understand, the few dogs and cats to have tried it have mostly failed the tests. However, the fact is that the Government, advised by their scientists, are prepared to allow traded dogs and cats to come in and out, but are not prepared to allow this to be the case with pets. What is the difference? What is the difference in risk? Surely the Government are right to agree to the principle. In that case, it is quite illogical not to agree to its extension.

The international panel of experts on animal diseases—the Office Internationale des Epizooties—sees a system of vaccination and blood testing as a perfectly viable alternative to quarantine for rabies. Even the BMA, about which I was not very polite just now, suggests only that quarantine should remain until additional requirements can be fulfilled. My Committee feels most strongly that the UK should move towards a more rational and appropriate means of protecting our rabies-free status.

I am delighted to see my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on the Front Bench, and I welcome him to his new position. We look forward to having him in front of our Committee in due course. I hope that he has been listening with an open mind to this debate and that he will, in due course, study our report with care.

We are having to wait until other countries, such as Norway, Sweden and Denmark, have satisfied us that all their precautions work perfectly well. For a country of our size, that is a great pity. In a debate in the other place on 15 March, Earl Howe—then Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food—hinted that with effective enforcement, alternative systems could provide the same level of assurance as quarantine. That would be a welcome step forward in Government policy since the reply to our report was published. Incidentally, during that debate, of the nine Lords and Ladies who spoke, all except the Minister were in favour of our report and against quarantine.

To deal briefly with the subject of farm livestock, we found that there was considerable feeling about various problems which had arisen, especially in relation to warble fly. Imported animals had clearly been given fraudulent certificates or had simply not been properly inspected before being imported. We had a look to see whether the new arrangements, under the single market, were satisfactory. We considered foot and mouth disease, brucellosis, Newcastle disease, Aujeszky's disease and many others which cause farmers a great deal of concern.

Diseases in animals are detrimental to the animals themselves, to good husbandry and to the wealth of farmers. Disease threatens livelihoods and the survival of businesses. Some diseases are transmissible to humans, putting the health of farmers, farm workers and their families at risk. We in the United Kingdom have never taken lightly the diseases of farm animals, and nor should we. Our island status has allowed eradication of the worst livestock diseases and has prevented others from becoming established.

Our high animal health status has been achieved at great cost and we should not allow the Community's rules, or anybody else's, to reduce that status. Between 1983 and 1990, £38 million was spent on eradicating Aujeszky's disease, of which pig producers contributed £27 million. Indeed, I remember replying to an Adjournment debate on that subject and reminding farmers that, although we were happy for Aujeszky's disease to be eliminated, we did not see the Government contributing too much to that effort. As I have said, the farmers contributed most of the money and there has been a very successful campaign which must not be damaged.

We fully understand that the single market caused the farming community some concern. The new system of veterinary checks is very different, and there was considerable concern, especially in the case of cattle, that it might have been at fault. The Committee did not find that to have been the case, but we recognised that things had changed.

Under the previous system, importers applied for an import licence from MAFF and the animals were then certified by the vet in the country of origin. The certificate was then checked on arrival at the point of entry in the United Kingdom and the animals were held for a further 21 days as a precaution, particularly against foot and mouth disease.

Both those procedures have now changed. The European Union adopted an eradication scheme for foot and mouth and it is now free of that disease. The United Kingdom could no longer justify the 21-day holding period, and it was removed in 1992. As of January 1993, point of entry checks were abandoned in favour of spot checks and checking at the point of destination.

Under the new system, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is notified of animals to be imported, the points of entry and journey plans via a Europewide ANIMO computer network. It was not working particularly well when we went to see it in operation, but the officers were managing very well with faxes and they seemed to know when and where the animals were coming from, so we were satisfied that all was in order.

The removal of the point-of-entry holding period for foot and mouth disease eliminated an economic barrier to the import of lower value cattle as dairy replacements. Livestock has been bought recently from countries such as Holland and France because it is cheaper than the rather higher class stock that is available in the United Kingdom. Between 1990 and 1993, the number of cattle imported from France and the Netherlands increased from 90 and 150 to about 6,200 and 5,500 respectively. With that increase in numbers came a heightened disease risk, which we accepted.

The Committee considered that the majority of problems were caused by the increased volume of imports and by the type of animals imported—particularly those originating from behind the former iron curtain. Some of the disease scares may not have been detected under the old system. That is particularly true of imported cattle infected with warble fly larvae and those vaccinated against foot and mouth disease, which contravenes the principles and rules of our scheme. We decided that there was no disease time bomb and we gave a general endorsement to the system, which was borne out by subsequent events.

The Committee was concerned that some aspects of the system needed fine-tuning. We urged the Government to ensure that the European Union devoted sufficient funds to the Community veterinary fund to allow the disease control and eradication programmes to operate effectively. There is a substantial problem with swine fever in Germany, and the Germans are very keen to give up their slaughter policy and return to inoculation and vaccination. That would be completely wrong, and it would undermine the purpose of the central programme.

We urged the Government to make clear representations to the European Commission about the need to consider and rapidly approve the additional trade guarantees which allow member states to impose conditions on imports where special circumstances apply. Perhaps more importantly, we suggested that there should be a one-week compulsory holding period for imported animals at the point of destination to allow the state veterinary service to conduct appropriate checks on health certificates. That point of destination could well be the farm of ultimate destination, but the animals should be kept separate and examined. That is a common-sense precaution.

We also suggested that the European Union should instigate measures to assure itself that the standards of veterinary training and of the state veterinary services in all member states are of a uniformly high standard; that adequate penalties are applied to any veterinary surgeon who is found to have falsely certified an animal; and that certification procedures throughout the European Union are harmonised, with documentation in the languages of both the importing and the exporting countries.

It was very difficult to get the vets and Ministry officials to admit to the Committee that the training schemes for vets in Greece were not adequate, but I can tell the House that they are not. The European Union was wrong not to take a more open approach to the issue. It investigated the veterinary services in all member states and reported its conclusions to the state concerned, but it did not make the report available elsewhere. It is crucial to the operation of a health scheme that those who certify animals are trained to an adequate standard. We have the highest standards of qualifications and experience in this country and we should insist upon the same standards in our EU partner countries.

The Committee was grateful that the Government were in broad agreement with its main recommendations, but it would be helpful if the Parliamentary Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mrs. Browning), could indicate what progress has been made in implementing the recommendations.

We suggested that stock imported into the United Kingdom should be marked with specially coloured tags and we found it difficult to understand why the Government failed to accept our recommendation. Their view was that the new animal identification system, which was introduced under directive 92/102/EEC and came into effect in the United Kingdom on 1 April 1995, would ensure that an animal's country of origin could be established. However, I am afraid that the Government have missed the point of the proposal. We wanted to ensure that an animal in a pen with a special coloured tag could be identified immediately as an imported animal. It should stand out as such, as occurs in other countries in the European Union. That was virtually the only recommendation in that part of the report with which the Government did not agree.

We welcome the fact that MAFF has relaunched the "Don't import disease" campaign. We hope that we set out the principle that those who buy stock abroad should ensure—if necessary at their own expense—that the stock is healthy before bringing it into the country. We would like to know more about the progress of Government efforts to persuade the EU to publish the full Bendixen/Dexter report on the quality and structure of veterinary services in member states, to which I have referred.

The Committee also dealt with problems with horses, birds and fish. Hon. Members will be interested to learn that yesterday MAFF appointed a new inspector of imported fish. While we welcome that move, there are many other problems to consider also. Caged birds continue to be smuggled into the country and the prices at which they are advertised for sale clearly show that the birds have not come through the normal importation procedures. We are worried that bird smuggling will lead to the introduction of Newcastle disease, which could have a disastrous effect on our poultry industry.

I will not go into the details of spring viraemia of carp or viral haemorrhagic septicaemia and other such matters, as they are set out in the report. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary will mention them in her winding-up speech.

We believe that the recommendations in our report, whether relating to the importation of farm animals or to protecting the United Kingdom from rabies, were based on a thorough assessment of the risks and that they constitute appropriate responses to the threat that is posed to the United Kingdom's high health status. We are disappointed at the Government's seemingly blinkered defence of the status quo with respect to rabies and quarantine and we hope that the new team will rethink the matter. The Government do not appear to dispute the facts on which our proposals are based, and we have detected a growing hint of acceptance in recent Government statements. Let us hope that that acceptance will grow a great deal more this evening.

Ms Jean Corston (Bristol, East): As a member of the Agriculture Select Committee, I welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate on our report entitled "Health Controls on the Importation of Live Animals". The inquiry took place because of the need to remove barriers in a single market, but I think that every member of the Select Committee was determined to ensure that we should not use that as an excuse for relaxing health controls when importing animals into the United Kingdom, because over the years we have achieved very high health standards, particularly with domestic pets and farm livestock.

I was particularly concerned about the vulnerability of farmers who purchase livestock from abroad, as it seems that they will receive only a warranty and an indemnity against purchasing a sick animal. I believe that such a warranty and indemnity would not be enforceable in law, and therefore not worth very much. In that context, holding periods for livestock and coloured ear tags to identify imported livestock would prove a useful protection for farmers. For example, the Danes use coloured ear tags on imported pigs, and if the Danes can do it, I see no reason why we should not do so.

As the Chairman of the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin), said, a great deal of the Committee's time was spent examining the rabies question. I began the investigation absolutely convinced that rabies was right, that we ought to keep it—[Hon. Members: "Quarantine."] That quarantine was right. I apologise, and I thank my hon. Friends for putting me right.

I was absolutely convinced that quarantine had protected this country against rabies—a disease that all of us find utterly horrifying—and that at all costs our report should conclude with the recommendation that quarantine should stay. I make no apology for being persuaded by the evidence that I was wrong. A system of vaccination with an inactivated virus followed by blood tests would be much more satisfactory than quarantine and would serve the needs of pet owners and the general population.

[Ms Jean Corston]

In living memory there have been two cases of rabies in dogs in this country: one in 1969 in Camberley and one in 1970 in Newmarket. Both dogs had been through quarantine and developed rabies subsequently. I notice that the British Medical Association report, to which reference has been made, says that quarantine, which was introduced in 1901, has been effective since 1971. If a dog develops rabies after quarantine, we should first consider that indication of its effectiveness.

The other thing that I did not know about rabies was that there are two kinds. The kind that most of us are terrified of—the image of the dog salivating—is dog rabies, which is endemic in parts of the world such as the Indian subcontinent and, primarily, the southern hemisphere in Africa. In Europe, fox rabies occurs. In that context, the fox vaccination programme in the European Union was one of the aspects of EU policy with which I was impressed. With fox rabies, the dog which is bitten, if a dog is ever bitten by a fox—it does not happen often—is called the end host. The dog almost never passes on the rabies.

To people who are concerned, shake their heads or look puzzled, I say that there is no difference between fox rabies in a dog or a cat and fox rabies in horses, sheep and cattle, because all mammals are susceptible, but that does not stop imports of farm livestock. Nobody suggests that we should not bring in horses, sheep or cattle or that they should all be locked up for six months to see whether they develop rabies, because we think that the risk is so negligible that it is not worth considering. Yet we say that precisely such rules should apply to domestic pets. That inconsistency of treatment between domestic pets and farm livestock was one of the first reasons why I became uneasy about quarantine.

It is important to remember that the last known death of a human from rabies in Europe was in 1928 in France, and that since then excellent vaccines have been developed against fox rabies and rabies in humans.

Between 1972 and 1993, a total of 150,720 dogs and cats went through quarantine, during which time there were only two cases of rabies: one of a dog imported from the United States of America and the other of a dog from Zambia. Both had dog rabies from countries where dog rabies was prevalent. There was not a single case from areas where fox rabies was prevalent. That leads me to conclude that, although the risk is minimal, we obviously want to guard against it, but with a better system than quarantine.

I consider quarantine a blunt instrument. It costs approximately £1,200 to quarantine a dog. I note that the BMA discounts the possibility of smuggling and says that there is only anecdotal evidence of it. It is not anecdotal. The Chairman of the Select Committee gave the figures of detected cases, which amount to about 100 a year. That is probably the tip of the iceberg, because travel between the European continent and Great Britain is now much easier. The volume of traffic has increased enormously because of the channel tunnel and cross-channel ferries, and opportunities for smuggling have grown tremendously.

Sweden, a country which I admire, has been free of rabies since 1886. I think that it is right to say that the Swedish are as concerned about their health and their protection from the risk of rabies as we are. The Select Committee went to see the Swedish system in operation. It was launched on 1 May 1994, it involves vaccination and subsequent blood testing to ensure that a dog is rabies-free, and it seems to be virtually foolproof. Seeing that system in operation finally convinced me that it was the way forward for this country.

The Committee proposes a system which is better than quarantine. It involves microchipping or tattooing the dog or cat, vaccination with an inactivated vaccine, testing the blood for the effectiveness of the vaccine after four months and requiring that the animal is brought into the United Kingdom within a 12-month period with an import licence and an animal health passport.

As Select Committee members and people who are responsible for animal welfare and public health in this country, we want a better system and one that does not encourage smuggling. We have to set that, as I have said, in the context of the channel tunnel, the growth in ferry traffic and the fact that the single market provides for the free movement of workers. If people have a right to move between countries of the European Union for work, the question should then arise: what about those with domestic pets? How will those people behave in the face of Britain's quarantine system? That problem is not confined to service personnel; it affects many people's work, holidays and other situations to which I shall refer.

I congratulate the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on one achievement: it has had the most tremendous success in terrifying people about the risk of rabies. The placards showing the skull and crossbones at every port put the fear of God into everybody—they have certainly always terrified me, and were part of the reason why I thought that quarantine was a thoroughly good idea. During our inquiry, it was pointed out by a couple of experts from whom we took evidence that Britain was becoming the laughing stock in Europe on this issue, and I believe that that is true.

Although the risk might be minute and it is vital to have a safe and secure system, the issue of quarantine is important for certain groups of people. Recently, the House has been quite rightly concerned about civil rights for disabled persons. I ask hon. Members to stop and consider the case of guide-dog users. Guide-dog users cannot travel if they are British because if they leave the country with their dog they cannot bring it back until it has been quarantined for six months. That is ridiculous. There should be a system under which a dog can be protected from rabies, humans who have any contact with that dog can be protected from any risk and a blind person can enjoy foreign travel like the rest of us.

I have concluded that our policy on rabies is a little like the man who used to go round snapping his fingers all the time. Somebody finally asked him why he was doing it and he said that it was to keep elephants out of the country. When it was pointed out that there were not any elephants in the country, he said: "It just goes to show how effective it is." It seems ludicrous to suggest that a policy that keeps out dogs, the ineffectiveness of which was shown in 1969 and 1970, should not be replaced in the modern world with a system that, with the free movement of people, provides for the protection of animals and public health.

8.9 pm

Sir Roger Moate (Faversham): The great privilege of serving on the Agriculture Select Committee was bestowed on me only a few months ago, so I carry neither blame nor credit for the report.

Throughout my political career, however that might be described, I have always been sceptical about Select Committees, but I have come to appreciate the quality and quantity of the work undertaken by the Select Committee on which I serve. I was most impressed by the commitment shown by its members of all parties and by their non-partisan approach to matters that are examined in the Committee's latest report.

I was also impressed by the professionalism of the staff in respect of matters of extreme technical difficulty and physical sensitivity. The work done by my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin) in conducting the affairs of a difficult lot with great humour, diligence and application was first-class. As with the report, a tremendous amount of high-quality work is done by the Committee and I was agreeably surprised. I hope that I may enjoy continuing to serve the Committee for some years.

The report's introduction emphasises how seriously the Committee's latest and other investigations are taken. The report is impressive, but I do not agree with its conclusions. Incidentally, although the report required a visit to Scandinavia, we also visited the quarantine station at Heathrow airport, quarantine kennels near Deal, a farm near Rugby, the Folkestone terminal and, inevitably, Brussels. I place that on record for the benefit of critics outside the House, because that is hardly a Cook's tour of exotic destinations.

One criticism I have of Select Committee reports is that their conclusions are too general, too wordy and insufficiently politically challenging. In this case, the proposal to change quarantine policy is specific, clear and challenging—and in my view, totally wrong. I agree with the Government's response and look forward to hearing the reply of my hon. Friend the Minister. I welcome the Government's determination to maintain the existing quarantine system, and I am glad that policy is strongly supported in the powerful paper from the British Medical Association that was circulated to Members of Parliament earlier this week.

I do not ignore for one moment the powerful voices in favour of change. I read the Select Committee and British Medical Association reports thoroughly, but I can claim to have read the evidence only to the extent that the Chancellor of the Exchequer read the Maastricht treaty. However, it is an impressive dossier. I read carefully the impressive evidence from pet owners, who pay the price financially and emotionally. The stress of enforced separation for six months, or for ever in many cases, is a real factor that I do not disguise.

The hon. Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston) referred to the single market argument. The Conservative ex-MEP for East Kent, Christopher Jackson, presented a powerful report on the subject from the point of view of the European Parliament. I do not underestimate the dramatic progress made in Europe in controlling rabies and its elimination in many parts of the continent—a remarkable change in the life of our nation and of the continent. However, the European Union is enlarging rapidly to the east and will no doubt do so to the south, to the Mediterranean.

In a few years' time, the EU could have twice the number of member states. It would be a brave man or woman who asserted that those new frontiers will be as rabies-proof as the frontiers of the EU's present members. One welcomes the optimism that rabies might be eradicated in the EU by the turn of the century, but there are overwhelming arguments against the likelihood of that happening.

Britain can be thankful that it is free of rabies, while Europe can rejoice that the disease is being defeated on the continent. We must not, however, lose sight of the horrifying nature of the disease. My hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare almost struck a note of complacency with regard to the nature of the disease elsewhere in the world. He said that the world has moved on, but the good research paper produced by the Library states:

> "Worldwide, around 6.5 million people receive treatment every year after being bitten or scratched by dogs, and 33,000 people die each year from dog rabies."

As the hon. Member for Bristol, East said, most of those deaths occur in India. My point is that the world has not moved on that much.

The hon. Lady said also that she was frightened by the skull and crossbones posters at ports. That is a good thing, because—even if the Select Committee's recommendations are accepted—the threat of rabies will remain, from all the non-approved countries in other parts of the world. I hope that small and large ports throughout the country would still display skull and crossbones posters to stop the entry of rabid animals from the many countries that will not become rabies-free.

Ms Corston: The hon. Gentleman is aware that the Select Committee recommended that quarantine should stay in the countries to which he referred.

Sir Roger Moate: That was my point, so posters would need to remain and we would have to maintain justified public fear of rabies returning from other parts of the world.

My hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare referred to the horrifying nature of rabies. Anyone who doubts its effects will find in the Library paper a couple of pages that make gruesome reading. It is easy to understand why we are so concerned to ensure that there is not the smallest risk of rabies being reintroduced into this country.

I have often thought that our island status has given us the best of all worlds. It makes us a strong nation state and allows us to be one of the most international outward-looking nations on Earth. At the same time, our island status allows us to be insular when that happens to suit our purpose, which has proved a superbly successful bastion against rabies in particular. The quarantine system has not only worked remarkably well but has given the public crucial confidence—the belief that we are and can remain a rabies-free nation. That confidence is a priceless asset. If there were at any time a revival of the fear of rabies, which could be generated by fox rabies as much as dog rabies, there would be serious consequences.

[Sir Roger Moate]

It is proposed to remove that bastion and end the quarantine system and to replace it with a system of pet passports, chips and tattoos.

Ms Corston: Vaccines.

Sir Roger Moate: Yes, the pet passport is a record of those. I do not want to trivialise these techniques, especially as they are being used by other nations.

Sir Jerry Wiggin: My hon. Friend is perfectly right about the fear in people's minds. He is a well travelled man. Would he say that his friends in France and Germany ever talk about this matter, or worry about it, or take any medical precautions? The fact is that they do not.

Sir Roger Moate: I suspect that the issue would seldom be a topic of conversation because Britons travelling abroad have become so used to not taking their pets with them, as they know that they cannot be brought back here, that they have long ceased discussing it. My hon. Friend is right: only fox rabies is a problem in those countries, not dog rabies—but that is not the point. My hon. Friend himself said that the system that he is proposing is far more onerous and demanding than any that we apply to human beings, so he is not really suggesting free movement at all. The logic of his case is that there should be free movement, without controls or vaccinations.

I do not want to trivialise or minimise the value of the pet passport, even though someone suggested to me earlier that it might mean queues of black labradors waiting to have their passport photographs taken. I realise that microchips are seen as a useful form of international control, but we cannot take tattoos too seriously, although the Committee seemed to do so. The Government point out that tattoos on dogs are hard to read and are easily altered.

My worry is that all these systems are easily susceptible to fraud and error. Documents are easily forged, and information for computers and microchips can be easily tampered with when it is being put in. Such systems require scrutiny at a very limited number of ports of entry. As I understand it, we do not have the structures to allow these inspections to take place.

I ask the House to compare these proposals with the certainty that the quarantine system gives us. The only element of uncertainty comes with smuggling, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare has already said, the new regime would be onerous and time-consuming—and there would still be smuggling. That possibility is not eliminated.

I suspect that most caring pet owners will not break the law and do not break it now. The fact is that six months' quarantine, although painful to some, is a system that gives the public great confidence that the disease is unlikely ever to re-enter this country. The BMA states:

"Although the risk of a rabid animal entering the country is small, the consequences could be disastrous . . . Changes to the British way of life . . . would be far reaching. All pets would require vaccination; everyone involved with work with animals would need to be vaccinated; and any bite or scratch from a sick animal . . . would have to be treated immediately. The well-known British affection for animals would have to be tempered by caution".

Ms Corston indicated dissent.

Sir Roger Moate: One cannot deny that these would be the consequences. In the past, the spread of rabies was prevented by the muzzling of dogs. It is noteworthy that one of the contingency plans of MAFF for the outbreak of rabies would be poisoning foxes with strychnine, at serious risk to other animals. No one in his right mind wants to risk that. It is a fair point to make to distressed pet owners facing enforced separation from their pets under the quarantine system that the pain, suffering and cost of the spread of rabies would be far worse for pets and people alike.

I want to turn briefly to the question of risk, because that is what the argument is all about. How much greater would the risks be, if at all, if we abandoned the quarantine system and adopted the system of vaccination and microchips? It is here that I found the Select Committee's report and the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare least convincing.

He said that we could import a rabid animal, in certain circumstances, once every 31 years. That is the statistical consideration. I remember severe floods in the town of Sheerness in my constituency one Christmas in the 1970s. Several hundred houses were flooded, and we were told that it was a one-in-a-thousand-year flood. A week later, the same houses were flooded again, but we were told that that did not alter the statistics—it was still one-in-a-thousand-year flood. So much for statistical averages.

I was therefore not impressed with the idea that only a very low risk is involved. I believe that, when the system was changed in Finland to one similar to what is proposed by the Select Committee, 10 times as many animals were imported to the country. Given the pet-loving nature of our nation, I suspect that there would be a huge increase in the number of pets brought to this country as well. The risks must therefore be seen in the context of a tremendous increase in the numbers.

It is easy to say, as the Committee does, that these risks would be small; but I prefer the verdict of the BMA, which says that one case introduced into a susceptible population may be enough to start an animal epidemic. I do not know why we should change a system that works and which brings with it so much confidence.

When it comes to foodstuffs, pesticides, herbicides, nitrate levels and organophosphates, we are told by the scientists that we should take no risks whatever. I remember the recent carrot episode, when it was discovered that one carrot in thousands might have too high an accumulation of something unpleasant. The whole system had to be changed, and the British population was warned to top and tail its carrots before eating them raw. The margin of safety had been reduced from 100 to 93—a minuscule change, but apparently we must not take risks with carrots. On the other hand, it seems that we can with rabies—[HON. MEMBERS: "Come on."] It is the same. If we take the scientific advice, we should have to decide that, if there is any risk at all in removing the quarantine system, we ought not to remove it. Most of us fear the rabid fox more than we do the carrot.

The Committee went wrong by failing to understand the incalculable value of the sense of security that has been achieved by current procedures: they work and they inspire confidence. Pet owners going abroad know the rules. Over the years, the British people have come to accept the system. Of course there are many who do not like it, but it is seen by the vast majority as an effective system. Preventing rabies from re-entering the country must be our paramount object. It is only when rabies has been virtually eliminated around the world—diseases are being eliminated around the world—that we can contemplate abandoning our unique advantage of the ocean barriers which have allowed us to operate a highly effective quarantine system.

8.28 pm

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): I beg to move,

That Class III, Vote 3 be reduced by £1,000 in respect of subheads B2 and D2 (Taking action against diseases with implications for human health (PP2): current costs).

I am sure that hon. Members will recognise that our amendment is merely a device to underline the urgency and sense of frustration that a great many right hon. and hon. Members feel about some very difficult questions. Indeed, if the rules of the House permitted it, we would seek to increase the sum available for this purpose, not to decrease it.

I want to touch on rabies only briefly, because I want to discuss three other matters of concern to a large number of hon. Members. I also want to mention BSE, bovine TB, and sheep scab and blowfly. I do not do so as my party's spokesman on those issues, because there is a great deal of cross-party, non-partisan concern and interest. I have been fascinated to find that, on balance, I shall be on the same side as the Minister on rabies, and with the hon. Member for Faversham (Sir R. Moate), although I do not take such an apocalyptic view, which he appears to take, about the Select Committee's recommendations.

On the other side, I notice that the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin) has the cross-party support of the Committee. There has already been an eloquent explanation from the hon. Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston) on why Members have changed their minds on the subject. I am sure that we are all seeking the same objectives. We arrive at them, perhaps, by different means.

I now deal with the Select Committee's report. I have the highest regard for the Select Committee—although I am not a member of it, and perhaps that increases my respect—collectively and individually. It has done the House a considerable service, not just with this report but with much of the other work that it has done. I believe, however, that the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare, as Chairman, did not do justice to the arguments when he dismissed out of hand the concerns of the British Medical Association and the British Veterinary Association. I shall refer to those associations in a moment.

My approach—I am quite frank about it—is that I wanted to be persuaded by the Select Committee. I would have been delighted to feel that we could move away from the present restrictions, because I am only too conscious of the concerns and the unfortunate effects that the present arrangements have on pet owners—not just service personnel, as the hon. Member for Bristol, East said, but the large number of people who now travel for work purposes and who find that they cannot take their pets with them. We should recognise that the recommendations of the Select Committee will not solve that problem overnight.

On the BMA report, I shall quote from the guide that we have been given by the doctors, in which they say:

"Britain cannot tolerate any lowering in the standards of precautions for keeping rabies out of Britain, as the consequences of their being breached could be so great. Although quarantine is very expensive for those individuals who use it, the costs of eradicating rabies, if this were actually possible, once it had entered Britain, would be very much greater."

I notice that the Select Committee, in its reliance on the Swedish example, is not followed by the BMA, which points out in its own report, published on Monday of this week, that the Swedes have not experienced, and did not expect to experience, a reduction or elimination in smuggling as a result of the change. The report says:

"A risk assessment of Sweden's then proposed vaccination system, carried out by the Swedish Board of Agriculture, concluded 'It is by no means self-evident that smuggling will be reduced if the rules are altered' (from quarantine to vaccination and certification)."

So let us not be fooled into thinking that even those who have the experience on which the Select Committee places such reliance really expected to stamp out smuggling or have experienced a reduction in it.

The BMA and the BVA have demonstrated to great effect the differing circumstances in different countries. They point, for example, to the prevalence and growth in the number of urban foxes in the United Kingdom, which is totally different from anything experienced in the Scandinavian countries referred to in the debate.

In the circumstances, we have to take seriously the misgivings of the professionals. It is wrong simply to sweep them aside as if they did not matter, or to say in the words, I think, of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), "Oh, well, they would say that, wouldn't they? They have a financial interest." That reduces the value of the debate, and we have to take seriously what they say.

The BMA says of a rabies epidemic that there would be "massive killing of wildlife in affected areas, muzzling of dogs, keeping cats housebound and killing strays."

That is not a prospect that any of us can consider with equanimity.

Sir Jerry Wiggin: I did say, although not today in the House, that I was suspicious of the motives of the BVA, and I did imply that there might be some financial incentive in the quarantine system. I am convinced that that is not true and that is wrong, and I wish to withdraw it publicly. Indeed, if our system were to be adopted, I suspect that the veterinary profession would gain handsomely from the work involved in vaccination and certification.

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. It was actually an Opposition Member who made that suggestion this evening. It is precisely because I think that the hon. Gentleman and his Committee have taken a level-headed approach to the issue, and I sympathise with it, that I regret the fact that they were rather dismissive this evening of the misgivings of the BMA and the BVA. I am with the Minister on this issue. I hope to demonstrate to her that, on this issue at least, I take a non-partisan view.

Sir Roger Moate: It is very courteous of the hon. Gentleman to give way. He suggested that I was being apocalyptic. In fact, I was quoting from the same sources as he is and used almost exactly the same words as those that he has just used.

Mr. Tyler: I understand the point that the hon. Gentleman made, but I still think that perhaps he overplayed his case. On balance, this is not the right time to make the change. I understand that to be the position of the Ministry.

I now deal with BSE, bovine spongiform encephalopathy—I think that I have just about got it right—or what most people call mad cow disease. I ask the Minister, as this is the first opportunity that we have had to do so, to explain precisely how the Ministry views the changes in the arrangements that have been announced in the past few days. We have all assumed that the ban on the use of potentially affected parts of animal carcases in feedstuffs was the essential element in our protective system, and that once they were out of the food chain, we could look forward to a substantial improvement in the situation. That has been the accepted wisdom of the scientists who advise the Ministry, and, indeed, Members of the House.

However, the EU Commission's decision this week to change the arrangements, apparently under pressure from the German Government, raises some difficult questions. We are told on the one hand that it raises questions about the scientific basis on which our Ministry has been operating. It suggests that perhaps there is some way in which the disease can be inherited from cow to calf—otherwise, how can the Commission possibly justify changing the date—or, alternatively, that somehow the possible sources of the disease have remained in the food chain for longer than was previously anticipated. I hope that the Minister will reassure us on that.

I notice that the Meat and Livestock Commission had at least two views on that last Thursday. One veterinary officer was saying that it would make it easier to export from this country to other member states in the European Union, while another was saying that only would result in any change in the export situation.

"a sea change in the attitudes of German consumers to beef"

The critical issue, surely, is: are the policies, to which we refer in our amendment and which we are debating tonight, still as scientifically and intellectually substantial? Can we rely on them in the same way as we have in the past, if, as seems likely, the EU has changed its stance and raised questions about the matter? We need to know whether our Government are satisfied with the integrity of the scientific thesis on which they are operating, and if they are not, is it just German protectionism in disguise?

I now deal with bovine tuberculosis. The Minister and I had a brief exchange on that at Question Time last week and she has been kind enough to write to me since. I wish to make it absolutely clear that I do not pretend to be an expert on this subject; no doubt other hon. Members are more expert than me. I look to the Select Committee—it has done a very good job on many subjects, including the import of livestock—as being the only effective mechanism that we have to get evidence from a wide range of different interests where clearly the reputation and credibility of the Ministry are in question, and they are in question.

I recall a briefing by the Minister's predecessor, which I have no doubt other hon. Members recall, on the subject of TB—it must have been two or two and a half years ago—when we were given to understand that there was real confidence that a change in the Ministry's policy in terms of live testing would not eradicate—we would not expect that—but would dramatically change the situation. We were all given real confidence that that would be the case.

We have to look at the figures. We can dispute the exact scale of increase. The Minister has been kind enough to point out that the extrapolation of the figures that I gave the House last week would imply a steady rise over the year, and that may not be true. I accept that. But the Minister has also been good enough to say:

"I am very worried about the incidence of bovine tuberculosis . . . the cause of that is badgers."—[Official Report, 6 July 1995; Vol. 263, c. 505.]

If that is true, I have to tell the Minister that an increasing number of farmers no longer believe it. I have had examples in my constituency, which I have brought to the Minister's attention, where the testing of badgers produced no results, where there is no obvious badger activity in the immediate surrounding area, where the animals have not had contact with other neighbouring farms, where there are few visitors to the farm and where it would seem that there is no obvious connection between a contaminated badger sett and an outbreak of TB. There are several examples of that, and farmers are as worried about it as anybody else. Yet the system relies entirely on the assumption that the circle of infection is due to badgers, as the Minister said again last week.

The hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) may be equally positive that badgers are not to blame, but I am more sceptical. [Interruption.] No doubt in due course the hon. Gentleman will put his view. I am an agnostic. All I do know is that dairy farmers and the animal welfare groups do not believe that the Ministry can continue with the present policy without independent objective analysis from outside the Ministry. It cannot remain judge of its own case for any longer.

It is for that reason that I have urged the Ministry to accept the need for such a study. If it can be included in the Select Committee's currently projected studies into the dairy industry, so be it, but if it has to be a separate study, I hope that the Chairman and the Minister will co-operate in some such independent objective inquiry. Otherwise, I cannot see how the two sides in the argument will stop their dialogue of the deaf.

In the meantime, I hope that no one is under any illusion about the substantial cost to the industry. I have here an example of a farm in Gloucestershire that was extensively analysed in a recent edition of Farmers' Weekly, where the estimated cost of the testing, direct movement restriction, changing farm policy, insurance costs and so on is £111,000. That is a net cost after compensation has been received. It is a huge sum.

The farmer, Mr. Rowe, says:

"MAFF is so behind with badger trapping that, in some cases, there is a six to 10-month gap between a breakdown and trapping . . . We shall have to turn our stock out on to pasture which is riddled with badgers that we know have TB. A badger vaccine, with food used as a vector, is the main answer. Otherwise TB in cattle will continue. MAFF knows the problem but it needs more funding from the Treasury."

There are other examples.

I am sure that hon. Members from dairy areas will be able to confirm that there is real concern about the lack of resources. Even if one accepts the MAFF thesis, the lack of resources means that there is a long delay before action is taken. I had another example at my advice surgery last weekend, of a farmer who was crying out for live testing. Apparently, the veterinary service is prepared to provide it, but the lack of resources means that there is a long delay.

It is the responsibility of Members of Parliament to monitor, scrutinise and call the Government to account. That is the precise purpose of today's debate. I do not pretend that I have a solution to every complicated aspect of the problem. I certainly have not. A great many much wiser heads than mine have been applied to it. But what I do believe is that, just as the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare could claim that his Select Committee had approached in an open-minded and thorough way the problem of the import of livestock, it should be asked to look at this problem with exactly the same approach.

Finally, I come to the problems of sheep scab and blowfly and the products that are used to treat and prevent those diseases in sheep. The Minister has been kind enough to meet a small all-party group on a number of occasions, as did previous Ministers of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the right hon. Members for Norfolk, South-West (Mrs. Shephard) and for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer). I think that the Minister acknowledges that there is all-party concern.

Here we have a problem where the animal disease that we are seeking to cure is not going away, but at the same time the apparently most effective way of dealing with it has the most horrendous side effects in terms of human health. The products to which I am referring are the organophosphorous compounds that are most often used in sheep dip to try to deal with those problems.

For many years, sheep scab was a notifiable disease. For many years, the Ministry effectively enforced twice yearly and then, for a few years, annually, the compulsory dipping of sheep. Suddenly, in 1992, without much warning, that was removed, either, according to one version, because sheep scab had been eradicated or was in the process of being eradicated, or because, according to another version, it did not seem to be doing much good as there was still a lot of sheep scab about. They were curiously conflicting arguments.

Whatever may have been the rationale then, the rationale now is surely inadequate. Since 1992—the Ministry has just issued some more information—sheep scab has been on the increase. The Ministry has been monitoring carefully what has been happening in markets. It cannot give exact and detailed figures but, as a result, it is increasing sheep scab surveillance. The Minister has announced in my part of the world in the south-west that fines of up to £5,000 are possible for sheep scab—not, it should be said, under the notifiable disease legislation, as I understand it, but under some environmental health or animal cruelty legislation. That is fair enough. Sheep scab is a serious disease.

But hon. Members surely cannot be satisfied when the Government are spending quite a lot of money, as is the industry, without achieving any improvement. All we are doing is causing a great many people the discomfort, cost and, potentially, the damage to their health, from a product that clearly is not the answer.

At the meeting with the Minister on 28 June, she undertook to examine urgently a number of specific issues affecting human health with her opposite number at the Department of Health. I hope that this evening she will briefly—I understand the difficulties of time—refer to the outcome of those discussions.

One of the issues that we specifically asked the Ministers to address was the apparent correlation of high suicide rates in some parts of the country, which appeared to follow closely on some of the areas where dipping with organophosphates was most prevalent.

I have a letter here from one of the consultant psychiatrists who has particularly studied the problem, Dr. Davies, of the Avalon NHS trust based in Taunton. He not only draws attention to the weight of evidence, from his own experience and that of his colleagues, of a connection between sheep dip exposure and high suicide rates, but offers his services to try to improve the amount of information that could be available to the Department of Health on this specific issue.

In that letter, Dr. Davies says:

"I am sure that if dealing with a pharmaceutical agent, such a weight of evidence would result in its withdrawal from the market and I find it difficult to understand why the same criteria are not applied to environmental toxins. Every organophosphate exposed farmer that I have interviewed, whether as a NHS referral or part of my research activities, has admitted to intense episodes of suicidal ideation well beyond the 'life is not worth living' stage."

I hope that the Department of Health will take that evidence as seriously as I know the Minister does. I also hope that the offer to undertake additional research into the effects of organophosphates in terms of neuro-psychiatric toxicity will be taken up.

There are ways in which the Minister can respond proactively. For instance, we must return to some form of notifiable disease arrangement if the industry is to take sheep scab seriously. A return to the old compulsory dipping scheme will not be sufficient, however. I hope that a compulsory treatment scheme using the new products—the non-OP dips that are now available, and the injectables—will deal with the problem more effectively. Ironically, there is now a blowfly that is immune to OPs, while some humans at least seem to be sensitive to them.

We must recognise that manufacturers of new products will not be able to reduce the unit cost, allowing take-up to be effective in the industry, until some help is given with the transition. I hope that, now that it is recognised that the use of OP dips imposes considerable costs on the industry, the Ministry and, indeed, the health service, the Government will find a way of subsidising the transition to allow the withdrawal of those products and the introduction of new products that are safer for all concerned.

I am sorry to have had to cover so much territory at such speed, but this is an unusual opportunity. I am grateful to the House for listening so patiently, and I hope that in due course the Minister will respond to all four of the points that I have made.

8.52 pm

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): I wish to return to the general question of the Supply estimates, which relate largely—although not exclusively—to animal welfare and animal health issues. Let me again thank my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary for the diligence with which she has promoted animal welfare issues throughout the European Union, and welcome my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister to his new job.

On behalf of the all-party animal welfare group, which I chair, I applaud the sentiments that my right hon. and learned Friend expressed at the opening of the new offices of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons last week. I was delighted to learn that he intends to target the banning of veal crates as the Government's next objective. I hope that scientific evidence will enable real progress to be made by the end of the year.

We have dealt largely with matters relating to the single market and open frontiers. It has been said—correctly—that free trade in animals sometimes means free trade in diseases. In recent months, there have been outbreaks of equine viral arteritis. Earlier this week, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary laid an order relating to the control of EVA in the United Kingdom. I hope that, when she winds up the debate, she will be able to give us some idea of the measures that Ministers are taking to control the movement of shedding stallions, not just in the United Kingdom but throughout the European Union.

Contagious diseases have also been imported in culled sheep from Poland and Spain. In a number of instances, animal diseases that we had thought to be either under control or eradicated in this country have been imported. That demonstrates the need for rigid controls in the country of origin, and strict on-farm quarantine when animals arrive in the United Kingdom.

Outbreaks of that kind underline the importance of veterinary education and the maintaining of veterinary standards throughout the European Union. My hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin) mentioned that in connection with the Select Committee report. Is my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary able to make a further announcement about the availability of European Commission funds for veterinary education? We had the impression that the Commission would look favourably on that, but there seems to have been a hiatus. A settlement is overdue.

Clearly, in the minds of the media, this is "the rabies debate". I mentioned free trade in diseases. I have no wish to see rabies spread throughout the United Kingdom, but I believe that, if there is a free trade in diseases, there is also a free trade in hysteria and prejudice, particularly about rabies. I am persuaded by the scientific arguments—as, clearly, are many other hon. Members—that the time has come to make real progress.

I listened with interest to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare, and I studied his Committee's excellent report with great care. Like earlier speakers, I started from the premise that the controls that we have, we hold; they work, and we should not mend things that are not broken.

Let us examine a couple of the myths. My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Sir R. Moate) said that quarantine worked. Does it? That must be the first myth. We know that animals are smuggled into this country on ferries, possibly—now—through the channel tunnel, and on sailing yachts entering the many ports along the south and other coasts. I am told—much of the evidence is anecdotal—that it is relatively easy to obtain an anaesthetic for a dog in northern France. One can knock out the dog, chuck it into the boot and put a blanket over it and it wakes up after half an hour through the tunnel, 45 minutes on the hovercraft or one hour on the ferry, somewhere in the United Kingdom. The risk of detection is minimal. If one weighs that risk against a bill of £1,000 or £1,200 for six months' quarantine—we have heard various figures—and the real distress that one feels at having to quarantine one's animals, it must seem worth taking. Yes, the penalties for detection are severe, but the chances of detection are fairly remote.

The stories are anecdotal, so let me put my own anecdote on the record. As chairman of the all-party animal welfare group and a Kent Member of Parliament, I received a third-party approach from an American, apparently resident in Switzerland, who wanted to bring a dalmatian into the UK and, peculiarly, sought my advice as to how that could be done by bending the rules. I had to say that he had come to the wrong person, but the approach was made.

The second myth is the huge number of cases. It is a half-myth; it is a misrepresentation of fact. I took part in a radio discussion on Saturday morning with an "expert" on this subject who said that there were 15,000 cases of rabies worldwide every year, but I am told by my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham that, based on a House of Commons Library report, there are 30,000 or more such cases in India alone. I am not sure where these figures come from, but the implication is that they affect us throughout northern Europe and the UK. Perhaps someone in the House can tell me when the last case of human rabies was detected in northern Europe. I do not think that the British Medical Association referred to that in its report and I have no reference anywhere else.

What I do know, because the figures are given in the report produced by the Committee of my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare, is that 150,000 dogs and cats have been imported into the UK since 1972 and that, as was mentioned earlier, out of those 150,000 animals, two from third countries developed rabies; none from the European Union developed the disease. No one I know is suggesting that there should be any relaxation of the rules from third countries. We are considering the European Union specifically at present.

Sir Jerry Wiggin: Rabies-free countries.

Mr. Gale: I am coming to that.

I want to ask my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, not to give an answer tonight, because if I receive one tonight, it will be no, but to consider two proposals. First, will she consider that we should allow the importing of animals owned by members of the armed forces and by members of the diplomatic corps, and the importing of guide dogs owned by anyone, provided that they are vaccinated, have proper documentation, have had blood tests and are identifiable?

In the case of forces personnel coming from rabies-free countries such as Cyprus, I see no difficulty with that. It would be possible to vaccinate a dog or cat six months before return, because the date of return is always known, to have that animal examined by an officer of the Royal Army Veterinary Corps and certified as okay. At present, soldiers and airmen coming from Cyprus having done a two-year tour of duty have two choices: they either bring the family pet home and kennel it at a cost of some £1,200 for six months, or they use the services of the excellent British Army Rescue Centre to have the animal rehomed in Cyprus.

There is—I was going to say a trade, but it is not a commercial business—an enterprise that recycles family pets so that outgoing services families are able to take on, not unwanted, but unimportable animals left behind by their return home. That is daft, unnecessary and inhumane and there is no reason for maintaining it. If we cannot trust the members of our own diplomatic corps to have their animals vaccinated and properly documented, and allow them to move around the world without having to quarantine their animals every time they are brought home at the end of a tour of duty, we should be able to.

The hon. Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston) mentioned guide dogs. Clearly, certainly in the European Union, we should be able to make immediate provision for people travelling abroad or returning with guide dogs, provided that they are properly documented.

My second proposal to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary is this. In her letter to me of 30 June, in response to a constituent's inquiry, she said:

"It is possible to regulate commercial imports through a system of vaccination, blood testing, controlled transportation, advanced notification and checks at destination. It is difficult to see how checks of this kind could be applied to pet animals travelling with their owners. At the very least, to ensure the same degree of certainty about the health status and identity of the animal would require a considerable increase in administrative action and administrative costs."

I am dreadfully sorry, but I do not accept that. We usually agree, but on this issue my hon. Friend is right in the first half of the paragraph but absolutely wrong in the second.

I want to make a proposal. I want my hon. Friend to introduce a pilot scheme through the ports of Ramsgate in Thanet and Dover, two of the most widely used Kent channel ports. Initially, my proposal would not allow the importing of animals from the European Union, but would allow the reimporting of animals taken out from the United Kingdom by United Kingdom citizens going on holiday. That should be done provided that those animals have been vaccinated six months in advance of travel, have been blood tested after six months, have a canine or feline passport certified by the vet who carried out the test and that they are microchipped to what I hope will become the FECAVA—the Federation of European Companion Animals Veterinary Association—common European standard of identification.

Given all that information, I can see no reason why it should not be perfectly feasible to allow a family to take a dog or a cat on holiday. They would book on to a given ferry—which they do anyway—and have the animal placed in a holding kennel at the port upon entry.

My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham referred to black labradors. I happen to have a black labrador and I would love to take it on holiday with me. We do not want a long queue of cars at ports, so I would be happy to leave my animal in a holding kennel. I would be happy to allow that animal to be collected with others on the same day and taken to a quarantine kennel where it would be blood tested again and identified. I would then collect my animal from the quarantine kennel. There would be no massive bureaucracy at the port and no massive cost except to me, the owner. If I am prepared to pay the entire cost, I cannot see why it is not possible to do it.

There is an added advantage. We have had representations from members of the Quarantine Kennels Owners Association who have justifiably expressed concern about the future of their considerable investment in their facilities. I believe that, with the system that I have outlined, they would benefit from the trade in animals coming in from third countries where quarantine would continue and from the additional business generated by those who would use the kennels on their return from holiday.

I am fortunate in that I never leave my home unattended so my animals stay at home. Not everybody is that lucky. Some people have to put their cats or dogs into kennels or catteries for a fortnight when they go on holiday. I cannot believe that those people would prefer to put their animals in a kennel for a fortnight rather than for two or three days. Equally, I can see no reason why the quarantine kennel should not have the business that would be generated by such a scheme.

I can see no risk to animal health in the United Kingdom from that process. I believe that if we can establish that that works on a pilot basis, it should be possible to extend the process of vaccination, blood testing and microchip identification to the whole of Europe so as to allow European Union citizens to bring their animals into the United Kingdom on the same basis.

I believe that we have a choice, but to do nothing is not part of that choice. There will be more, not fewer, animals smuggled into the United Kingdom. As has been said already, the risk is not from the responsible, law-abiding animal owner but from the smuggler—the person who is most likely to bring in an animal that may not have been vaccinated. A responsible pet owner—from any country in Europe, including the United Kingdom—will want to look after his or her animal. The risk is from the smuggled animal.

We must forget the mythology about rabid foxes wandering through the channel tunnel. If we are to eradicate the risk caused by smuggled animals, we must remove the incentive to smuggle. Provided that it is cheaper—what I am proposing would be a great deal cheaper than the average £1,200 quarantine fees—and that it is relatively simple to go through the necessary processes, people will not take the risk of a fine or imprisonment for smuggling.

There is a way forward. If we are to prevent the growing illegal trade and accept that in a wider Europe people will want to travel with their companion animals, we must do something positive. I believe that what I have suggested, which is based on scientific evidence taken by the Select Committee—details of which are contained in the report—is a way forward.

The estimates make provision for the funding of European negotiation and for matters relating to the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986. My hon. Friend the Minister may feel that what I am about to say is a matter for either the Home Office or the Department of Trade and Industry, but she would not expect me to miss this opportunity to place on record, again, the case for funding the work of the European centre for the validation of alternative methods to the use of animals in experimentation. There is a great deal of work to do and every penny of the money in the estimates, and much more, will be needed to support that work.

9.11 pm

Mr. Colin Pickthall (Lancashire, West): I want to speak briefly in support of my colleagues the hon. Members for Weston-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin) and for Bristol, East (Ms Corston) in what they have said this evening. I also support much of what was said by the hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale), especially his comment that doing nothing is not a choice.

I confess that I entered into the investigation on health controls on the importation of live animals with a strong prejudice in favour of the retention of quarantine. It appeared to me that one of the great benefits of this country being an island was the possibility of keeping such diseases as rabies at bay. Quarantine had appeared to work for most of the century and I was predisposed to say, "If it ain't broke, don't fix it."

In addition, the advent of the channel tunnel had agitated many of the rural population in my constituency to the point where they had calculated that as a fox could travel at about 25 miles a day, rabid animals would be through the tunnel and biting people in west Lancashire in less than a fortnight.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): Faster than a train.

Mr. Pickthall: It is certainly faster than a train on the west coast main line.

Rabies is such a horrible disease that we must take such fears seriously. It was my belief that any relaxation of quarantine would seriously affect public confidence. That view was echoed by the then Minister when she gave evidence to the Committee. She said:

"Our scientific advice and our veterinary advice is that quarantine continues to be the most practical, most effective way of keeping rabies out."

I must add to my predisposition in favour of the retention of quarantine the fact that my withers are not at all wrung by the laments of pet owners at being separated from their dogs or cats. I am not a pet owner and I am not especially a pet lover. In the context of rabies, such emotion from pet owners is, to put it bluntly, irrelevant.

My change of mind during the course of the Committee's investigation was based strictly on the practical evidence that we heard and examined. First, as was mentioned by the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare, the cost of quarantine is somewhere in excess of £1,000—indeed, we heard estimates of up to £1,500. Therefore, on at least a financial level, quarantine is a relatively easy option for the well-heeled, but a considerable burden for people of average means, such as many of the service personnel who gave us written evidence.

Secondly, as has been said, the cost of quarantine provides a positive incentive for the smuggling of animals. On our visit to the Heathrow quarantine station, we were given evidence of animals that had been abandoned in panic on the airport tarmac; we were shown a bush-baby with its hind legs broken, which had been smuggled in in someone's top pocket.

I might say, by the way, that when we were being entertained by the entire security staff of that quarantine station—we were in the reptile section—we suddenly found in front of us a splendid looking snake wriggling about on the floor, much to the alarm of the hon. Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton). That incident was, I recall, rather spectacularly recorded by the BBC.

On the issue of smuggling, I have not had a chance to read the British Medical Association document that came out a few days ago but, thanks to my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East, I have had a chance to read the covering letter. In two consecutive sentences, the letter states:

"Anecdotal evidence suggests few obstacles face those attempting to avoid quarantine by smuggling animals, particularly by car, from France to Britain. The present quarantine system has had a 100 per cent. success rate since 1971."

What sort of success rate is that? Of course, for the animals that are trapped by quarantine, there is a 100 per cent. success rate, but what about the others to which hon. Members have referred?

Mr. Wykeham of the Quarantine Kennel Owners Association pointed out to us in his evidence:

"Instances have occurred when the carrying agent for the quarantine kennel has failed for one reason or another to make the rendezvous with the ferry and the car carrying the animal has driven off the vessel and out of the port without check or hindrance."

We are talking not only about smuggling but, in some cases, about incompetence and lack of security.

Those incidents alerted me and, I am sure, other Committee members to the vastness and intricacy of the British coastline and the increase in the use of boats for pleasure and business. Ironically, the one link that seems secure from rabies is the channel tunnel, which has, as we saw for ourselves, very comprehensive defences against rabies. Virtually everywhere else seems to be vulnerable.

We also heard of—I will not go into this because my colleagues have discussed it—the experience of other countries such Sweden and Denmark. We also dealt with—this seems to me important—the arrangements for trading dogs and cats under the Balai directive and the exemptions for farm animal imports. Both point to an absurd discrepancy which is, not surprisingly, leapt upon by pet owners abroad who see that commercial advantage can remove quarantine like magic in some cases but that they remain trapped by quarantine. That is an injustice and illogicality which the Committee's recommendations properly address.

The Committee's recommendations on rabies control—in the end, unanimously and without reluctance—is, in my view, a stricter control than that offered by quarantine. They make no change to the importation of animals from non-approved countries—that is, countries where rabies is widespread—but introduce vaccination, microchipping and blood-testing regimes, retain import licensing and introduce animal passports.

As our report said, if we have erred, it is very much on the side of caution. The fact that the Government do not approve those recommendations emanates from their understandable desire to address what they perceive as a strong emotional desire on the part of much of the population to retain quarantine—the sort of feeling that I had about the matter when we started the investigation—and also the public perception that quarantine is the only answer.

It must be the Government's task occasionally to challenge emotional perceptions, and this is one such case. If the Government retain the status quo, they must say precisely why our recommendations would not strengthen the UK's defences against rabies and correct an illogical injustice.

The Committee's report covered a wide range of concerns. I shall raise just one, which particularly interested me. We were made very much aware—it was the main purpose of the investigation—of the increased problems in farm animal health created by the single market, the relaxation of borders in the EU, and the increased speed of the transit of animals. Despite our reservations, and those of our witnesses, about some areas of the European Union, on the whole the EU seems to take the problem seriously. However, we continually returned to the vexed question of movements of animals across the borders between eastern Europe and the EU.

Mr. Anthony, the retiring president of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons, identified three major disease corridors: first, Russia-Poland-Germany; secondly, Turkey and Iran through Greece to Austria; and thirdly and potentially, north Africa to Spain and Italy. He specified that veterinary training and standards of certification were unsatisfactory in some areas and that of the EU

"the checks at the borders"

"are not as high as we would wish."

For example, he told us of the importation of loads of Polish sheep early in 1994, on which there were many documentary deficiencies. One load had animals that were unfit for human consumption and some dead on arrival. In Poland, those sheep are sold for £2 a head and the transporter gets £5 a head. They are sold in the UK for £27 a head—approximately £6,000 profit per lorry load. That is a considerable incentive for at least cutting corners in crossing the Polish-German border, an area that Mr. Anthony said was "very difficult to administer". Once such loads of animals are in the European Union, their movements are relatively unhindered.

Mr. Neal King, vice-president of the RCVS, told us:

"Over the years we have kept disease out by quality . . . we have done this by our own certification."

He said that we now depend on others and went on:

"We depend on their attitude to the animals coming in over their third country frontier rather than our attitude when they come in from the Channel to us".

Mr. Kershaw-Dalby, secretary to the National Cattle Breeders' Association, told us of animals going from Poland to France, where they tested positive for foot and mouth disease. He said:

"Some of those animals were never traced. The monitoring of ports is non-existent".

He said that some of the documentation was "obscure" and that, for example, the instruction that all cattle imported from Europe must be treated for warble fly appears "on page 37 in minute print".

The NCBA also gave evidence of eastern European cattle being "laundered" in Austria, which at that time was a useful staging post because of its favoured status.

We therefore have four problems to face up to. The first is the leaky nature of the border between the European Union and the east and the clear deficiencies of the border inspection posts. Clearly, that is a task for the European Commission to tackle, and part of that job must be some hard education work in the eastern European countries, which is all the more necessary because of the likely closer relationship with Poland, former Czechoslovakia and Hungary in the not too distant future. The second is the need for much tighter monitoring and inspection of animals coming from Europe to the UK. The third is the need for clearer and tougher guidelines for dealers, importers and farmers, and the fourth is a much tougher pan-European regime for veterinarians.

I welcome the Government's response on holding periods, but the enthusiasm with which they embrace the notion in paragraph 7 of Command 2735 that the primary responsibility for preventing the introduction of disease now rests with importers is bothering. That is the only weak part of the Committee's report. Of course, most importers and farmers take their responsibilities seriously. They do not want to damage their herds; they do not want to introduce disease. However, in the case of the diseases that we have discussed, it takes few people—perhaps only one renegade—to create a catastrophe. The importer's responsibilities must be backed by the Government sanctions, which the Committee recommends. It is ultimately a communal priority and a communal responsibility, not only a responsibility of the importers.

Although our report rejected the alarmist "disease time bomb" theory outlined for us by some witnesses, there can be little doubt that, as movement of animals from eastern Europe and possibly also from north Africa and the near east increases, there is a clear potential danger of disease spread, accelerated by ease of movement in the EU. The specific recommendations made by the Committee in paragraph 47 of its report are a serious attempt to minimise risk. Naturally, there are financial implications, but the potential cost of a breakdown of fail-safe mechanisms is astronomical.

In a sense, the problems of combating rabies importation and of combating the importation of farm animal diseases are similar. In each case, success depends on accurate information, especially identification, on rigorous monitoring, on punitive sanctions against transgressors, on cost-effectiveness so as not to push people into transgression and on partnership between Government and the importers and farmers to ensure that risks are minimised, in all our interests.

I find it hard to reconcile the Government's deep suspicion of the European Union's progress on rabies control with their sanguine opinion of the disease importation problems of farm animals and the exemptions under the Balai directive. I can only conclude that the Government are responding with emotion in the first case and with some practical logic in the second case.

In my opinion, as a member of the Select Committee, who is not easily convinced of anything, the Committee members tackled both those main issues with scrupulous practicality. I urge the Government to make it a priority to reconsider the recommendations on replacing quarantine as soon as, in their own terms, the Swedish and Danish experiences can be reliably examined—I would hope, in 12 months.

9.26 pm

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): I shall be brief, so that others might have an opportunity to speak.

Probably no aspect of man's contact with the animal world creates more fear and anxiety than possible contact with rabies. It is an understandable fear, which the House must recognise, and which was articulated earlier, yet the Select Committee is telling the House, "Perhaps time has moved on; perhaps we should consider the issue again".

The popular reaction in the country is, "We have not had rabies in Britain for many years; let's not take risks now," or, "The channel tunnel is creating greater opportunities for rabies to come in; let's not take risks now." That was the gist of some of the evidence that the Select Committee received, but it also received evidence, which was new to many of us, of the unintentional stress and distress caused to animals—as well as that experienced by the owner—as a result of quarantine.

The animal must, as we know, be kept in quarantine for six months, which is a significant part of its life. It does not know that it is there for the good of the public; all it knows is that its owner and its friend has put it away for six months. The Association of RAF Wives described quarantine as "an extremely cruel procedure", involving unnecessary expense, when there are obvious other ways in which to establish that there is no risk.

I shall not discuss cost in detail, but I shall emphasise the arguments that have been made about quarantine being expensive. It is expensive for the expatriate and for the diplomat and his family, and the cost increases the possibility of smuggling, which other colleagues have mentioned. The paradox is that, by imposing stringent controls and making the process expensive, the less responsible pet owner is tempted to smuggle and the decent, responsible pet owner has to pay the cost.

The British Medical Association has submitted a memorandum to many of us. We must recognise the concern of the people who would give medical care to anyone who was affected by rabies, which is an appalling prospect for the medical profession. In the memorandum, there is little scientific evidence to back up what the association says. In addition, the BMA, unlike the learned bodies that gave evidence to us, gives no evidence for the concern that it is now raising with hon. Members. It would have been helpful if the association had come to the Select Committee and told us its views.

We await the comments of the Parliamentary Secretary with interest. The Government's response to the Select Committee report was in three parts. The then Minister of Agriculture, my right hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South-West (Mrs. Shephard), said that the problem was "onerous for some people." That is precisely the point that the Committee made. The Committee would say that the problem is not merely onerous, but intolerable for thousands of decent British people who want to travel with their pets.

The Minister also accepted that microchips were reliable and that the blood test was effective one month after vaccination, yet the Ministry does not draw the obvious conclusion that a pet passport would be a safe method of taking a pet out of the United Kingdom into certain other countries and bringing it back. I suggest that Customs and Excise could easily control that method with the red channel at ports and airports—anywhere where there is a possibility of a pet coming in.

The report is far-sighted. The issue obviously raises emotions, but fortunately—and rarely in the House—it is a non-party political issue. The arguments have been set out and they have been adduced here tonight. It is up to the public and to their representatives to take the discussion further. I am sure that the House waits with great interest for the response from both the Government and the Opposition to what has been said today.

9.31 pm

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): This has been an interesting and lively debate; it has also been instructive. All the members of the Select Committee who have spoken, other than the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin)—I am privileged to be a member of the Select Committee—came to the inquiry utterly convinced that the quarantine regulations had to stay as they were. It was the conduct of the inquiry and the evidence we heard, especially the overwhelming scientific evidence, that convinced us that the rules had to be changed and that quarantine eventually had to come to an end in a limited way in the United Kingdom. In our report, we have described the way in which the rules can now be changed.

Although I listened with great care to what the hon. Member for Faversham (Sir R. Moate) said, I am pretty convinced, knowing his attitude to the Committee's work, that if he had been a member of our Committee at the time, he would have started from the same position as us, but would have been persuaded, as we were, by the evidence we heard. It was a tall task to expect us to change our minds, but we did and it is right that those of us who are members of the Select Committee place that fact on the record.

There were four reasons for my changing my mind. First, I was convinced, in view of developments since the Waterhouse report in 1970, of the effectiveness of vaccine, of the use of microchips and of developments in medicine and technology. Secondly, I was convinced because of the success of the oral vaccine programme in the European Community. We had a briefing that it was likely that rabies would be eradicated, to take the most optimistic approach, in two or three years. Even the pessimists said that it would be eradicated by the end of the century. We are making excellent progress, from 8,500 cases of animal rabies in 1989 to 1,200 in 1993.

Since 1994, we have allowed in commercially traded dogs and cats, subject to certain conditions. I agree entirely with my hon. Friend—if I can call her that—the Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston). The overwhelming evidence presented when the Committee visited Sweden and Denmark was the clincher for me. Those countries have traditions and problems that are similar to ours and Sweden has been rabies free since 1886. They examined all the evidence—including the fact that Sweden and Germany share a border—and they were utterly convinced that they should change the rules.

Finally, if we had thought for a moment that our recommendation would increase the risk of rabies, we would never have suggested it. The tests that we propose are as safe as the quarantine regulations, but they are far more efficient, less costly and much less distressing for the animals. We have put forward a proposal for the new century that is compatible with advances in medicine and in technology.

9.35 pm

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): On behalf of the Opposition, I welcome the fifth report of the Agriculture Select Committee. It is up to the Committee's usual high standard, and we congratulate the Chairman, the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin), and the other Committee members on the way in which they have presented the report. I am a former member of the Committee and I enjoyed serving on it. I am familiar with the detailed work involved in preparing a report.

Controls on the importation of live animals are a key issue in terms of animal welfare and the economic impact on the country. We must ensure that we maintain our very high standards and our disease-free status. With the advent of the single market, concerns were expressed about the relaxation of checks at points of entry, so it was important to examine the issues in some detail.

I believe that we should continue to examine those controls and, in some cases, to tighten them. The suggestion of using coloured ear tags to identify the country of origin of animal imports is a good idea that is worth further examination. The reintroduction of a holding period at points of distribution also has many advantages, not least in the context of the controversy surrounding live animal exports and imports. The holding period would provide an opportunity to examine the condition of the animals, to check for disease and ton ensure that they were being treated properly. In their response, the Government accepted the argument for a period of three working days and, while I welcome that concession, I prefer the Committee's original recommendation.

The Government have made it clear that importers must act responsibly. The campaign involving the distribution of "Don't Import Disease" leaflets has proved helpful. However, to be fair, some sectors of the industry—such as the pig sector—have introduced their own quality control measures and they deserve credit for that. The National Farmers Union also deserves commendation for its attempts to introduce a warranty and indemnity scheme.

However, guidance has not prevented outbreaks of disease such as warble fly in 1994. While I am aware that inspections have been increased at ports of entry, the Government must address a number of remaining problems. The first is accurate and consistent veterinary certification, as mentioned by the Committee. The second is a common standard of veterinary competence. That problem was recognised in the Bendixen-Dexter report, which I agree should be made public.

Thirdly, there is the problem of the absence of the system for information inspections at frontiers—SHIFT—computer system, which monitors animal movement. Even when computer systems are in place and working properly, there may be an accuracy problem. The Minister might recall the problem with the ANIMO system, which I identified in written questions that I tabled to him. I drew the Minister's attention to fraudulent certification—which is outside his control—and the fact that mistakes were being made when details were being entered into the database.

Fourthly, we must have adequate inspection procedures at points of entry. I do not believe that the single market precludes that and I note that the French are considering reintroducing spot checks at their borders. The state veterinary service has a major role to play in that process. I believe that the Government risk undermining the high standards of animal health in this Britain by cutting the state veterinary service. There has already been a staff cut of 31 per cent.—their number has decreased from 580 in 1979 to 403 in 1994. In 1979, there were 25 veterinary inspection centres; now, there are only 13.

There is concern that, after seven years, there are still quite a large number of outbreaks of BSE, but we welcome the overall sharp reduction in the number of cases. As has been said, sheep scab raises all-party concern. I note that, after many representations, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has admitted that there has been an increase in sheep scab outbreaks since compulsory dipping ended in 1992. On MAFF's own figures in its recent report, private vets have reported an increase from 254 outbreaks in 1994 to 595 so far this year—more than double, only half-way through the year.

I also refer the Government to the recent report by the Farm Animal Welfare Council on the welfare of sheep. It calls firmly for sheep scab to be reinstated as a notifiable disease. The Government's response to that report was inadequate. The FAWC also recognises concern about the use of organophosphate sheep dips and the need for tight control as well as the development of alternatives. In effect, the Government said that the sheep industry should play a role in financing the development of alternatives. That is just not a realistic response because sheep farmers are among the poorest in the agriculture sector. They often have small farms, run by small self-employed families who are tough and self-reliant but not really in a position to provide a major contribution to such research.

I recently met a Mrs. Brenda Sutcliffe of Sheepbank farm, Littleborough and Saddleworth, with whom I had the privilege of discussing sheep dips and the problems of organophosphate dips. Incidentally, she probably knows more about the chemical composition and effects of OP sheep dips than anyone I have met. The Government owe people like Mrs. Sutcliffe and her family an open and detailed examination of claims about OP dips, and they should give some thought to how to help such people, who might not be able to work for their full working life if the claims about the detrimental effect prove to be correct.

I have a particular interest in bovine tuberculosis and badger control. It is a major area which deserves a debate on its own. I know that it has been proposed to refer the issue to the Select Committee, which would be a welcome step forward. At this stage, the Opposition remain unconvinced that the badger culling policy is either acceptable or, indeed, effective. I know and sympathise with farmers who are facing the problem and the financial impact of the outbreak of bovine TB. Nevertheless, there are a great many anomalies in the approach to the problem. The science is really shaky, because it has not been scientifically proved that badgers cannot be infected by cattle. That needs to be considered very carefully and, at the moment, too many people have set their faces against examining it.

As the Chairman of the Select Committee said, there would be an opportunity to look into that matter if the dairy industry were considered. I know that, given the hon. Gentleman's affection for badgers, he will look into the matter very sympathetically.

The part of the Select Committee report that deals with rabies has obviously attracted a great deal of attention. That is understandable, because rabies is a very emotional issue. It is a terrible disease, people are very concerned about it, and we have to ensure that we maintain our rabies-free status. On behalf of the Opposition, I have to say that the Select Committee's representations on the issue were well researched and well argued. It put forward a very convincing case, but we do not differ from the Government in that we want to ensure that the controls on rabies are effective. Before we move away from them, we must be convinced that any changes are workable.

Having said that, I believe that the Government's response has been somewhat negative. I have been impressed by representations made by people who have pets abroad and by those who believe that there are alternatives. The Government could be more open-minded, bearing in mind the changes in the directive. I wrote to the Minister suggesting that she consider a trial scheme in Cyprus, which is a rabies-free island, on the lines suggested by the hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale). The system could be put in place and its effectiveness, or otherwise, examined. There would be no risk, because the animals would be travelling to and from rabies-free islands. The Minister gave me a courteous written reply, but her point that other countries have a stronger claim was not convincing. Perhaps she will give that suggestion further thought.

We must not compromise Britain's rabies-free status, but there should be wide consultation, careful consideration and proper research into rabies and animal health control in general.

9.45 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Angela Browning): I have a sense of déjà vu, because one forfeit of becoming a junior Agriculture Minister was losing my place on the Select Committee so ably chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin). I am grateful to the Select Committee for prompting this debate, and I will attempt to reply to many of the questions that have been put, particularly by Select Committee members.

Last year's report was an invaluable investigation into the problems associated with the import of live animals. The members of the Committee must be congratulated on their clear and detailed analysis of the risks that our current arrangements present to our high animal health status. I pay tribute to the veterinary and medical professions for their contribution to the debate. It is clear that the two professions share the Government's cautious attitude to this important issue.

The Government welcome the Committee's endorsement of the health controls that have been put in place following completion of the single market in 1993. That vindicates the Government's approach in dealing with the threat of imported animal disease, although we are by no means complacent. We welcome the Committee's conclusion that the risk of disease entering the United Kingdom through imported livestock has not increased to any appreciable extent.

We are pleased at the support given by the Committee to the introduction in 1993 of strengthened measures designed to maintain the United Kingdom's high animal health status. We agree with the Committee that primary responsibility for protecting the United Kingdom's high animal health status under the new single market arrangements rests with the importers of animals.

In November 1993, my right hon. Friend the then Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, now Secretary of State for Education and Employment, announced newly strengthened measures to maintain Britain's high animal health status. Those measures, which remain in force, include 24-hour periods of blanket surveillance at all south and east coast ports, and targeting consignments where there is a particular animal health disease risk—with up to 100 per cent. checks and increased checks at points of destination so that, on average, between 50 and 60 per cent. of consignments are checked.

Where there is specific cause for concern, additional steps have been taken. They include 100 per cent. checks for warble fly on all cattle imported from France, serological testing of all cattle imported from eastern Europe for FMD antibodies, and increased checks at the point of destination of cattle from France and the Netherlands for brucellosis. All those measures have played, and continue to play, a vital part in preventing the importation of disease.

My hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare and the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) mentioned the Bendixen-Dexter report. We agree that it should be made available in full to all member states by the Commission. We shall continue to press for that, together with an indication of the action taken where inadequacies have been found. We consider that to be most important.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) for his kind comments. We agree on most things, but we may not agree on everything tonight. My hon. Friend mentioned the new rules for protection against equine viral arteritis. Anyone interested in equine health will welcome that measure. When I have met interested parties in the past, I have had to say, "That measure is coming shortly." I am pleased that it is now in place. In addition, stallions imported from third countries to the Community must have originated from a country that has been free of EVA for at least six months, or the stallion's blood or semen must have been tested, with negative results for EVA, before export. That, I think, will be welcomed.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) mentioned several issues, one or two of which were picked up by others. He talked about BSE. When we receive scientific information, we put it in the public domain as quickly as is practically possible. The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the attitude of the Germans, who at times have been less than fair in the way in which they have assessed the stringent measures on BSE that we have taken.

We have made changes recently because, as new evidence has come to light, we have felt it important to act. We have changed the rules in feed mills, where we thought that there could have been cross-contamination for quite some time after the ban. Feed was being processed for the pig and poultry industries on the same lines, and that may have created some cross-contamination. We have tried to put that right, and the industry has responded well.

As for the case of the post-92 birth, the Germans and our partners in the Commission have renegotiated the two-and-a-half-year rule. I do not think that that will press the industry hard or cause it problems. It was important to act as the evidence emerged.

The hon. Member for North Cornwall also discussed maternal transmission. All the evidence shows that, if BSE had been caused by maternal transmission, it would not have resulted in the numbers affected. Those numbers are now falling, but we have never ruled out the vertical—

Mr. Morley: Ah.

Mrs. Browning: That is precisely the sort of irresponsible remark that brings the red meat trade of this country into disrepute. We have never ruled out categorically either vertical or horizontal transmission. That is why we have some pretty strong regulations. I know that the farming community finds them inconvenient, but we felt it necessary to ensure people's continued confidence in our red meat industry.

The hon. Members for North Cornwall and for Glanford and Scunthorpe also mentioned bovine TB. They know that I am concerned about that, and the hon.

Member for North Cornwall asked the Select Committee to look into it. I can assure him that the Government would welcome giving evidence to the Committee if it proceeds to do so.

As the hon. Gentleman will know, we are also examining OP dips, a subject that I take seriously. We are giving sheep scab and the problems of OP dips our fullest attention. I shall continue to work with the hon. Gentleman and with his committee to share any information that is available. I hope that he appreciates that.

Rabies took up the major part of tonight's debate. The hon. Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston) said that the last death from rabies in Europe occurred in France in 1928. In fact, the last recorded death was in 1990, in Leipzig, which at the time was in East Germany but which is now in the Community. In Europe, there have been 198 cases of human rabies since 1977.

My hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare talked of the advantages for tourism and said that in France the subject is rarely spoken of. Furthermore, the hon. Member for Bristol, East said that this country is a laughing stock in Europe. I must tell them both that 10,000 people a year in France get rabies treatment as a precaution after bites and scratches. So this is not a trivial matter, and it is discussed in France. Those 10,000 people are concerned about their personal health. That helps to put the issue in perspective—[Interruption.] The hon. Lady should listen to the facts, instead of calling this country a laughing stock. We are not a laughing stock. We have taken careful and proper action to protect the health of our animals and the health of the human beings in this country.

Quarantine for rabies is, as tonight's debate has shown, a sensitive issue. It is also technical and scientific. I know that there are arguments from both sides of the House, and we heard many of them tonight, but we believe that one must recognise that rabies remains a serious health risk in many parts of the world, including mainland Europe, where, for example, there have been four deaths—in Hungary—in recent years. It is not just a matter for the Indian subcontinent, as it affects all of us on mainland Europe. Although both wild and pet animals can be vaccinated against the disease, and humans can be treated if the disease is caught in the early stages, it is an extremely unpleasant disease and once the symptoms emerge in man, the disease is invariably fatal.

When rabies was eradicated from the United Kingdom in the early part of the century, we believed that the consequences of the disease re-entering the United Kingdom would be severe and that there would be considerable public concern about it. An outbreak would lead to the destruction of wildlife over a wide area, and onerous controls would be put on pet owners until the disease was wiped out. We would have the same situation as that in France: anyone who was scratched or bitten would immediately feel the necessity to go and seek medical help. Whether or not a diseased animal was involved, the fear would be there in the population.

The Government therefore endorse the view expressed by the Select Committee in its report that it would never support a change in our rules that increased the likelihood of rabies entering the United Kingdom. We consider that that central principle must be borne in mind when considering any change. We believe that the quarantine rules have been effective since 1922.

It has been suggested that quarantine encourages smuggling and that an alternative system would reduce the risk of smuggling. Animals under three months cannot be vaccinated. They would then have a six-month period before they were free to travel, so we are looking at all animals under the age of nine months not being able to travel. It is often those sweet little kittens under nine months that people smuggle back into this country in their pockets. I am not convinced that the argument made tonight would in any way contribute to solving the problem of animals, particularly kittens, being smuggled into this country.

Sir Roger Moate: Can my hon. Friend therefore put at rest my fears about a story that was reported in the Sunday Express a few weeks ago, in which it was said that she was going to have a trial period for relaxing quarantine regulations between here and Cyprus and Malta?

Mrs. Browning: Indeed. I can confirm that to my hon. Friend. I wrote to the editor of the Sunday Express. He has not yet published my letter, in which I explain that that was not true. I hope that he will find the space to do so and put it on the record this Sunday.

This has been a detailed and, sometimes, quite emotional debate. It does bring out emotions, because people feel very strongly about their pets. Although hon. Members who take the opposite view from that of the Government may find it hard to believe, I am a cat owner and I would find separation very difficult. When it is safe to make changes, the Government will do so, guided by the principle that I mentioned at the outset. We will not support changes that increase the likelihood of rabies entering the United Kingdom.

Mr. Tyler: I very much appreciate the positive response from the Minister to the points that I raised this evening.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Sir Jerry Wiggin: I thank my hon. Friend for her reply. I am satisfied that we have won the argument this evening. I hope that the Government will allow common sense to overcome emotion, and that they will keep the matter constantly under review, observe our European partners, who have made these substantial changes, and after a short time, look at the whole matter again to relieve suffering, cost and danger to our community.

Question deferred, pursuant to paragraph (4) of Standing Order No. 52 (Consideration of estimates).

It being Ten o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded to put forthwith the deferred Questions which he was directed by paragraph (5) of Standing Order No. 52 (Consideration of estimates), to put at that hour.

ESTIMATES, 1995-96

Class XIII, Vote 1

Question,

That a further sum, not exceeding £18,829,738,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges that will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1996 for expenditure by the Department of Social Security on non-contributory retirement pensions, Christmas bonus payments to pensioners, pensions etc., for disablement or death arising out of war or service in the armed forces after 2nd September 1939 and on sundry other services, on attendance allowances, invalid care allowance, severe disablement allowance, disability living allowance; disability working allowance; on pensions, gratuities and sundry allowances for disablement and specified deaths arising from industrial causes; on income support, payments of spousal and child maintenance, child benefit, one parent benefit, family credit, and on the vaccine damage payment scheme.

put and agreed to.

Class XIII, Vote 2

Question,

That a further sum, not exceeding £6,104,207,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges that will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1996 for expenditure by the Department of Social Security on rent rebate, rent allowance, council tax benefit, community charge benefit, community charge rebate and rate rebate subsidies and on sums payable in respect of anti-fraud measures to housing, charging, levying and local authorities; on transitional payments to help certain housing benefit claimants significantly affected by the changes to the housing benefit scheme and certain supplementary benefit claimants not entitled to benefit under the income support scheme; on sums payable into the National Insurance Fund to increase its income and as compensation payments in respect of statutory sick pay and statutory maternity pay and on sums payable into the Social Fund for expenditure on maternity expenses, funeral expenses and heating expenses in exceptionally cold weather.

put and agreed to.

Class XIII, Vote 3

Question,

That a further sum, not exceeding £211,869,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges that will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1996 for expenditure by the Department of Social Security on sums payable as grants to Independent Living; on subsidies to housing and local authorities towards the cost of administering the housing benefit scheme and to charging and levying authorities towards the cost of administering the council tax benefit scheme, as grants to Motability towards their administrative costs and to enable them to assist invalid vehicle users and others to have adapted and/or to purchase or lease cars from them, as grants to the British Limbless Ex-Servicemen's Association to enable them to assist certain other disabled vehicle users to have cars adapted, and on sums payable to the Social Fund to finance budgeting loans, crisis loans and community care grants.

put and agreed to.

Class XIII, Vote 4

Question,

That a further sum, not exceeding £1,450,436,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges that will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1996 for expenditure by the Department of Social Security on administration, for agency payments, the promotion of Government policy on disability issues, and for certain other services including grants to local authorities and voluntary organisations.

put and agreed to.

Class III, Vote 3

Question,

That a further sum, not exceeding £263,921,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges that will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1996 for cash limited and demand led operational expenditure by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to: promote food safety, take action against diseases with implications for human health, safeguard essential supplies in an emergency, and promote action to alleviate flooding and coastal erosion; to encourage action to reduce water and other pollution and by other measures to safeguard the aquatic environment including its fauna and flora, to improve the attractiveness and bio-diversity of the rural environment and protect the rural economy; implement MAFF's CAP obligations efficiently and seek a more economically rational CAP while avoiding discrimination against UK businesses (including expenditure on existing CAP measures and schemes), to create the conditions in which efficient and sustainable agriculture, fishing and food industries can flourish, take action against animal and plant diseases and pests, encourage high animal welfare standards; provide specialist support services and allocate resources where they are most needed; provide for some inter-agency payments and undertake research and development.

put and agreed to.

Class III, Vote 4

Question,

That a further sum, not exceeding £181,719,000, be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges that will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1996 for expenditure by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on departmental research, advisory services and administration, executive agencies and certain other services.

put and agreed to.

It being after Ten o'clock, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER proceeded to put forthwith the Question which he was directed by paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 53 (Questions on voting of estimates, &c.), to put at that hour.

ESTIMATES AND SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1995-96

Resolved,

That a further sum, not exceeding £85,741,525,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to complete or defray the charges for Defence and Civil Services for the year ending on 31st March 1996, as set out in House of Commons Papers Nos. 271, 272, 273 and 465.

Ordered,

That a Bill be brought in on the foregoing resolutions: And that the Chairman of the Ways and Means, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Waldegrave, Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory, Mrs. Angela Knight and Mr. Michael Jack do prepare and bring it in.

CONSOLIDATED FUND BILL

Mr. Michael Jack accordingly presented a Bill to apply a sum out of the Consolidated Fund to the service of the year ending on 31st March 1996; to appropriate the supplies granted in this Session of Parliament; and to repeal certain Consolidated Fund and Appropriation Acts: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed [Bill 137.]

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.),

CONTRACTING OUT

That the draft Contracting Out (Highway Functions) Order 1995, which was laid before this House on 27th June, be approved.—[Mr. Bates.]

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 102(9) (European Standing Committees),

PRELIMINARY DRAFT BUDGET FOR 1996

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. COM (95) 300, the Preliminary Draft Budget of the European Communities for 1996; and supports the Government's efforts to maintain budget discipline in the European Community.—[Mr. Bates.]

Question agreed to.

Public Health

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): With permission, I shall put together the two motions on public health.

Resolved,

That the Food Protection (Emergency Prohibitions) (Paralytic Shellfish Poisoning) (No. 5) Order 1995 (S.I., 1995, No. 1714), dated 4th July 1995, a copy of which was laid before this House on 6th July, be approved.

That the Food Protection (Emergency Prohibitions) (Paralytic Shellfish Poisoning) (No. 6) Order 1995 (S.I., 1995, No. 1737), dated 6th July 1995, a copy of which was laid before this House on 10th July, be approved.—[Mr. Raymond S. Robertson.]

Probation Service

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Bates.]

10.1 pm

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): In initiating this debate on the probation service, I refer first to what the Home Secretary said in March this year when he introduced the current consultative paper, "Strengthening Punishment in the Community". He said:

"The probation service can be rightly proud of its work and I appreciate the dedication and commitment shown by probation staff and members of committees in their work."

I was quoted in the 1993-94 Hereford and Worcester probation service annual report when I spoke approvingly of much of the work that it does and, in particular, of the community projects and their effect on reducing reconviction.

There is no doubt that the work of the probation service has increased dramatically. Last year, there were 233,000 pre-sentence reports, 2,000 of which were in Hereford and Worcester, which is itself a 12 per cent. increase on the previous year; 151,000 people were under probation service supervision, and there were 32,800 community sentences.

The probation service was involved in a huge area of work, some of it to do with the criminal justice system—liaison with the courts, prisoners and hostels and pre-sentence reports—and some outside the criminal justice system such as child welfare, family work and crime prevention in a more general context.

That increase in work occurred despite the fact that it in the current year its total budget has fallen from £395 million to about £392 million, which has been translated into a 6 per cent. reduction in Hereford and Worcester.

In 1993, the Minister of State, Home Office said:

"If the probation service did not exist we would have to invent it".

The service does valuable work, and what I am about to say is in no way a criticism of the dedication that many probation officers bring to their task. "Strengthening Punishment in the Community" reminded us:

"The present arrangements suffer from the drawback that probation and supervision orders do not appear to the public to offer sufficient punishment."

Commenting on the consultation document, The Times said that the Home Secretary had "taken measures to rid the public of the idea that community sentences are a soft option."

Unfortunately, many members of the public feel that probation and community service orders, and other community sentences, are not as rigorous as they should be, and that the probation service looks too much to its rehabilitative role and too little to its role in preventing further crime and protecting the public from crime by ensuring that sentences are not only rehabilitative but a deterrent to further offending.

There may be some justification for that view. Only 26 per cent. of indictable offences that come before the courts result in community sentences, and only 11 per cent. result in imprisonment. That means that some two thirds of offenders are either fined or given a non-custodial sentence of some other kind. The public do not consider that a sufficient deterrent. There has also been a huge increase in cautioning. Some of that may involve first offences, but much does not. One can understand the feelings of many members of the public, including my constituents, who want elements of punishment to be returned to non-custodial sentences and community service orders.

Recently, there have been several cases of young people aged 14 or 15—sometimes they are as young as 11 or 12—acting in a grossly irresponsible and, indeed, criminal way in the leisure centre in my constituency. That has caused outrage in the community, but local magistrates seem powerless to effect a remedy.

Part of the problem appears to be the ethos of the probation service. It is very social-work oriented, as most of its members have a social-work qualification. The Hereford and Worcester 1994-97 plan for the probation service identified crime as a community problem, saying that one of the service's roles was to ensure that the community could respond to and reduce its offending. Although a third of the male population aged 30 may have some form of criminal record, the fact is that the vast majority of the community does not, and does not need to reduce its offending. My local police force tells me that, if just 20 offenders could be dealt with locally, crime could be reduced by some 50 per cent.

Too often, the probation service sees the offender, rather than the victim, as the actual victim. Although there is a correlation between dropping out of school, unemployment and family instability and crime, I do not think that the problem is as "reactive" as the probation service wishes to make out. According to the service,

"Personal and social problems might put them"—

young people—

"at risk of further offending", as though offending were something that happened to people rather than their taking a specific decision.

In Hereford and Worcester's "Link" magazine, the assistant chief probation officer recently quoted approvingly some Liverpool university studies showing a correlation between unemployment and crime. We are all aware of that, of course. He said that this was bad news for the

"let's get tough and punish lobby".

In other words, the probation service believes that the idea of punishment is something for the far right of the political spectrum rather than, as is the case, a reflection of the views of the vast majority of the population.

That is especially so as the Association of Chief Officers of Probation has quoted recent Home Office studies that show that, despite what the probation service might like to argue, the two-year reconviction rate of the probation community service is not much different from that of prison. I think that the relevant reconviction statistics are 53 per cent. for prisons, 49 per cent. for community service and 45 per cent. for probation, so the idea that probation is a major panacea against further convictions is erroneous.

In certain cases, the probation service seems totally unwilling to recommend custodial sentences as appropriate, despite the wishes of the population. The Hereford and Worcester annual report of 1993-94 showed that pre-sentence reports recommended a custodial sentence in only 11 cases in the whole year, despite the fact that 484 sentences were passed.

If we are to improve public confidence in the probation service, we need to change the culture. That is why I am especially pleased at the first of the Government's three major reforms, which will do away with the probation service's exclusive entry qualification: the certificate in social work. It is vital that we increase the number of people who come into the probation service by bringing in people from other sectors than social work.

As the Home Secretary has reminded us, the work of social workers and of probation officers is significantly different. People who have never been involved in social work have an important contribution to make to social work. If we can ease their passage into the probation service through additional qualifications, which must be nationally validated—they cannot be left entirely to local validation—we will be effecting a major and important reform.

Equally, I agree that there should be a more flexible continuum between community service orders and probation orders. Community service orders are oriented more towards punishment; probation orders are oriented more towards the prevention of further offending. Any effective order should contain significant proportions of both. Community service orders and probation orders should be available to the courts for all offences and not for ones that are merely imprisonable.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): I appreciate that my hon. Friend has only just begun to expand his argument, but it seems that he is arguing very well for the total abolition of the probation service. Is he not saying that the service is no more effective—in fact, probably less so—than prison and other sanctions in stopping people committing other crimes, and that it is not a deterrent?

Mr. Coombs: There are other reasons for doing non-custodial work apart from those involving deterrence. The probation service has an important role to play, but the element of punishment and deterrence in its work has been undervalued and, as a result, the Government's reforms, in particular those in relation to the greater control by magistrates of the details of community sentences, are extremely important.

I shall give an example of what can go wrong. I recently took up the case of some constituents who were worried about a hostel and the activities of its residents. It is not directly supervised by the probation service, but there is a liaison officer. I was told by the probation service's chief officer that she understood that, in the past two years, hostel residents had committed no offences. I checked with the police and found that its residents had committed 343 offences in 1993 and 390 offences in 1994—26 per cent. and 27 per cent. of the crime in the town in which the hostel is situated. Is that an example of protecting the community via community service in hostels?

I should like to emphasise one or two other areas in which the work of the probation service could be significantly improved. I have already mentioned the very young criminal. I should like to see the minimum age for community service orders reduced from 16. At present, for a 15-year-old offender in my area, magistrates can impose a fine, which may not be paid because parental fines are difficult to enforce under the present legislation, or he could be locked up in a youth offenders' institution but, understandably, magistrates are reluctant to do that.

We no longer have an attendance centre in Hereford and Worcester, so that is not an option and supervision is too often not effective to the extent that the Home Office has recently had to lay down standards saying that the impression should not be given of providing reward for offending. It is my view that community service orders, which can be made rigorous, should be extended to 14 and 15-year-olds under any new legislation.

I believe that, short of youth custody, attendance centres and boot camps should be established on the lines of those set up by the airborne initiative in Scotland and down on the south coast—and, hopefully, soon in the midlands. About two thirds of those who successfully get through those camps do not reoffend. I believe that probation supervision grants, which are currently not available to fund the capital costs of such schemes, should be made available so that more of them can be set up. I believe that better co-ordination is necessary between the probation service and local employers and training and enterprise councils. Someone who is offered a job after having been on a community service order is less likely to reoffend. That is beyond peradventure. Very good work is going on in the Hereford and Worcester area through the Doors project.

The criminal justice system for juveniles is too slow. It can take anything from six to nine months between an offence being detected and arrest being made and a punishment being imposed by the courts. A pre-trial meeting is necessary with social services, which means a delay of two or three months, then the trial itself, pre-trial sentence reports cause further delays and then sentencing. Because there is no immediacy, it is difficult to identify the offence with the punishment in the minds of the young offenders. That is a view held by the clerks to the magistrates in my local area, and I am sure that the Government will wish to investigate it.

Currently in Hereford and Worcester, nine of the 15 members of the probation committee are magistrates. Magistrates do have an important role to play, but it is not an exclusive role. I believe that the scope of probation committees should be extended to include laymen who are looking for a more deterrent and retribution-oriented community service provision.

It is crucial that we change the way in which sentences, whether custodial or non-custodial, are organised for young offenders in particular. Too often, the sentence increases in severity with the criminal record of the individual involved. I understand that it is important that individuals are not unduly involved in the criminal justice system at too early an age. However, in certain circumstances, it is important to frighten young people away from a life of crime, especially if it looks as if they are just about to begin one.

I am not convinced—and certainly many people involved in the magistracy in the Hereford and Worcester area are not convinced—that there are sufficiently severe and deterrent penalties available for young people at the beginning of their criminal careers to deter them and their friends from further criminal activity. A magistrate's clerk recently explained to me that, sadly, under the present structure there is no question of frightening the life out of a 17-year-old, thereby preventing further criminal behaviour, if he has gone a long way down the tracks towards a criminal career.

What is beyond peradventure is that, if the criminal justice system is to work effectively, either through custodial sentences or through non-custodial community sentences, it must concentrate not only on rehabilitation, the needs of the offender, his place in society and appropriate programmes to prevent reoffending but on the certainty and rigour of punishment—deterrence as well as rehabilitation—because only then will the confidence of the community as a whole in the criminal justice system—and, by implication, in the work of the probation service—be maintained.

The Home Secretary has spoken about the current consultation document and strengthening punishment in the community. If he wants, as he has said, to rise to the needs of the 21st century in significantly reducing crime and the causes of crime, the sort of change in culture and in operational procedures that I have mentioned will be crucial to improving and maintaining public confidence in the criminal justice system.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Nicholas Baker): The title of this debate is the probation service, but the issues raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs) go much wider than that. There is rightly a great deal of concern about the high levels of crime committed by a small number of young people. We are determined to tackle the problem of persistent offending by juveniles, and I am grateful for this opportunity to explain some of the action that the Government are taking to combat it.

I know that my hon. Friend will be meeting my colleague the Minister of State shortly to take these discussions further. In the time remaining to me tonight, I shall try to cover the points raised by my hon. Friend, but if I do not cover them all I am sure that his discussions with the Minister of State will provide an opportunity to continue the debate. I think that my hon. Friend will be pleased to learn that what he says and what the Government are doing have a great deal in common.

The supervision of juvenile offenders in the community, as my hon. Friend is undoubtedly aware, is for the most part the responsibility of social services departments. He also raised a number of issues relating to the probation service and I am grateful to him for that. There are too few opportunities to debate the work of the probation services and the contribution they make to the prevention of further crime and to the protection of the public. I therefore welcome this valuable opportunity to explain the action that we are taking to toughen up community penalties, to which my hon. Friend referred, and to strengthen the performance of the probation service.

I understand that my hon. Friend visited Hereford and Worcester probation service's community services schemes last summer and was impressed. I am delighted to hear that, but I am not surprised. Probation services have moved a very long way from their original welfare-oriented approach, especially in recent years. The Criminal Justice Act 1991 turned the probation order into a sentence of the court, and it now takes its place as part of one of a range of community penalties available to the courts.

The Government have taken a number of measures to ensure that probation services deliver a high standard of service to the courts and that they deliver tough and demanding punishments and protect the public from the risk of further crime. The prevention of reoffending is an important part of that work, but I think that my hon. Friend underestimates the extent to which the ethos of the probation service has moved away from rehabilitation. The 1995 national standards, to which I shall refer in a moment, ensure that that objective is properly placed against the need for supervision and enforcement of community sentences.

I shall say a word about the problem of persistent offending juveniles, to which my hon. Friend referred. The vast majority of young people are perfectly law-abiding, but that makes the behaviour of a small number even more inexcusable since it tarnishes the image of young people, most of whom lead responsible lives and contribute a great deal to their communities. However, persistent offending is a significant problem.

A high percentage of crime in any particular area is most often found to be committed by a small number of offenders, sometimes very young offenders. My hon. Friend referred to that. For example, one study of persistent offending found that, by age of 17, 1 per cent. of all boys born in 1973 were responsible for 60 per cent. of convictions in their age group. We are determined to tackle this problem of persistent offending. To do so, it is essential that the courts have available to them effective and appropriate powers.

My hon. Friend referred to the remedy of secure training centres. I would like to say a word about that because, where the crimes are serious enough, it is right that the courts should have a range of tough measures to deal with them, from custody to community sentences. In particular, when young offenders go on and on committing crime, rejecting the chances offered them by courts to change their ways through supervision in the community and continuing to cock a snook at the public, the law and society, then the courts should have tough sanctions against them. There, my hon. Friend's point about early penalties being more effective may well be relevant to what we have in mind.

The Government introduced in the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 a new sentence—the secure training order—to strengthen the courts' powers in respect of 12 to 14-year-olds who persistently offend and who fail to respond to a community sentence. It will provide the courts with a much-needed sentence for this group of offenders combining a period of high-quality training in detention with a close supervision after that in the community. The order can be for as long as two years.

We are now pressing ahead with the building of five new secure training centres. Invitations to tender for the provision of secure training centres at Gringley, Nottinghamshire and Cookham Wood, Kent are currently been assessed. Invitations to tender for building and running the other three centres will be issued as soon as the necessary planning consents have been granted.

The courts also need a range of tough community sentencing options for those offenders who commit crimes which are not sufficiently serious to warrant custody but which ensure that offenders pay for their actions. Community sentences have a crucial part to play in punishing offenders in appropriate cases and in ensuring that offenders put back something into the community. The Government are determined that community sentences should be rigorous and that probation services take quick action, if offenders continue to misbehave, to return them to court.

I said that I would say something about national standards, because that is why, in March, my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary published new national standards for the supervision of offenders in the community. They apply equally to probation services and social services departments. The new 1995 national standards are designed to deliver greater protection of the public from further crime and more vigorous enforcement of community sentences by probation and social services departments. These new standards ensure that offenders serving community sentences face demanding programmes of supervision or work or both, in which the courts and the public can be confident that supervision will be physically or mentally demanding and that no community sentences can be properly or validly described as a soft option—as some do describe them, as my hon. Friend remarked.

The public want to see offenders make reparation to the community, and they want to feel safe. The new standards emphasise the development of programmes of supervision, which have those objectives as their primary aim. That means that the loophole in the old standards, which resulted in a number of offenders going abroad, looking like a reward for their offending, has been closed. Every activity must now be assessed to ensure that it cannot be seen as a reward for offending.

I have run out of time and must conclude by urging my hon. Friend to continue his discussions with the Minister of State. As I said at the beginning, I am grateful to him for raising this issue so that I could remind the House of some of the Government's recent initiatives to combat serious and persisting juvenile crime and strengthen community sentences. I have listened to my hon. Friend's concerns with great interest, and I hope that he will continue his interest in this important subject, to which he has made an important contribution.

Question put and agreed to.

Friday 14 July 1995

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

9.34 am

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. There has been much publicity this morning about a Government announcement on sport. I speak as someone who was heavily engaged in sport for 14 years before coming to this place, as a coach and as a participant in spare and school time.

I understand that an announcement will be made outside the House at 11.30 this morning. Have you received a request for a Minister to make a statement at 11 o'clock? Up to what time can the Government make such a request if they change their mind and decide to make a statement? Are you aware that the money that will be the subject of the announcement is not public money, although some people might think that it is?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. I see that the Minister of State, Department of National Heritage is in the Chamber. It is conceivable that he might be able to say something about the matter raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) while he is dealing with the first Lords amendment to the Olympic Symbol Etc. (Protection) Bill. That would be inappropriate, however, because hon. Members would not be able to challenge the Minister as they would be able to do if he made a statement in the normal manner. We need an assurance from the Minister that he will make a statement at the appropriate time to tell us that lottery money will not be involved. If it were, the Government would be stealing money from the lottery, something that we suggested could happen a long time ago.

Madam Speaker: Order. I cannot allow a debate on a point of order. I take note of the remarks of the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing).

The Minister of State, Department of National Heritage (Mr. Iain Sproat) rose—

Madam Speaker: I understand that the Minister wishes to respond.

Mr. Sproat: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Rather than taking up time during a private Members' day by making a statement, I thought that it would be for the convenience of the House to set out our new sports policy in a written statement, which I have done. The policy paper is in the Vote Office. Also for the convenience of the House, I understand that next week we shall have a full debate on the subject. That means that we shall have more time to debate the subject than would be available to the House if I were to make a statement today. I thought that it would be best for the House to debate the matter as fully as possible. I hope that, with that explanation, hon. Members will be satisfied.

Olympic Symbol Etc. (Protection) Bill

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 2

RIGHTS CONFERRED

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 1, line 21, leave out ("section") and insert ("sections").

9.37 am

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 2, 12, 14 and 15.

Mr. Winterton: The House will be aware that the Bill makes provision for the use for commercial purposes of the controlled representations:

"(i) the symbol of the International Olympic Committee, consisting of five interlocking rings,

(ii) the motto of the International Olympic Committee, 'Citius, altius, fortius', and

(iii) the words 'Olympiad', 'Olympiads', 'Olympian', 'Olympians', 'Olympic', 'Olympics'" and translations.

The Bill will give the person to be designated by the Secretary of State as the proprietor of the Olympics association right, the British Olympic Association, exclusive right to use the controlled representation during the course of trade. It creates a commercial property right that I would describe as a regime similar to that of the Trade Marks Act 1994 relating to registered trade marks, and will enable the BOA to raise revenue for British athletes for sponsorship with the benefit of statutory protection.

The Bill also gives effect to commitments made by the Government to the IOC to introduce legislation to protect the Olympic symbol, motto and protected words in the United Kingdom. Such statutory protection is a precondition of any future bid for the Olympic games in the United Kingdom. It is unfortunate that that protection did not exist when Manchester, a city close to my heart, made a bid, sadly unsuccessful, to host the games a few years hence.

On Second Reading my hon. Friends the Members for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) and for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) raised valid concerns about the scope of the Olympics association right and its application to small businesses such as pizza parlours, butchers, garages and restaurants which call themselves "Olympic". My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of National Heritage, whom I congratulate on his promotion, undertook to consider whether the bid affords sufficient protection to businesses whose use of a controlled representation could not be said to exploit an Olympics association. The amendments were moved in the other place by the Under-Secretary of State, Department of National Heritage, my noble Friend Lord Astor.

The House can feel happy that the Bill gives adequate protection to users of a controlled representation. Clause 4(9), (11) and (12) protect the right to continue the existing use of the controlled representation for the purposes of an undertaking or as part of a business or company name. The proprietors of businesses referred to on Second Reading, such as "Olympic" restaurants, need have no concerns about the Bill.

Clause 4(6) provides that the Olympics association right is not infringed where one of the protected words is used in a way that does not create an association with the Olympic games or the Olympic movement or draw on qualities of speed, excellence, strength or other qualities that are associated with the Olympic games or the Olympic movement. Members of the Greek community who open small restaurants or florists may be able, on the facts of the case, to rely on clause 4(6) to defend an action for infringement by the proprietor of the Olympic association right by claiming that the use creates an association with their homeland and not with the Olympic movement.

The Secretary of State has power under clause 14 to give directions to the British Olympic Association with respect to the exercise of the Olympics association right. That is specifically intended to give a person who alleges that he was unfairly refused the right to use a controlled representation after the Bill comes into force, the right to approach the Secretary of State. However, there is scope for identifying those areas where it would be fair to allow someone to use a controlled representation so as to avoid the burden of persons having to apply to the BOA for its use or risk inadvertent infringement of the Olympic association right.

The Lords amended the Bill to allow the Secretary of State, by order made by statutory instrument, to provide that certain categories of uses of a controlled representation would not constitute an infringement of the Olympics association right.

If the Bill is enacted, the Secretary of State, with the assistance of the British Olympic Association, will seek to identify areas in which use of a controlled representation may properly be allowed without at all jeopardising the British Olympic Association's commercial interests. It is difficult to anticipate where the need may arise, but the provision is broad enough to allow the Secretary of State to permit uses of a controlled representation.

For example, he could permit the use for the purposes of new subsidiary companies of established companies; in the incorporation of a company under its former business name; for the purpose of a certain class of business, for example florists or small restaurants; and for specified trade uses for the purpose of an undertaking. For example, that would cover use in a campaign against the Olympic games, an issue that was mentioned by the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) on Second Reading.

The amendments will enable the Secretary of State to authorise fair and non-exploitative uses of controlled representations such as those cited by hon. Members on Second Reading. The amendments are entirely acceptable to me as the sponsor of the Bill. They improve the measure and I commend them to the House.

9.45 am

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I declare an interest as I am a member of the British Olympic Association and I have been Minister for Sport three times in my career. This is an important day for sport and it is appropriate that such a Bill is being debated. The amendments will make an already good Bill an excellent one.

The important point to bring home is that the Bill will give sport an important future opportunity. Later today, we shall be able to consider the announcement by my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for sport about developments for England and Wales, while the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson), will deal with developments in Scotland. Sport will be debated next week and that is important because we have few opportunities to debate it. The country will welcome that debate.

The amendments tidy up an important section of the Bill, which we all support. I have the highest regard for Mr. Craig Reedie, the chairman of the British Olympic Association. It will welcome the amendments because they clarify the Bill and remove any worries about the original drafting curtailing personal interests. The Bill, whose sponsor is my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), is supported by a large number of hon. Members in all parts of the House. I wish it well.

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): It is a privilege to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro). I understand that that was his first Back-Bench speech since his resignation from the Government. He gave distinguished service in government, and it is a privilege to follow him.

It is important that the House always seeks to stand up for the rights of the weak against potential exploitation by the strong. I suppose that that is what is at the heart of my continuing nagging concerns about the Bill and the amendments, especially amendment No. 12, a new clause that seeks to address concerns that were expressed on Second Reading. The other amendments in the group are consequential on that amendment.

I suspect that most hon. Members who take part in the debate will pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) for introducing the Bill, and I join them in that. He has done a great service to the House and the Olympic movement and I hope that the Bill will make speedy progress to the statute book.

I regret that I shall have to speak at greater length than I had hoped, because I was unable to contact the British Olympic Association during the week to discuss my concerns with them in person. That was for the entirely understandable reason that most of its senior members were at the European youth olympics in Bath. I am delighted to see from today's edition of The Daily Telegraph that Britain's under-18 hockey team came from behind to beat Ireland 3-2 in the final yesterday. We urge our athletes on to great success in Bath.

I declare a kind of interest in the debate because I am an adviser to Visa International, which is a major sponsor of the Olympic games internationally. However, I make it clear that I have not discussed this matter with Visa and I do not know its views on the Bill or the amendments. My suspicion, however, is that, like any commercial sponsor of the Olympic games, sponsors would welcome both the Bill and any amendments that sought to clarify the way in which these powers can be used, because it is clearly important for sponsors to ensure that their sponsorship is protected. It is not just a question of protecting the rights of the Olympic movement or of the British Olympic Association. It is also very much a matter of ensuring that we protect sponsors' rights, otherwise that sponsorship will not be forthcoming. We have heard from my hon. Friend and in speeches in another place of the importance of those funds for Britain's athletes.

I want to make it clear that, in raising my concerns today, I share the basic support for the Bill's general thrust. Any additional assistance that is forthcoming to Britain's athletes, wherever they take the international stage, but particularly when it comes to the Olympics, is welcome, but how we fund the British Olympic Association raises important questions, and we must ensure that our athletes' rights to have adequate funds for their performances overseas are balanced against the need to safeguard the interests of this country's commercial organisations. My concern is whether the new clause and the group of amendments go far enough to protect their interests.

It is interesting to note in The Daily Telegraph today that the Sports Council has announced additional funding—another £1.25 million—for Britain's athletes competing at the 1996 Olympic games in Atlanta, but I note that a spokesman for the Sports Council says that that money

"doesn't fully bridge the gap but I hope the lead that we've given might persuade some commercial organisations to do something."

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. The hon. Gentleman is trying my patience somewhat. What has that to do with the amendments under consideration?

Mr. Luff: I am trying to explain the importance of ensuring that the rights of this country's organisations are absolutely protected. Let me explain more. We could be gathered up in a great feeling of good will towards the Olympics and our athletes without considering carefully enough and in sufficient detail the direct impact of the Bill on the organisations that we need to ensure are protected, particularly small businesses.

I have heard many reassurances from my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield during his opening remarks. I want to raise some additional concerns and I should like to hear those same reassurances from my hon. Friend the Minister to ensure that those organisations are properly protected. I was simply seeking to set the picture about the Bill's importance and to reassure the House that I in no way wished to undermine the effectiveness of the Bill, whose importance I genuinely understand. I share the view that my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield expressed about that.

My concern about the amendments is born simply out of the concern to protect the Bill's impact on some specific commercial activities. In another place, we heard Lord Brabazon of Tara express his support for the Bill in almost evangelical terms. My concern is that, because we are so anxious not to undermine the Bill's effect, we do not give the amendments sufficient scrutiny and ensure that they have the right impact and that they are the right amendments. On reflection, I wish that I had tabled alternative amendments that would have met my concern.

Commerce has rights too, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) said during his excellent Second Reading speech, which prompted, as I understand it, my hon. Friend the Minister of State and his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to bring forward amendments to this Bill in another place. I understand that this group of amendments attempts to deal with those concerns, but I have a number of worries about it.

The powers that we are giving to the Secretary of State to act in respect of those concerns seem to be clumsy and discretionary. They rely on the use of statutory instruments. I worry that the Government will be prepared to bring forward a statutory instrument for consideration by this House only if commercial interests' concerns are extremely clear cut. Frankly, I am also concerned that there may be a certain reluctance in the Department of National Heritage to exercise those powers at all, so I am looking for a reassurance from my hon. Friend the Minister of State that there will be a genuine determination by his Department to use the powers that this new clause will give him.

We have to be careful when we give powers to bodies that are outside the control of this House and make certain that the House has adequate powers of redress if those powers are misused. Earlier this week, I spoke on the Charities (Amendment) Bill. We were doing a similar thing with the charity commissioners. My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield has been consistently concerned about the powers that we hand to the European Union when the House is not able properly to control those powers. He is right and it is understandable to have those concerns. My concern, however, is that we are debating this new clause only because the Bill is a trifle over-ambitious. Will he consider—I think that procedurally it is now impossible—my preferred route forward, which is slightly to reduce the Bill's ambitious nature?

I fully understand that the Olympic movement's symbols are effectively trademarked as the most powerful protection, but other organisations use them in a variety of formats. The Public Relations Consultants Association uses them in an extended format on the front page of its annual report. Can it look to the powers in the new clause to ensure that its historic use—I have the report here and I shall show it to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield—will not be caught by the Bill's powers?

I understand the need to protect the motto of the Olympic Association but I suspect that this new clause will really come into effect when we debate the use of specific protected words in this Bill. This is where the real difficulty comes and where my concerns lie. I have no problem with the Bill protecting "Olympiad" and "Olympiads" because I understand that they are specific terms, used only in connection with the modern Olympic games. Similarly, I understand that the word "Olympics" relates entirely to the Olympics games. That is reasonable. For me, however, the problems come with other protected words, especially "Olympian", "Olympians" and "Olympic". We must be careful about constraining the use of words that have more general, historic and geographical connotations. I suspect that this is the way in which we will look to the Secretary of State to exercise his powers under the new clause if it is accepted by the House today.

I come from Worcestershire. I worry what would happen if we gave Lea and Perrins the power to control the use of the words "Worcestershire" and "Worcester" in relation to sauce, or if we gave Royal Worcester Porcelain the power to control the use of "Worcester". Although I have enormous admiration for those two companies.

[Mr. Luff]

I would speak against any attempt to do so. It is right that we should express our concern about the power that we are giving the British Olympic Association to control the use of those two words and that we assure and satisfy ourselves absolutely that, under this new clause, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will have adequate powers to deal with an over-mighty use of these words by the BOA.

I shall not weary the House with precise definitions of those two words, but it is worth remembering that all the dictionaries that I have considered give a wide variety of meanings, both for "Olympian" and "Olympic" which go well beyond the Olympic movement. The first definition of "Olympian" given in the dictionary is:

"Of or belonging to Olympus; heavenly, celestial."

Again, the first definition of "Olympic" is:

"Of or belonging to Olympus"—

the place. Those are matters of history and geography, not just games.

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): Surely my hon. Friend's points do not apply to any use of the words if they will not be confused with the aims of the British Olympic Association: to provide teams and compete in the Olympic games. He gives examples about Worcester sauce and Royal Worcester Porcelain and comments that he would defend the use of the word "Worcester". Surely he would argue that, if someone came along and produced a Worcestershire sauce in competition with Lea and Perrins, it would be wrong and in breach of the law, but if someone were to produce a Worcester soup or something similar, which has nothing to do with the original product, it would not be a breach? Similarly, the point is that these amendments from another place make it clear that his concerns would not apply because restaurants and others have nothing to fear. The amendments protect only the British Olympic Association from other organisations that might take funds away from it in relation to the Olympic games.

Mr. Luff: I hear what my hon. Friend has to say and I shall not be drawn into the debate about Worcester sauce, which has real problems about copyright around the world, but some remarks were made in another place during the debate about the effect of the new clause which give me a scintilla of doubt that his confidence is accurate.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Hexham got into a certain difficulty at Second Reading by giving examples of the use of those words by current businesses in a London telephone directory, one of those rare occasions when reading the telephone directory for the record was probably in order. I do not intend to do so today but I have considered those and I see that a number of companies have chosen to use those words because they believe it is useful in their business activity. My concern is that, although my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield discussed grandfather rights, where a company already uses the word, there may be a real desire by the BOA to prevent new companies that also think that there will be a benefit from using this word when establishing themselves. I seek that particular reassurance from my hon. Friend the Minister.

On Second Reading in the other place, Lord Astor—the then Minister—set out the Government's position clearly. Lord Brabazon, in reply, expressed severe reservations about accepting the amendment we are now debating. Indeed, he expressed disappointment that there should be any amendments at all to the Bill. I wonder what briefing led him to that view. Did the BOA express concern about the amendment and suggest that it might constrain its power to act to protect its sources of income?

10 am

I recognise that clause 4 provides a number of protections, as my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) rightly pointed out in his speech. However, what concerns me is that Lord Brabazon referred to the new protection offered by amendment No. 12—the new clause—as a power that he hoped would be used as an exception rather than a rule. The amendment seems to have been offered rather grudgingly by the Bill's sponsor, who hopes that it will not be used. I suggest that it is a power that needs to be used, possibly quite freely.

I am aware that my right hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries is a member of the BOA. My difficulty is that the BOA, rightly and properly, has as its primary objective the promotion of sport. Those who will exercise the powers in the Bill have a strong sporting bent; they are not commercial individuals whose job is to protect the commercial base of the country. One of them, I am pleased to note, is the former physical education teacher at my old school, Windsor grammar. However, in general, and having looked in detail at the curriculum vitaes of those who will exercise the Bill's powers, I have no confidence that their prime purpose will be to protect commerce; it will, of course, be to protect sport. That is why we need the additional powers given to the Secretary of State in the new clause. I accept that the individuals concerned at the BOA are trustworthy people, but they are not very commercial. Their first priority is bound to be sport.

I am doubtful whether we even need the Bill at all, given that the BOA says in its documentation that its primary tool for raising funds for athletes is not the words and symbols that will be protected by the Bill, but its own marketing symbol that unites the Olympic symbols with the union jack in a roundel. It describes its need to protect that symbol as its principal way of raising commercial revenues. The BOA does not directly exploit Olympic symbols, words and phrases, just its own adaptation of them. That is why it is so necessary that the new clause should give the Secretary of State adequate powers to protect commercial interests from the BOA's unreasonable use of its power.

There is another point about who should exercise the powers in the new clause. As I understand it, it will be the Secretary of State for National Heritage. I understand that because the Bill is about sports men and women. However, as the new clause is designed not to protect sports men and women, but to protect commercial interests, it might be better to give the power to a different Secretary of State than one whose prime motive, honourably exercised, is to protect sports men and women. It might be more appropriate to give the power to the President of the Board of Trade or even the Deputy Prime Minister, given that he now has responsibility for competitiveness and deregulation. Their motives in exercising the power would be rather different from that of the Secretary of State for National Heritage. They will be concerned to protect the individuals whom I understand the new clause exists to protect.

I am looking for a number of specific reassurances. Given that the powers will be exercised by the Secretary of State for National Heritage, can my hon. Friend the Minister assure me that they will be exercised in a pro-enterprise way and that the Department will not uncritically accept the views of the BOA? Will the Secretary of State consult her colleagues in Government before exercising the powers to ensure that the BOA is right in resisting any particular application for the introduction of a statutory instrument under the new clause?

I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield has already assured us that grandfather rights will be properly protected. Companies operating in or around my constituency already use words or phrases that are protected by the Bill. They may want to expand and set up new subsidiaries. I think that my hon. Friend gave me the assurance that they will be free to do so. However, I want my hon. Friend the Minister to give that same reassurance from the Dispatch Box, so that it has the necessary statutory force.

I also want an assurance that there is no way in which the BOA could use the powers in the Bill to do anything other than protect the literal words. The word "Olympia" is not protected by the Bill. The word "Olympic" is often used to describe size. For example, a local authority may describe its swimming pool as "Olympic-sized". I do not think that the BOA should expect a royalty payment from a local authority every time it described its own swimming pool in that way. Is that an example of the sort of matter that could be covered by a statutory instrument laid under the new clause?

I am left with the uncomfortable feeling that the Bill is cumbersome and complex when it should be quite simple. That sort of thing always sets off alarm bells in my mind. I wonder whether it could not have been more simple. I hope that the powers in the new clause are adequate to deal with the concerns that have been expressed both here and in the other place. I look forward to hearing my hon. Friend the Minister's response.

Mr. Fabricant: While my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) was speaking, I took the opportunity to pop out and look at a copy of Yellow Pages. However, I resisted the temptation to bring it into the Chamber, as happened on Second Reading—although at that time it was entirely appropriate to do so. I wanted to see whether there were any companies using the words "Olympiad", "Olympiads", "Olympian", "Olympians", "Olympic", "Olympics", and so on as listed in the Bill, that might conflict with the amendments. There were none. All businesses using such word were concerned with photocopying, restaurants, florists and other such activities.

Indeed, that fact was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), whom I congratulate on taking the Bill through its various stages. It is clear that there need be no scintilla of doubt, as expressed in the other place, about the Bill's intentions. I do not envisage the possibility that companies such as those listed in Yellow Pages using the name "Olympic"—even if they are new companies using that name, as existing companies are already protected—would be affected by the Bill.

The whole point of the Bill is to protect the British Olympic Association. This debate is especially interesting for me because I serve on the National Heritage Select Committee and one of the areas we are currently investigating is Olympic bids in the United Kingdom and elsewhere. Hon. Members may be interested to know that the Select Committee recently went to Barcelona to examine how the Spanish attracted the Olympic games to their country in 1992. What soon became apparent was the importance of the Olympic symbols for use by their local Olympic committee to raise money for local athletes. After all, is not that what the Bill is all about? Surely it is intended to ensure that there will be adequate funding for the British Olympic Association to send teams to Atlanta. The Select Committee will be going to Atlanta this summer to investigate how it attracted the Olympic games.

Indeed, we need to question whether it is even worth trying to attract the games to the United Kingdom. Given that Manchester spent a great deal of money on its Olympic bid but received only seven votes, we must question whether it is worth competing and whether it is worth the games coming to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Blackpool, South): As the chairman of our party's sports committee, and as today I have the honour to wear the Olympic bid tie for the Manchester bid, I have to tell my hon. Friend that although I agree with a number of his points about the amendments, the Manchester bid was enormously important in terms of increasing confidence in Britain as a whole and in the north-west in particular. The city of Manchester has benefited enormously from its Olympic bid.

Mr. Fabricant: My hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins) makes an interesting point. I would not wish to prejudge the findings of the National Heritage Select Committee. Before you rightly tell me off, Madam Deputy Speaker—I am rather drifting away from the amendments—I invite my hon. Friend, who has played an active and important role on the Back Benches as chairman of the Conservative sports committee, to attend the National Heritage Select Committee meeting when we interview the gentlemen from Manchester. They will include, I believe, Sir Robin Scott—

Mr. Gyles Brandreth (City of Chester): Sir Robert Scott.

Mr. Fabricant: Yes, Sir Robert Scott, who led the Manchester bid. Robin Scott is a previous controller of BBC Radio 1.

I have no reservations about the amendments. They strengthen the Bill. I accept to some small degree the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) that the use of statutory instruments may be a clumsy way of making amendments. In practice, I cannot see why statutory instruments would be needed because, as has been plainly pointed out already, there are so many industries that use the terms and symbols involved which cannot be confused with the aims of British Olympic Association and therefore would not be diverting money away from it.

I want this country to succeed at the Olympic games. We invented so many sports which are not in the Olympic games such as cricket, football—I am not sure whether football is in the games, but I think not—and tennis. We invent sports but do not seem to succeed in them. That is why I was so delighted with this morning's news and delighted to see my hon. Friend the Minister on television this morning talking about the Prime Minister's £100 million to promote sport in the United Kingdom. If East Germany could win so many gold medals with a population of only 18 million, how come a nation of 58 million active and fit people, as we are, is so unable to win Olympic medals in such profusion?

I support anything that can be done to promote the BOA and sport. I believe that the Lords amendments will strengthen not weaken the Bill.

Mr. Peter Atkinson: I join in giving a cautious welcome to the amendments although I share many of the reservations that my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) outlined.

When we last debated the issue, one or two Opposition Members who are not in their seats today accused me of filibustering to delay progress in debating a subsequent Bill. That allegation was set in stone by the BBC on television news that night and prompted some 600 letters to me, mostly abusive and some containing more than letters. However, that is part of the life of a politician.

It may not have been a spectacular Bill or one that caught the headlines like the Bill discussion of which was to have followed, but it was nevertheless very important both for the British Olympic Association and for the many small businesses who use the name or similar names and who were—and still are to a degree—concerned that their businesses could be affected by the legislation. It was that concern, which was referred to by my noble Friend Viscount Astor in another place, that prompted the Government to introduce the amendments, which, I believe, go some of the way towards meeting those concerns.

It is quite wrong that Bills are simply nodded through the House. It is wrong that we should rubber stamp Bills and leave it to their Lordships to sort them out later. That is wrong and an abuse of the House. When Bills come before the House, we have the right to debate them even if they are less interesting and headline-worthy that those that appear subsequently on the Order Paper. It is the luck of the draw on a Friday.

I seek the assurances that my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester asked for because I share some of his concern that we have a rather awkward system in which the Secretary of State, in negotiations with the British Olympic Association, will determine whether the use of the word is in breach of what is being proposed. With that guarded welcome, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) on the Bill. I am sure that now that the wrinkles have been ironed out it will be very valuable asset to the Olympics and our Olympic teams.

10.15 am

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): I intervene briefly to say that I think this is a very important day for the British Olympic Association. I am not referring to this glossy document, "Sport: Raising the Game", which we will no doubt be able to debate on Wednesday, as the Minister said. We shall see whether it is important for the Olympic movement then.

This Bill is the end of a very long road. Over the years, many of us have made representations to bring such legislation before the House. Indeed, in November last year, the Prime Minister wrote to me to say that he would introduce legislation as soon as parliamentary time allowed. We all know what that means. It is therefore very good that the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) took the initiative to bring the Bill before us and I think that it is going to be a very important piece of legislation.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: May I publicly thank hon. Members on both sides of the House for the support that they have given to the Bill? I pay particular tribute to the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) for his interest and the initiatives that he has sought to take in the past. This has been an all-party Bill. I am its sponsor but I pay tribute to the support that I have had from all political parties for the purpose and objectives of the Bill.

Mr. Pendry: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that.

The Lords amendments to the Bill clearly provide means by which any possible problems which might arise in the future can be dealt with. The new clause created by amendment No. 12 provides the means by which the Secretary of State could deal with problems by order without the need to return to the House and that should help with unforeseen problems, such as the case of the Olympians.

I am glad that assurances have been forthcoming to the effect that the Olympians in particular will be able to continue using the Olympic symbol. It is a group with altogether altruistic aims representing our community of past Olympic athletes and embodying all that is good about the Olympic spirit and the Olympic family. Under the leadership of Liz Ferris, it continues to encourage fair play in sport and is a valuable source of information and advice and it assists the BOA.

I wish to place that on record, because I am grateful that the Minister has given that guarantee within the context of the Bill. I hope that the amendments are carried, because they certainly make the Bill an even better Bill than it was when it first began its passage in the House. As I said at the start, this is a very good day for the BOA.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I welcome the Bill and support my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton). I congratulate him not only on sponsoring the Bill, but on including Northern Ireland in it. It affects us, too, and I share his tribute to the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry), because I know the role that he played when he was at the Northern Ireland Office, and his subsequent role in the realm of sport.

I long to see the day when our middle-distance runners will again top the field rather than lagging behind. I hope that next week's debate on sport will offer some light not only for Scotland and Wales but for Northern Ireland in the context of raising standards.

The hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) referred to Lord Brabazon speaking in an evangelical manner. I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman meant evangelical or evangelistic. It was the hon. Member for Worcester who spoke with evangelistic fervour. While he spoke with a quiet voice, he reminded me of the evangelistic preacher who started shouting because his notes said, "Argument weak, shout like hell." The arguments against the Bill were rather weak, and I look forward to it going through with the full support of the House.

Mr. Brandreth: I welcome the amendments but must do so in a subdued mood because of the sad and unexpected news of the death yesterday of my predecessor as the Member of Parliament for City of Chester. Sir Peter Morrison was Chester's champion for 20 years. There are three Cheshire Members of Parliament here today, and I know that they will join me in paying tribute to Sir Peter and in sending condolences to his family.

This is an important day for sport in the United Kingdom. The Bill is a small but important measure. I take this opportunity to salute my hon. Friend the Minister of State, because of all that he is doing to reawaken sport not only at the heart of school life but throughout our culture. We are going to breed Olympic champions in the United Kingdom, and I honestly believe that future generations will look back on the summer of 1995 and think of my hon. Friend the Minister and of the Prime Minister, who together are leading us into a new era of British sport.

The Bill is full of good sense. I think that the fears expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) are unfounded. He will find that, when the Bill becomes an Act, common sense will prevail and that the new clause—or amendment No. 12—will be a useful moderating mechanism.

I am delighted to welcome the amendments and the Bill and excited to think that the Bill will be in place when the Olympic games come to Manchester, as they must, and when all the gold medals are won by true Britons, thanks to the leadership shown by our outstanding Prime Minister and the Minister of State.

The Minister of State, Department of National Heritage (Mr. Iain Sproat): I shall first make one or two general remarks about this group of amendments and then deal with some specific points on which hon. Members asked for reassurance and with those made so lucidly and forcefully by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton).

My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield spoke clearly about the protection that the Bill gives to legitimate businesses users of a controlled representation. No one should be in any doubt—the Bill is not an anti-business measure. I shall deal in a moment with the related points that my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) quite properly raised, but I give that general assurance at the outset.

The Bill protects genuine property interests in the controlled representation and gives the British Olympic Association statutory protection for what are, in effect, its trademarks, alongside any common law remedies that it may have. Those who need fear the Bill are those who seek to trade on the reputation of the Olympic games by making money for themselves and depriving the BOA of its life-giving revenue.

It may be helpful if I draw the House's attention briefly to further protection for users of a protective word. Protected words are "Olympiad", " Olympiads", "Olympian", "Olympians", "Olympic" and "Olympics" and their translations. Unlike the exceptions in clause 4(10) to 4(14), they do not depend on existing use at the time the Bill comes into force.

Although I do not agree, hon. Members seem to think that what is said at the Dispatch Box has more force that what is said elsewhere. I am therefore happy to say that clause 4(7) provides that, in the case of the representation of a protected word, the Olympics association right is not infringed by use which creates an association between the Olympic games or the Olympic movement and any person or thing where the association fairly represents a connection between the two, provided that the use is in accordance with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters. Examples of use that might be justified under this clause are an Olympic champion who endorses sports equipment as an "Olympic champion" and a hotelier who advertises accommodation within five minutes' walk of an Olympic games venue. It will also cover incidental reporting of anything to do with the Olympics in day-to-day trade. After all, the Olympics are public events and it is not possible to prevent businesses from making references to them.

Such use, however, would need to be a fair representation of an existing connection. The clause does not, for example, permit a manufacturer to claim that his products have been endorsed by the BOA or the Olympic movement at large if they have not. Likewise, a supplier of widgets could not claim on the basis of a simple supply agreement with the BOA that he is "the" supplier of widgets to the BOA.

Furthermore, the clause 4(7) defence should be available only when the use is in accordance with honest practices in industrial or commercial matters. Among other things, that restricts what is known in the marketing business as "ambush marketing". An example of that would be if the BOA officially endorsed a sportswear manufacturer's products and a rival manufacturer ran an advertising campaign using former Olympic champions in order deliberately to counter the benefits of official endorsement. That is not an honest commercial practice, and anyone who undertakes such an advertising strategy will receive no help from this clause.

My hon. Friends the Members for Worcester and for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) are entirely right to say that, even where there is a genuine consensus in the House—as there certainly is in this case—it is not only right but essential that a certain healthy scepticism should be brought to bear on any legislation. I am sure that every hon. Member can think of a number of Bills that were not subject to healthy scepticism or explored sufficiently in the House, and regret that such legislation was too hastily passed. Although I hope that I can provide proper and adequate reassurances for my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester, it is extremely important that such matters should be explored.

My hon. Friend spoke of the importance of the funds for sportsmen that will arise from the Bill; that is at the heart of the Bill. I was glad to hear the reference to the Sports Council's further grant of £1.25 million to the Sports Aid Foundation precisely to help our Olympic athletes in their preparation. That is exactly the sort of provision that is either supplementary to, or supplemented by, the provisions in the Bill.

A number of hon. Members, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), mentioned the sports policy paper which the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) waved before us. Incidentally, I thank the hon. Gentleman for that free publicity. One of the main purposes of the policy paper is to do on a larger scale what the Bill seeks to do on a lesser scale, which is to inject more funds into British sports. It is therefore particularly appropriate that we are considering the Bill on the very day that the Government have announced their wider provisions to inject more money into sport at school level and at the championship and elite level.

My hon. Friend the Member for Worcester sought an assurance that legitimate businesses would not be damaged by the Bill. I can give him that assurance. We shall certainly use the powers that we have under the new clause 12. Appeals can be made to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State if a business feels that it is being damaged because it believes that the BOA is unfairly and improperly using the powers that the Bill gives it. In that case, the business can appeal to my right hon. Friend who will make a decision.

My hon. Friend was also worried that there might be instances in which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage could be thought to be more in favour of the sporting than the enterprise aspect of a case and that, if so, that matter should perhaps be put to another Secretary of State, perhaps the President of the Board of Trade or my right hon. Friend the First Secretary of State. Of course, that can be done because, as the House knows, the term "Secretary of State" in a Bill can refer to any Secretary of State. Although, in this context, it would normally be the Secretary of State for National Heritage, it would be easy for the matter to be taken to another Secretary of State, and the Government will decide what is appropriate. That should ally my hon. Friend's fears.

My hon. Friend also asked whether pro-enterprise considerations would be taken fully into account. The answer is yes. The reference to the Secretary of State means any Secretary of State, so it could be the President of the Board of Trade. He asked whether grandfather rights were covered, and the answer is yes. I give my hon. Friend those specific yes, yes, yes assurances.

10.30 am

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant) told us—I did not know—that the much-travelled Select Committee on National Heritage proposes to go to Atlanta. I say, not as a joke, that that will be extremely valuable to the Olympic movement, to the British Olympic Association, to the House and to the new United Kingdom Sports Council when it is established on 1 January next year. One of its specific remits is to attract to Britain top international sporting events, of which the Olympic games is possibly the biggest in the world. Therefore, to see exactly how Atlanta did it and what are the costs to that city will be extremely useful. As the youth games at Sheffield produced a pretty big debt burden on the backs of the city fathers for many years to come, it is important that we examine closely all Olympic-related matters. I shall value not only my hon. Friend's personal view when he returns from Atlanta, but the considered views of the Select Committee in summary.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire said that he was in favour of anything that could be done to support sport. He will know that today we are producing a sports policy paper which announces massive injections of money into sport from a number of different sources and the House will have a chance to consider it at greater length next week.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hexham made a valuable contribution to the Second Reading debate. He was treated extremely unfairly and I very much hope that the BBC will remedy the way in which it treats hon. Members. No doubt unwittingly, it grossly misrepresented the point that my hon. Friend made, as is proven by the fact that we are debating it today. By raising the matter, he caused my Department to decide that something must be done to clarify it, and that is why, for one valuable hour this morning, we discussed that important principle. I pay tribute to the healthy scepticism of my hon. Friend.

The hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde has had much to do with these matters in the past. I certainly echo the thanks expressed to the hon. Gentleman by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield. Although I am absolutely certain that, when our marvellous sports policy paper will be discussed at great length next week, the Labour party will find one or two tiny points with which it does not wholly agree, nonetheless I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his genuine support. He is right to exhibit that healthy scepticism that I call upon the House to exhibit towards others—even towards me. I look forward to next week's debate and I genuinely thank the hon. Gentleman for his supportive attitude.

My hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) welcomed the fact that the Bill will apply to Northern Ireland. I agree with him. He will know from my actions that I believe strongly in that principle. When I constructed the United Kingdom Sports Council, partly out of the old Sports Council, for the first time I specifically included a representative from Northern Ireland, as it is extremely important that Northern Ireland is seen to be part of the United Kingdom is every possible way. That includes sport, and that is why it is in the new United Kingdom Sports Council.

My hon. Friend the Member for City of Chester (Mr. Brandreth) gave the House some very sad news that I certainly did not know. Judging by the response of other hon. Members, most did not know about the sad death of Sir Peter Morrison, who had been a friend to many of us for many years. I should very much like to join all hon. Members in the condolences that my hon. Friend will pass on to Sir Peter's family.

I welcome Lords amendments Nos. 1, 2, 12, 14 and 15 as general deregulatory measures which will lift from identified classes of business that do not qualify for exception under clause 4 the burden of applying to the BOA for consent to user control representation. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield on the way that he has made his case this morning and on his persistent dedication and good humour in the face of some dilatory frustrations. I welcome the amendments and commend them to the House.

Clause 4

LIMITS ON EFFECT

Lords amendment: No.3, in page 2, line 40, leave out ("is") and insert ("consists of use").

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 4 to 11 and 13.

Mr. Winterton: The House is aware from the comments already made that the Olympics association right is a wide right which confers exclusive rights in relation to the use of the Olympic symbol, motto and protected words, similar to the right of the proprietor of a registered trade mark. The Bill is assiduous in its protection of existing and deserving rights. I have already set out some of those circumstances.

Lords amendments Nos. 3 to 11 and 13 relate to the exceptions to the Olympics association right in clause 4, subsections (1) to (4) that concern the inclusion of control representation in literary, dramatic and musical works, artistic works, sound recording, film broadcasts and cable programmes.

The Olympic games are public events, as my hon. Friend the Minister and others have stated this morning, and it would be quite unfair and totally impractical for the Bill to prevent broadcasters, journalists, photographers, artists and film makers from making reference to the Olympic games without the consent of the proprietor. That would be unacceptable censorship. Clause 4, subsections (1) and (2), as amended in the Lords, provide that the use of a controlled representation in literary works and so on will not infringe the Olympics association right, provided that the work is not used in relation to goods or services and is in accordance with honest commercial practice.

However, the Bill seeks to prevent the exploitation of a permitted artistic work to get around the Olympics association right. It is not intended, for example, that a person could use a television commercial—itself a permitted broadcast—to advertise a product by reference to the Olympic games. It is not intended that a person could use an artistic work as a design for goods such as T-shirts, sports bags and equipment simply to sell that equipment.

Concerns were raised in another place as to whether the restrictions on the use of a work as previously drafted—that is, that an artistic work cannot be used for advertising or promotional activities—covered the full range of practices by which a person who was determined to use a controlled representation might exploit an otherwise bona fide artistic work.

The amendments introduced in another place make it clear that use of a controlled representation in, or comprising, a work will not be permitted if its purpose or use relates to other goods and services—for example, in a television advertisement for sports shoes—or if a perfectly lawful work is subsequently used to advertise other goods and services. Any of the actions illustrated in clause 3(2) as examples of what may be used in the course of trade may also constitute use in relation to goods and services. Thus, if a trader fixes a design to a T-shirt which is exploited commercially, he will be in breach of the Olympics association right.

Amendment No. 11 makes that quite clear. It is the same as the test for determining whether the use of a registered trade mark is an infringement under the Trade Marks Act 1994. There is nothing contentious or novel about the amendment; it merely clarifies what was intended, and closes loopholes that would be available to an unscrupulous dealer.

Mr. Luff: I am keen for the point raised by the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone) about use of the slogan in political campaigning to be properly dealt with. On 3 February, my hon. Friend the Minister suggested that that might fall foul of the Bill. Do the amendments deal with the problem?

Mr. Winterton: They do indeed. I shall come to that in a moment.

Of course, a controlled representation should be capable of being used in relation to literary or artistic works that are themselves genuinely about the Olympic games or the Olympic movement, rather than being merely a commercial exploitation. Provision for that is made in clause 4(4), which would allow, for example, trailers for television coverage of the Olympic games or merchandise promoting films about them.

Lords amendments Nos. 3 to 11 and 13 make much clearer what is and is not allowed with regard to use of a controlled representation in a literary or artistic work, but they make the example raised on Second Reading by the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone)—the use of a satirical cartoon featuring the games in a T-shirt design as a campaign against the games—an infringement. The cartoon itself would not constitute such an infringement, but its use on the T-shirt would.

The Secretary of State, by directions or regulations or in some other manner, would make it clear that the BOA would have no remedy in such circumstances. Lords amendment No. 10, however, puts the matter beyond doubt by providing that use of a controlled representation in a work that is, to an extent, about the Olympic games or the Olympic movement should be allowed when the use of that work is not for the purpose of gain for any person, or loss for another. I hope that that reassures my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff).

I am sure that the House will agree that clause 4(1) and (2) make the position relating to films, broadcasting and so forth entirely clear, and that they have closed a loophole that might have been available to unscrupulous dealers.

Until now, the United Kingdom has been glaringly alone among the great sporting powers of the world in not having legislation to protect commercial property rights relating to the Olympic symbol. The House can be content that the Olympics association right will be secure in the able hands of the BOA. I am grateful to the BOA for the help that it has given me with the Bill—and to my hon. Friend the Minister and his Department, and other Departments that have helped me to draft the legislation.

The Bill will assist the BOA's attempts to build on the nation's success in the Olympic games. It will also safeguard the revenue that, in the modern age, is so important to ensuring success. I warmly welcome this morning's press announcement, and what has been said in the House, about the Government's initiative: my hon. Friend the Minister and the Prime Minister have announced the production of a fairly dramatic document about the future of sport, and the need for coaching and training so that the country can go from strength to strength.

[Mr. Winterton]

As I have said, revenue is important to the ensuring of success—success not only for such people as Linford Christie, Colin Jackson, Sally Gunnell and Jonathan Edwards, but for the hundreds, perhaps thousands, of other competitors who sacrifice their normal life and, perhaps, their careers for the pride of competing in international sport on behalf of our nation. It is to them that we owe the dignity of statutory protection that my Bill affords to the Olympic symbols.

I am pleased to be able to say that sponsorship raised with the benefit of the Bill will be available for British athletes to compete in the Atlanta Olympic games in 1996, at which I am sure that British sport will take its customary place at the high table of sporting achievement.

I commend the amendments and the Bill to the House.

10.45 am

Mr. Fabricant: I seek clarification on two matters. First, however, let me express the hope that Mr. Spencer Duval will be taking part in the Atlanta games in 1996. He is a constituent of mine, living in Lichfield; he is also the son of Mr. Derrick Duval, the immediate past chairman of my Conservative association.

I am concerned about two aspects of the visual representation of the Olympic games. My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) will know that the Select Committee on National Heritage recently examined the film industry. I, certainly, was delighted with the response of the Department of National Heritage, which is to take innovative action in regard to the film industry. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will do the same in his Budget.

One of our best film producers is David Puttnam, who, as hon. Members will know, produced "Chariots of Fire", a very successful film. Would the production of a film of that kind, depicting the Olympic games in the past, present or future—fictional or historical—be inhibited by any of the proposals of my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield?

My visit to Barcelona made me very aware that television rights are tremendously important to the funding of the Olympic games. Their sale is the largest single source of income for the provision of the games in a city. Will my hon. Friend assure me that other broadcasters would be prevented from breaking those rights, thus reducing the amount of income available to a city promoting or holding the games?

Mr. Winterton: My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant) has posed some sensitive and difficult questions. I hope that what I have already said makes it clear that we considered them when drafting the details of the Bill. I understand that the legislation covers both his points. I do not believe that there would be any impediment to the production of the kind of film with which David Puttnam—a very distinguished producer—was involved; however, safeguards are built into the legislation.

I believe that the Bill takes care of my hon. Friend's second point as well—but my hon. Friend the Minister may well wish to say a final word.

Mr. Sproat: I rise, somewhat unexpectedly, to respond to the two interesting questions posed by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Fabricant). The answers are simple. "Chariots of Fire" could certainly have been made under the provisions of the Bill; as for television rights, they would not be a matter for the BOA, but would be negotiated by the central Olympic body.

Insurance Companies (Reserves) Bill

Lords amendments considered.

After Clause 2

CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS

Lords amendment: No. 1, insert the following new clause—

CONSEQUENTIAL AMENDMENTS

(" .—(1) Schedule 9A to the Companies Act 1985 and Schedule 9A to the Companies (Northern Ireland) Order 1986 (form and content of accounts of insurance companies and groups) shall be amended as follows.

(2) In Note (24) on the balance sheet format set out in Section B—

(a) after "(Liabilities item C.5)" there shall be inserted—

"This item shall comprise the amount of any reserve maintained by the company under section 34A of the Insurance Companies Act 1982."; and

(b) after "This item shall" there shall be inserted "also".

(3) For paragraph 50 there shall be substituted—

"Equalisation reserves

50. The amount of any reserve maintained—

(a) under section 34A of the Insurance Companies Act 1982 ("the 1982 Act"), or

(b) under regulation 76 of, and Schedule 14 to, the Insurance Companies Regulations 1994 ("the 1994 Regulations"), shall be determined in accordance with regulations under section 34A of the 1982 Act or, as the case may be, in accordance with regulation 76 of, and Schedule 14 to, the 1994 Regulations."")

10.49 am

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Blackpool, South): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Lords amendment No. 2.

Mr. Hawkins: The amendment is necessary to ensure that the Companies Act 1985 and the Companies (Northern Ireland) Order 1986 comply with our obligations under European law. The amendment also ensures that those preparing insurance companies' accounts will know exactly how to report equalisation reserves that have been set up as a result of regulations made under the Bill, and also ensures that users of the accounts will have clear guidance on what to expect.

I should like to take the opportunity to thank the Earl of Northesk, who tabled the amendments in another place, for his prescience and his skilful handling of the Bill during its passage through another place. I also pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald), the promoter of the Bill. I am delighted to see my hon. Friend in his place in the Chamber, as it gives me an opportunity to congratulate him on his extremely well deserved promotion to the Government. My hon. Friend has worked extremely hard on the Bill, and it is a privilege for me—as vice-chairman of the all-party insurance and financial services group and somebody who worked for many years as a corporate lawyer in the insurance and financial services industry before coming to the House—to come in very much at the end of the Bill's passage.

I would also like to pay tribute to the work done on the Bill by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), the chairman of the all-party group on insurance and financial services. Sadly, my hon. Friend cannot be with us today, but he spoke in earlier debates on the Bill and his work as chairman of that group is recognised on both sides of the House. I would also like to thank the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling), who speaks on these matters for the Opposition, for his assistance in the earlier stages of the Bill.

The Bill deals with a matter with which I was concerned for many years before coming to the House. It may be of interest to say that the amendments are welcomed both by the Association of British Insurers and by the London Insurance and Reinsurance Market Association. The chief executive of the latter is Miss Marie-Louise Rossi, the daughter of the former and distinguished Member for Hornsey and Wood Green. Marie-Louise Rossi and I collaborated with others some years ago on a paper that called for precisely the kind of measures dealt with by the amendments.

Before I go on to explain the details of the two amendments, I should like to give the House the benefit of setting the matter in a slightly fuller context by way of an explanation of some of the developments in company law that led to the insurance accounts directive and the Companies Act (Insurance Companies Accounts) Regulations 1993.

Over the years, there have been a number of European directives to harmonise the accounts of companies. The first was the fourth company law directive 1978, implemented here by the Companies Act 1981, which harmonised the form and content of the individual accounts of companies. The seventh directive of 1983 harmonised the form and content of the consolidated accounts of groups and companies, and was implemented in this country by the Companies Act 1989. The fourth directive permitted member states to derogate from its provisions in the case of banks and insurance companies, pending the adoption of further directives.

The United Kingdom, like other member states, took advantage of the derogation and did not apply the provisions of the fourth directive to banks or to insurance companies. The existing legislation was largely left in place, leaving insurance companies with certain disclosure exemptions—for example, those enabling them to maintain hidden reserves. The bank accounts directive, which introduced a special accounting regime for banks, was passed in 1986, and implemented in regulations in 1991. The regulations introduced a new schedule 9 into the Companies Act, setting out requirements for the form and content of the accounts of banks and banking groups.

The European Community's insurance accounts directive follows the partner bank accounts directive in applying a number of provisions in the fourth and seventh directives to the accounts of insurance undertakings, while containing a number of provisions specific to insurance companies. The Companies Act (Insurance Companies Accounts) Regulations 1993, in implementing the insurance accounts directive into the United Kingdom, will bring the level of disclosure of insurance companies accounts into line with others in Europe, and with those of ordinary companies.

[Mr. Hawkins]

It is important to recognise that there are considerable differences in detail which arise because of the particular nature insurance business. The Companies Act (Insurance Companies Accounts) Regulations 1993 amended the Companies Act 1985 by inserting a new schedule 9(a) to im ement the EC directive on the accounts of insurance undertakings which was adopted in December 1991. The equivalent schedule for Northern Ireland was inserted by the Companies (1986 Order) (Insurance Companies Accounts) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1994.

The regulations are primarily concerned with the presentation and content of the annual reports and accounts of insurance companies to their shareholders or members. They also deal with the consolidation of the accounts of insurance groups and the distinct regulatory returns which such a company makes to the Department of Trade and Industry in compliance with its obligations under the Insurance Companies Act 1982. The 1993 regulations require considerable disclosure of information, and the standard formats for the balance sheet and profit and loss account are prescribed.

Detailed rules concerning accounting treatments, the valuation of certain types of asset and liability and the specification of the matters are to be disclosed in the notes to the accounts. The provisions of the 1993 regulations are mandatory for the accounts of insurance companies and groups for the financial years commencing on or after 23 December 1994. Insurance companies, in their accounts for this year until 31 December 1995, will thus be required to follow the regulations and to restate their 1994 results as comparatives.

The insurance accounts directive contains a number of member state options. In drafting the 1993 regulations, the Government's approach was to seek to permit as much reasonable flexibility as possible within a general framework provided by the directive. That was very much welcomed by the insurance industry, as, in trying to anticipate the future, the 1993 regulations might not give the required guidance in respect of all types of equalisation reserve.

During consideration of the Insurance Companies (Reserves) Bill, it became apparent that the regulations would have to be amended to accommodate reserves that might be created under the new section 34(a) of the Insurance Companies Act 1982, as the 1993 regulations only covered the treatment of the reporting of credit equalisation reserves. Since that was the only form of statutory equalisation reserve contemplated at that time, it was thought to be sufficient. However, the consequential amendments to be made by the Lords amendments needed to ensure that schedule 9(a) continues to implement the directive's requirement concerning the treatment of equalisation reserves in the accounts.

Under article 31 of the directive, an equalisation reserve, which a company is required to maintain whether by law or by administrative requirement, must be shown in the balance sheet as a technical provision under the liabilities of item C.5. At present, there is only one type of equalisation reserve which UK insurance companies are required to maintain—the credit insurance equalisation reserve—and the provisions governing this reserve are now contained in regulations 76 to 78 of and schedule 14 to the Insurance Companies Regulations 1994, which is SI 1516. Consequently, only such reserves are required to be shown under the liabilities in item C.5 in schedule 9(a) of a balance sheet.

Subsection (2) of Lords amendment No. 1 amends the notes to the balance sheet format to require that reserves required to be maintained by a company under section 34(a) of the Insurance Companies Act 1982 also need to be shown under this balance sheet caption. Although it is a technical matter, it is important.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (Surrey, East): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for interrupting his technical analysis of the legislation. Am I right in thinking that some, perhaps in the accountancy profession, have argued that as what is involved here is a reserve and not a liability, item C.5 might not be the appropriate place for equalisation reserves to be disclosed in the balance sheet?

11 am

Mr. Hawkins: My hon. Friend raises an important concern. I propose to deal with some of the concerns that the accountancy profession has expressed a little later in my remarks. I am sure that my hon. Friend will be pleased to know that it is now understood that the Accounting Standards Board, following discussions with the Department of Trade and Industry, has agreed a position. Perhaps we shall hear a little more about that from my hon. Friend the Minister. I shall deal with the matter later if my hon. Friend will allow me.

Subsection (3) of the new clause which amendment 1 seeks to insert amends paragraph 50 of schedule 9A in accordance with the requirements of article 62 of the directive to provide that the amount of equalisation reserves maintained under section 34A of the 1982 Act be determined in accordance with regulations made under that section. The word "determined" has been substituted for the word "value" on the basis that it more accurately reflects the requirement to maintain reserves. That is believed to be equally consistent with the terms of article 62 of the insurance accounts directive, which provides that member states which require equalisation reserves shall prescribe the valuation rules to be applied to those reserves.

No amendment is required in respect of the profit and loss account format, because the existing wording refers to which will cover all such provisions that are required to be maintained.

"change in the equalisation provision",

On the matter of matching the returns to the Department of Trade and Industry and shareholder accounts, the amendments will also have the benefit of keeping treatment of equalisation reserves in the returns to the regulator, the DTI and the accounts to shareholders on a similar basis. Although the two reports are prepared on a different basis in some respects, it is helpful to keep the formats broadly similar. The amendment achieves that.

Companies will in future in periods covered by the insurance accounts directive, namely, financial years commencing on or after 23 December 1994, in their annual returns to the DTI be expected to differentiate between statutory and non-statutory equalisation reserves in line with the provisions of article 30 of the insurance accounts directive.

The issue of whether accounts show a true and fair picture is extremely important to the accountancy profession. I am very much aware that a view has been expressed in the profession that this accounting treatment of equalisation reserves might not be desirable because it shows an item which, in the view of some members of the accountancy profession, is a reserve, as a liability since it relates to future claims. I respond to that in two ways. This point perhaps deals with the important point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, East (Mr. Ainsworth).

First, as I have explained, this treatment is embodied in European law. It is the way in which many European states have accounted for equalisation reserves. There was a clear majority for including that treatment in the insurance accounts directive. Therefore, the UK has no option but to follow that treatment. It accepted the principle when it adopted the treatment for credit equalisation reserves.

Secondly, however, I see a distinction between equalisation reserves and other reserves. Their levels are set such that, having regard to previous volatility in the areas of business covered, it is foreseeable that those continuing in these lines are encounter liabilities in the form of exceptional levels of claims for which they will need their equalisation reserves.

The House will recall from the very able presentation at an earlier stage in the Bill's proceedings by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North that the whole purpose of equalisation reserves is to deal with the particular extraordinary liabilities of massive environmental and other disasters. That is the crucial matter not only in the Bill but in the amendments.

I know that discussions are continuing within the insurance industry and the accounting profession. I am confident that there will be final agreement on the way in which equalisation reserves should be disclosed in the accounts of UK insurance companies, to comply with the law and with the accountancy profession's desire that what is disclosed is, as far as possible, in accordance with the generally accepted accounting practice of the UK accounting profession as regards a true and fair view. That is clearly extremely important.

As for the single market, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North explained most ably on Second Reading, the industry is convinced that equalisation reserves have an important, indeed crucial, part to play in ensuring the success of insurance companies in competing with others based in a single insurance market within Europe and in the world markets, where UK companies compete head on with their European rivals. If one examines the amount of premium income from some of the European companies such as Allianz in Germany and UAP in France, one sees that it is crucial that UK insurance companies, which have a massive opportunity in the world insurance market, should be able to compete in an even way with their European rivals.

The insurance accounts directive is a key part of the EC single market programme which the Government have so strongly and rightly supported. It plays an important role in opening up the EC insurance market by improving the comparability and transparency of insurance companies' accounts throughout the EU. It is complementary to the third life and non-life insurance directives, which provide the legislative framework for the single market in insurance products. A significant part of the directive's purpose is to improve the comparability of the accounts of insurance companies and groups throughout the EU by providing a measure of harmonisation of their form and content. That is an important part of the development of—to use the notorious but important phrase—a level playing field in insurance.

The amendment plays a key part in the Bill's objective of assisting the competitiveness of the UK insurance industry with its European counterparts in both the European and world markets. Many policy holders and their advisers choose an insurance company at least in part on the strength of its position as shown in its accounts. The amendment ensures that those preparing and using insurance company accounts will know clearly how equalisation reserves set up as a result of regulations made under the Bill are reported.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: I am grateful for the opportunity to say a few words on this excellent Bill. I should like to preface my remarks by complimenting my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald), now Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, on having the inspiration to introduce the Bill and on taking it so ably through the House as far as he was competent to do so. I also congratulate him on his elevation to ministerial rank. The House will appreciate the work that my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins) has undertaken since taking up this worthwhile cause.

We were talking earlier about the Olympics and the world of sport. The world of insurance seems a far cry from the glamorous world of the Olympics. I mean no disrespect to my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South when I say that, but these are technical matters which are likely to remain opaque to most members of the public. They are none the less important matters. Many of us have our ups and downs with the insurance industry. I certainly have. It is not one of my favourite things to have to deal with. One puts in a great deal of money and gets it back only when something unpleasant happens. The industry has a difficult public relations exercise to conduct.

None the less, insurance is one of our most important industries. In London alone, it employs about 60,000, people and the non-life side of the business, which is the side that is likely to benefit from this legislation, involves premium income of about £12 billion a year. It is a major and successful part of British industry, one of the keys to the success of the City of London, which is so important to the economy of the nation as a whole, and a substantial employer.

The industry has come under a lot of pressure, however, in recent years. Obviously that was partly due to recessionary factors, increased competition and the string of almost unprecedented natural disasters—earthquakes, storms, hurricanes, typhoons, the Piper Alpha disaster and so forth. It is in establishing a better way to provide for that sort of eventuality that the claims equalisation reserves will be so helpful.

United Kingdom insurance companies have been subject to a competitive disadvantage because they have not had tax relief on setting up equalisation reserves to smooth the peaks and the troughs of the insurance business when such disasters strike. On Second Reading, it was clearly established that, while there is no call on the Exchequer in establishing the reliefs envisaged in the Bill, there will be a significant economic and commercial benefit to the insurance world, and I sincerely hope also to the customer. Every year, the premiums that we are asked to pay seem to rise inexorably. The establishment of equalisation reserves could smooth things out and reduce the need for these apparently inevitable hikes in the premiums, which will be a very good thing.

[Mr. Peter Ainsworth]

The Bill is simply an enabling measure. My hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North published a consultation document, which I hope will receive wide attention. I also hope that, following today's debate, he will be able to move swiftly forward with detailed regulations to implement what is envisaged in the Bill.

The amendments that the other place has wisely put before this House are very welcome, as my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South said. The enormous technicality of whether liabilities item C.5 is the appropriate place for the reserves to be, I leave to accountancy professionals, to whom these things mean something. I am told, however, that the amendments will require companies to show all the equalisation reserves that they are required to maintain under the item, which will create the clarity and consistency that are so important to those who use the accounts of insurance companies and study such matters.

There is also the European dimension. There is not much point in setting out procedures to establish a more level playing field with our European competitors, if the accountancy treatment of the claims equalisation reserves is not consistent. As my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South said, the amendments help to place our insurance industry on a more equal footing with its European competitors, which have successfully increased their market share in London in recent years.

Although the Bill may appear dry, academic and technical, it has a great deal to do with promoting and securing the success of one of our most important industries and is, therefore, welcome, as are the amendments. I sincerely hope that the Bill will be successful and that my hon. Friend the Minister will be swift in implementing legislation to bring this important competitive advantage to one of our most distinguished and successful industries.

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): We support the Bill and the amendments and I am grateful to the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins) for having set out the background and drawn our attention to many interesting points to which the Minister will no doubt reply and on which I see no need to comment.

It would also be right to draw the attention of the House to the efforts of the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald). As those of us who have engaged in the lottery of the private Member's Bill procedure to introduce legislation that has all-party support know, it takes a lot of time. It is remarkable how Bills that have all-party support tend to be held up much more than those that are contentious. The hon. Gentleman deserves credit and his efforts have clearly been noted by the Whips and his leader as he has been promoted to greater things.

11.15 am

We should also be grateful to the other place, which, as we have come to expect, has amended and improved the Bill. It is worth reflecting on the fact that many private Member's Bills are substantially improved and tightened up in the other place, which deserves credit for that.

I raised the need for such a provision during the passage of the 1993 Finance Bill. Although I am sorry that the Government were not able to find Government time for the legislation, we now have a measure which will hopefully receive Royal Assent shortly and which, as the hon. Member for Surrey, East (Mr. Ainsworth) said, will greatly benefit the insurance industry, particularly as it finds itself in increasing competition with insurance companies based in other parts of the European Union. Most other member states have such provisions, which gives them a competitive advantage.

There is no doubt, either in the industry or in the House, that this measure is a great advantage to the industry. All of us want the United Kingdom insurance industry to compete well within the EU and other parts of the world, which it is doing. Other measures will, of course, be necessary to help, but the Bill is very welcome.

I have two questions of which I gave the Minister some prior notice at least an hour or so ago and I will put them on record so that I can get a Government response. I appreciate that the Minister represents the Department of Trade and Industry rather than the Treasury, but I think that I may properly ask him when the Government will say whether tax relief is to be given or what measure of it is to be given to the reserve funds. One of his colleagues in the other place said that the Government would at some stage indicate its tax policy and reference was made to a statement by the former Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who said that the Government were considering tax relief for an acceptable scheme. It might be helpful if the Minister told us what stage those considerations have reached. I appreciate the fact that that may properly be a matter for the Chancellor's budget statement, but it would help the industry and the House if the Minister said how far the Inland Revenue has got.

To some extent, the question of tax relief begs the question as to what the regulations will be. Without that detail it is difficult to see on what basis there would be tax relief. One point that is worth drawing out is that, when the matter was first raised and a former Financial Secretary to the Treasury—now Secretary of State for Health—made a statement of the Government's intent, it was said that the matter was to be tax-neutral. Perhaps the Minister can confirm that that is the case, if he is in a position to do so.

Another obvious question is, where have we got with the regulations to be made under the Bill? The DTI has produced a consultation paper, to which the industry and others have no doubt been responding.

For the Bill to work there must be regulations and it is in the interests of all concerned that those regulations are brought before the House at the earliest opportunity. I saw in the DTI consultation paper that it was thought that those regulations would come into effect in December 1995. Given that the House is about to rise for the long summer recess and will not return until the middle of October, time is getting tight. So I assume that the regulations are at an advanced stage or that those in the DTI and possibly the Treasury will work throughout the summer to lay the regulations before the House when we return. Although that is conceivable, will the Minister let us know the position?

It would be helpful if the Minister gave a specific response on those two matters. He may also wish to respond to the other matters that have been raised but I do not intend to refer to them because that would be unnecessarily repetitive, among other things. I conclude by reaffirming our support for this measure. I hope that it will receive Royal Assent at the earliest opportunity, which will be of great benefit not just to the insurance industry and all those who work in it but to the country as a whole.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate and Consumer Affairs (Mr. Jonathan Evans): First, I thank the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) for his remarks. He is absolutely right to say that in 1993 he first identified the demand on the part of the British insurance industry for equalisation reserves to be granted tax relief, not least to help our insurance companies in the non-life sector to compete with companies on the continent, which are currently given tax relief.

I was grateful for the remarks made by the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell), who led for the Opposition when the Bill was considered on Second Reading. I should also express a measure of sympathy with the hon. Members for Edinburgh, Central and for Middlesbrough, in that, although they both understood the Bill's importance for the British insurance industry and the fact that it had wide all-party support in the House, they and my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald), now Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, went through the difficulty of trying to persuade some hon. Members in the new Labour party of the importance of this measure.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: I was present during the Second Reading debate armed with what I regarded as a finely honed speech, which was never delivered because sadly some Opposition Members were determined to be so voluble as to impede the Bill's progress. I remind my hon. Friend that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) said that the Bill

"is all about arranging things in favour of the bosses of the insurance companies so that they can get increased directors' pay and all the rest of it."—[Official Report, 27 January 1995; Vol. 253, c. 651.]

My hon. Friend might like to comment on that assertion.

Mr. Evans: I do not intend to detain the House with too much comment in that direction because in a way it would be unfair to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central, who has always supported this measure. Although the Bill has had widespread all-party support, I recognise that there have been difficulties and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the efforts that he, at least, has made to persuade those in his party of the merits of the argument. He knew that the Bill was of great importance to the insurance industry.

Mr. Darling: I am grateful to the Minister for his kind comments and for letting me intervene. As people outside the House follow our proceedings, I should draw attention to the fact that part of the difficulty in relation to this Bill and others was that it was caught up in the controversy about the Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) Bill, which I note has been set down for today's business. That fact, and everything that the public and the House know about how the Government dealt with that Bill, led to unfortunate delays on this measure and others. With due respect to the Minister, it might be an idea to get on with discussing this Bill rather than engaging in a political dogfight, which I am happy to have but which would not be particularly productive on a day such as this.

Mr. Evans: I had intended to move on with the Bill in hand. The only thing that prevented me from doing so was my generosity in giving way to the hon. Gentleman.

I am grateful to those hon. Members who expressed their thanks to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North for introducing this measure in the first place. At this stage, he cannot take the proceedings further because of his well deserved appointment to ministerial office, but we all recognise the efforts that he made in carrying the measure through. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins) for taking on the Bill at this relatively late stage in the proceedings. I also thank the noble Earl Northesk, who demonstrated great competence and clarity when he presented the Bill in another place.

My hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South has mastered the details of the Bill quickly and presented the Lords amendments before the House skilfully and persuasively. They are technical matters but they are also very important. This debate has been valuable and thoughtful. I join those hon. Members who have welcomed my hon. Friend's efforts and endeavours for the manner in which they spoke to the amendments today and the efficient organisation that has enabled the Bill to reach its final stages in the House.

May I express my delight that other hon. Members have referred to the role played by my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) in his position as chairman of the all-party group on insurance, who has promoted this idea with vigour equal to that of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central. Finally, I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, East (Mr. Ainsworth) who was present throughout Second Reading and is a sponsor of the Bill.

In dealing briefly with the Lords amendments, I take the opportunity to clarify the Government's position on the points that have been raised by the Accounting Standards Board. My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, East referred specifically to the concerns outlined by the board and others on the accounting treatment of equalisation reserves. This matter has been discussed with the Accounting Standards Board and the Association of British Insurers. Under the insurance accounts directive, equalisation reserves are required to be shown as liabilities in published accounts. The amendments introduced by the noble Earl Northesk in another place give effect to that part of the directive for any equalisation reserves that might be created using new section 34A of the Insurance Companies Act 1982, which is inserted by the Bill.

The Government recognise that that treatment would not normally apply under generally accepted accounting principles in the United Kingdom. Equalisation reserves represent amounts set aside to meet potential future obligations. Such amounts would normally be treated as reserves rather than liabilities in a company's accounts. We have received representations from the Accounting Standards Board and others that there should be adequate disclosure in the accounts to enable someone reading the accounts to understand the nature of the equalisation reserve, and that the treatment of equalisation reserves required by the insurance accounts directive should not be permitted to weaken the "true and fair" concept that applies to company accounts generally.

[Mr. Evans]

On the first point, I understand that the Accounting Standards Board and the Association of British Insurers are discussing how adequate disclosure can be achieved, and that there are good prospects for agreeing guidance to companies on that issue. We fully support that. On the second point, the Government have strongly supported the extension of "true and fair" reporting to the insurance sector via the insurance accounts directive.

Save in exceptional circumstances, such as those that apply to equalisation reserves, insurance companies are legally obliged to follow the true and fair requirement as it applies generally. Like other companies, they are expected to comply with applicable accounting standards. We do not believe that the treatment of equalisation reserves has any wider implications for the interpretation or meaning of the "true and fair" view which all company accounts are required to give, either in relation to other aspects of the insurance business or for companies more generally.

Having dealt with those matters which are directly related to the amendments before the House, I will now respond briefly to the points raised by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central. He will be aware that this measure is necessary because it is a preliminary step that must be in place to ensure that tax relief can subsequently be made available for equalisation reserves.

11.30 am

That is a twofold process. The first part of the process is for us to have legislation in place. The second part much involves Treasury Ministers. It is for my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he comes to make his Budget statement, to make any statement that may be necessary about the tax treatment of the reserves that we are discussing. The Government have made it clear throughout the passage of the Bill that they are not in a position at this stage to give any commitment on what the position may be at the time of the Budget statement. The Bill is important because it is vital to ensure that a statutory vehicle is available as and when tax relief may be agreed by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central talked about the period of consultation on draft regulations. The hon. Gentleman will know—he has seen the consultation paper—that there has been widespread consultation. I understand that over the past few days the Department has received responses from the London Insurance and Reinsurance Market Association and the Association of British Insurers. We would hope to be in a position to publish draft regulations by about mid-September. Thereafter the regulations will be laid as and when any concession may be made on the tax treatment of the reserves. It would be inappropriate to lay any such regulations unless subsequently there is a statement by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor to the effect that such tax treatment will be made available.

Once again, I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South for all his work on the Bill and congratulate him on his skill in explaining the amendments. I also offer my thanks to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North for his efforts in introducing the Bill when he was on the Back Benches. I am well aware that in the non-life sector the Bill is warmly welcomed by the insurance industry. The Government welcome it as well.

Mr. Hawkins: I shall respond briefly to one or two of the points made in this short but important debate. I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for what he has said about the agreement between the Accounting Standards Board and the Association of British Insurers. I thank also my hon. Friend's officials, who have clearly been working extremely hard to ensure that the agreement between the board and the ABI can be referred to this morning.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, East (Mr. Ainsworth) both for his perceptive interventions and remarks this morning and for being present throughout the earlier stages of the Bill's consideration. He was a sponsor of this important measure. It is a great shame that he did not have the opportunity to give the House the benefit of his fuller remarks on Second Reading. We have had an indication this morning of the interest that he takes in these matters. Perhaps there will be other occasions when insurance matters come before the House, when we will be able to hear my hon. Friend at greater length.

I look forward to the future discussions between the Accounting Standards Board and the ABI. I am as confident as my hon. Friend the Minister that an agreed view will be reached. I look forward also to seeing the results of the consultation process. Important issues are dealt with in an extremely detailed consultation paper that has been produced by the Department. I do not intend to detain the House by referring to those issues. I welcome the fact that some of the most important bodies such as the London Insurance and Reinsurance Market Association and the ABI have already made submissions in response to the consultation paper. I hope that many other bodies and companies will do so. It is crucial that United Kingdom insurance companies should benefit from this legislation to enable them to compete adequately in the rest of the world with European insurance companies.

I welcome the contributions that have been made in this short debate.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We now come to Lords amendment No. 2, which will be moved formally.

Mr. Hawkins: Rather than moving it formally, Madam Deputy Speaker, I should like to say a few words.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is not possible. As Lords amendments Nos. 1 and 2 were grouped together, any remarks about amendment No. 2 should have been made when amendment No. 1 was being discussed. It is now too late.

Clause 14

SHORT TITLE, ETC.

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 11, line 12, after ("2") insert (",3").

11.34 am

Mr. John Austin-Walker (Woolwich) rose—

Mr. Michael Fabricant (Mid-Staffordshire): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I raise this matter while my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs is still in the Chamber. Is he to make a statement about the marvellous news in the west midlands—I have the privilege to be a west midlands Member—that £80 million of intervention funding is to be made available by the Department of Trade and Industry? We are seeing a £400 million investment of private money from the Jaguar motor company, some—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I cannot allow the hon. Member to raise a point of order simply to make observations. The matter is concluded.

Mr. Austin-Walker: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Hon. Members will remember that the Bill received all-party support during each stage of its passage through the House, for very good reasons. It was understood that the Bill was concerned with the protection of national health service patients. The same was true in the other place. There has been all-party agreement on the Bill's principles and scope. I wish to reassure hon. Members immediately that the amendment does not alter those principles or scope.

The amendment was introduced in the other place by the Government. It received cross-party support. It deals with a technicality. It clears up a difficulty in the drafting of the Bill, and relates to the timing of the commencement of the Bill, when enacted, in relation to the coming into force of the Health Authorities Act 1995.

The Bill rightly refers to "health authorities". It refers to the new authorities that will come into existence on 1 April 1996 when the Health Authorities Act comes into force. Family health services authorities are not health authorities within the meaning of the National Health Service Act 1977. To allow the provisions of the Bill to apply to family health services authorities before April 1996, provision had to be made for reference to health authorities to be read as references to family health services authorities. Clause 14(5) provides that where clauses 2 and 6, which set out the arrangements for the suspension of practitioners and for the constitution of the tribunal, refer to a health authority, that means a family health services authority until 1 April 1996.

Regrettably, clause 14 omitted an additional reference to a health authority. The additional reference is contained in clause 3. One of the effects of clause 3 is to bring tribunals into line by removing practitioners' right of appeal to the Secretary of State against directions of the NHS tribunal. Such appeals will be made to the High Court on a point of law. Perhaps most importantly, the clause provides health authorities with the power to implement tribunal directions that practitioners should be disqualified. That is the central point of the Bill.

If clause 3 had remained unamended, tribunal directions to disqualify practitioners between the date of commencement of this measure and 1 April 1996 would be meaningless. They could not be put into effect by family health services authorities. By bringing clause 3 into the ambit of clause 14(5), the problem will be overcome.

I believe that it would have been possible technically to delay the implementation of clause 3 until after the Health Authorities Act came into force. I discussed that possibility with the Department and with officials of the NHS executive. However, the Government concluded that it was preferable to table the amendment to preserve the Bill's intentions. I agree with that view and I am happy to accept the amendment.

As I said on Second Reading, I presented the Bill in the light of the experience of some of my constituents because I believed that their safety was placed at risk by the existing arrangements. I raised those matters with the Minister of State. He and I normally exchange angry views across the Chamber but I hope that the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis), will convey my thanks to the Minister of State for his positive response to me I also thank Baroness Gardner of Parkes for taking the Bill through the Lords, the officials in the Department of Health and especially those in the national health service executive for their assistance. The amendment is small but important. I commend it to the House and hope that hon. Members will give the Bill final approval.

Mr. Paul Boateng (Brent, South): On behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Ms Jowell), who speaks for the Opposition on these matters and is unavoidably detained by a long-standing constituency commitment, I welcome the amendment, whose intentions have been explained by my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Austin-Walker). The House and the millions of national health service patients who will benefit from the Bill owe him a debt of gratitude. He has done the House, his constituents and the nation a great service by introducing this much needed and extremely helpful measure. We are happy to do all that we can to speed it on its way.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Bowis): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), who is standing in for his hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Ms Jowell), for his endorsement of the Bill and the amendment. I am sure that he will forgive me if I express even more gratitude to the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Austin-Walker) who has steered the Bill through the House and spoken to the amendment. I am grateful to him for the gracious way in which he spoke about my hon. Friend the Minister of State. I shall certainly pass on his message of a ceasefire, or perhaps a temporary ceasefire. That will be treasured by my hon. Friend who, I am sure, will read Hansard in bed tonight with a little glow of pleasure.

Mr. Boateng: If that is all he gets pleasure from I feel sorry for him.

Mr. Bowis: I do not think we should follow the hon. Member for Brent, South down his pleasure routes.

[Mr. Bowis]

I am also happy to accept thanks to Baroness Gardner of Parkes and to the officials in my Department and in the NHS executive. I am sure that they will be appreciated.

As the hon. Member for Woolwich said, the amendment seeks to correct an anomaly that would arise if clause 3 were not brought under the scope of clause 14(5). The Bill has the Government's full support and I am pleased, or fairly pleased, to be here to take it through what I hope will be its final stage before Royal Assent. I had the pleasure of dealing with the Bill in its earlier stages and it went to the other place with the Government's blessing.

At first sight the Bill's subject matter seems somewhat arcane. The National Health Service Tribunal is perhaps not much in the public eye. The hon. Member for Woolwich spoke about his personal experiences and about the tribunal's important function. It is a quasi-judicial body which considers representations from family health service authorities that individual practitioners should be removed from authorities' medical, dental, pharmaceutical and optology lists. Doctors, dentists, pharmacists and ophthalmists may provide family health services as unrestricted principal practitioners only if they are included in such a list. The NHS tribunal is the only body with the power to remove them from a list and thus from general practice.

As the House would expect, the tribunal's powers are rarely invoked and only in extremely serious cases where a practitioner's conduct or practice is such that the family health services authority feels that the provision of services is in jeopardy. The tribunal is asked to consider only about five or six cases a year, but they involve circumstances, about which the hon. Member for Woolwich spoke at an earlier stage in the Bill's progress, where patient care may have been compromised either directly, because the practitioner poses a physical threat to his patient, or indirectly, because the standard of care that he provides falls far short of that which the NHS, patients and the House have a right to expect.

In cases where the tribunal considers an authority's concerns to be justified, it may order the removal of a practitioner's name from the appropriate list and may even prevent its inclusion in similar lists that are held by other authorities. I pay tribute, as I am sure does the hon. Member for Woolwich, to the tribunal's chairman, Adrian Whitfield QC, for the assiduous way in which he and his colleagues perform their functions.

The tribunal has far-reaching powers but the Bill is valuable because the workings of the tribunal could be streamlined in several ways. It is valuable most of all because there is a serious gap in the tribunal's available powers. The Bill allows for the appointment of a permanent deputy chairman, lay members and a wide pool of professional members. That would better equip the tribunal to carry out its functions with the required speed.

The Bill will enable the NHS tribunal to declare that disqualified practitioners should not be allowed to work in the family health service as locums, assistants or deputies to principal practitioners. At present no such restrictions are available to the tribunal, even when it feels that it would be wholly inappropriate for a disqualified practitioner to provide services as a locum, assistant or deputy. The Bill will plug that loophole.

The measure removes a practitioner's right of appeal to the Secretary of State for Health but will leave in place the right of appeal that is provided by the Tribunals and Inquiries Act 1971 to the High Court on a point of law. The Franks committee recommended that appeals from decisions of all tribunals should be made to a court. The provision brings the NHS tribunal into line with good tribunal practice. Most importantly, the Bill will provide the tribunal with a power to suspend practitioners from providing family health services in wholly exceptional circumstances so as to protect patients.

The family health services authorities, which make representations to the tribunal, said that the continued inclusion of a practitioner's name in one of their lists would be detrimental to the provision of services in their areas. They will be able to ask the tribunal to suspend that practitioner from duty with immediate effect where it is felt that that is vital to protect patients. If granted, that order would remain in force until a tribunal was able to hear in full the representations made against the practitioner in question.

Some hon. Members may have thought that the power that I have outlined already exists. Of course it does for practitioners who are employed in hospital and community services. That is why, in the topical case of Dr. Kiberu, such steps were possible. But the key word is "employed". Family health services practitioners are not NHS employees. They hold a contract of service with the NHS and are regulated by family health services authorities. Their contracts of service do not contain a clause allowing for suspension or disqualification from practice, nor can the powers that are available to the professional regulatory bodies, which in any case are to protect professional standards, assist in the immediate removal of practitioners from family health services authorities' lists.

At present there is no means by which a practitioner can be removed from practice immediately, even when that appears to be essential to protect patients. It is plain that the NHS needs power to do that, although from what I have said about the rarity of tribunal hearings the House may appreciate that we do not expect the power of suspension to be used often. However, such cases arise when the conduct or practice of a practitioner may be such that fears are raised for the safety of his patients. In such cases, the NHS needs to be able to act quickly to secure above all else patient safety.

That is why the NHS is grateful to the hon. Gentleman for bringing the Bill forward. The amendment does not alter the substance of what the Bill seeks to achieve. It is the substance of the Bill and the purpose of the NHS tribunal that the amendment protects. As the hon. Gentleman said, we foresaw real difficulties if the scope of subsection 14(5) was not extended by an amendment to cover clause 3. As the hon. Gentleman has described, clause 3 removes the arrangements under which practitioners may appeal to the Secretary of State for Health against decisions to disqualify them. It goes on to provide health authorities with the power to implement tribunal directions that practitioners should be disqualified.

New health authorities will not be established until 1 April 1996. Therefore, without the amendment, family health services authorities would not be able to carry out directions of the national health service tribunal to disqualify practitioners. It follows that such directions made before 1 April 1996 would have been meaningless. Only the most serious cases are referred to the NHS tribunal. The hon. Gentleman brought this Bill before the House with patient safety at the forefront of his mind. I recall the eloquence with which he cited a case in his constituency where patients had, at the very least, been put at serious risk.

Clearly it would be nonsense if NHS tribunal directions to disqualify practitioners could not be implemented for however short a period as a result of a technicality. Bringing clause 3 under the scope of subsection 14(5) will put that right. It is simple and will ensure that the hon. Gentleman's intention in introducing the Bill and the House's earlier understanding of its provisions are preserved, so I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for piloting this amendment and the Bill through the House. I hope that the House will view it as favourably as it has the Bill and that hon. Members will allow the Bill to complete its final stage, coupled with thanks to the hon. Gentleman.

Lords amendments considered.

Clause 1

TENANCIES TO WHICH THE ACT APPLIES

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 1, line 6, after ("Sections") and insert

("(Transmission of benefit and burden of covenants), (Transmission of rights of re-entry),")

11.52 am

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Lords amendments Nos. 10, 11, 16, 23, 28 to 30, 39, 61, 62, 74 and 88.

Mr. Thurnham: Today is a day that has been looked forward to by many tens of thousands of small business men and shopkeepers up and down the country, who long to be free of the worry of landlords pursuing them many years after they have vacated their premises.

I give thanks to my noble Friends the Earls of Courtown and of Northesk, who assumed stewardship of the Bill in another place. My noble Friend the Earl of Courtown introduced the Bill so successfully that he was quickly promoted to the Whips Office, leaving the Bill to be ably carried through by my noble Friend the Earl of Northesk, who also helped with another Bill that we have already debated today.

I am immensely indebted to my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor who has been so instrumental in introducing the 89 amendments to my Bill, all of them useful and many crucial to the Bill's success. I hope that the amendments will commend themselves to the House.

I thank the Law Commission and parliamentary counsel for their enormous assistance, without which the Bill would certainly be a much less effective reform and would probably not have been able to progress this far. I am immensely grateful to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department for the excellent and inestimable work that he and his Department have done in securing agreement and in helping Bill on its way.

Finally, I thank the British Retail Consortium, which sponsored the Bill, and with its legal advisers, and the British Property Federation for all that it did in working out the package of additional changes that enabled the Bill to proceed on the basis of agreement and support on all sides, without which, as the private Member's Bill not drawn in the ballot, it could never have got off the ground.

When the Bill was last before the House, on 21 April, I expressed delight that it had got as far as Third Reading and I am overjoyed that we are now in the final stages of a difficult, but immensely valuable undertaking. The reforms that it will enact will benefit all sorts of tenants by removing the spectre of privity of contract liability from new tenancies, and will also introduce changes to help tenants under existing tenancies, changes for which tenants have been crying out for a long time. They will also provide for new tenancies a sensible and balanced modification that will provide the property industry with the necessary control over investment to maintain market confidence, without the need for harsh restrictions.

The House would be assisted by an overview. Although the number and complexity of the amendments may appear daunting, none of them affects the policy aims of Bill which the House agreed earlier this year. The amendments will ensure that those aims are effectively met. Hon. Members will recall that the Bill proceeded in the House on the clear basis that changes would be incorporated in another place and the purpose of many of the amendments is specifically to make the necessary provision for those changes.

I shall stick closely to my notes because I appreciate that what is reported in Hansard can be referred to later by the courts. As was explained in the other place, the amendments fall into two categories. The first category comprises amendments that are necessary to give affect to the various elements of the agreed package put forward by the British Retail Consortium and the British Property Federation and accepted by the Government after consultation. Those amendments were tabled by my noble Friend the Earl of Courtown. The second category comprises amendments that are necessary to ensure that the Bill is complete and that it gives full effect to the recommendations of the Law Commission, which, it should be remembered, are at the heart of the reforms. Those amendments, many of which are technical, were tabled by my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor. Amendment No. 1 and the others with which it is particularly linked fall into that second category.

Clause 1 makes it clear that certain provisions are to apply only to new tenancies and that others are to apply to both new and existing tenancies. Subsection (1), which amendment No. 1 alters, lists the provisions that are to apply only to new tenancies. The change is necessary because a number of extra provisions are needed to carry through effectively the Law Commission's recommendations and it is accordingly necessary to add them to the list, which amendment No. 1 does.

Amendments Nos. 10, 11, 30, 61, 62 and 88 in particular, together with amendments Nos. 23 and 28 and 29, which make provision for certain special cases, are aimed at ensuring that the Law Commission scheme, which the Government accepted for new leases, will work effectively in practice and are accordingly very detailed. I shall explain the framework and I believe that my hon. Friend the Minister will be better placed than me to clothe that framework with greater detail if necessary.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar): Perhaps my hon. Friend or my hon. Friend the Minister will comment specifically on amendment No. 10 and in particular on the idea both in subsection (2) and in subsection (3) that the concept of covenants is void unless "immediately before the assignment" was specified. I have had a case in my constituency where negotiations have been protracted and in many ways took place in two specific parts. Will my hon. Friend or the Minister clarify exactly what is meant by "immediate"? Would it have to be just before the assignment and just before the tenancy, or earlier in the negotiations, and if so, what is the limit?

Mr. Thurnham: I am interested to hear my hon. Friend's point. Nearly every right hon. and hon. Member in the House has had constituents' cases that have given them concern. I am coming on to further detail on amendment No. 10. If those points do not cover my hon. Friend's question, I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to cover his point.

This important group of amendments is necessary to avoid potential problems arising from the interface of the new regime with existing law governing the transmission of benefit and burden of covenants and their enforcement under privity of estate, which is contained in a unsatisfactory mixture of statutory provisions and common law rules. The amendments will provide a proper framework for new tenancies in the Bill rather than attempting the extremely difficult task of amending existing law consequentially.

Amendment No. 10 introduces a new clause that sets out the basic principle for the transmission of the benefit and burden of covenants for new tenancies. It includes provision originally contained in clause 7, which is accordingly deleted, and certain parts of sections 78 and 79 of the Law of Property Act 1925, which are to be preserved for tenancies—those sections not being affected otherwise than in relation to tenancies. Together with the new clause introduced by amendment No. 11, it also replaces sections 141 and 142 of the 1925 Act, which will accordingly not apply to new tenancies. Amendment No. 88 does the job of disapplying these statutory provisions in the case of new tenancies.

12 noon

The basic principles of the Law Commission's scheme, contained in subsection (1) of the new clause introduced by amendment No. 10, is that the benefit and burden of all landlord and tenant covenants of a new tenancy are annexed to the whole and to each and every part of the lease and reversion as appropriate and shall pass on an assignment of the whole or any part. There is, as the Law Commission recommended, no distinction between covenants which touch and concern the land and those that do not. The annexation to each and every part ensures that, in the case of an assignment in parts, all covenants are enforceable by and against each of the assignees.

The assignee of a lease or reversion respectively will be bound by the burdens and entitled to the benefits of the covenants, except where they did not bind the assignor—for example, because the covenant was limited in duration or the assignor had been released from it. Where only part of the interest is assigned, the assignee will be bound by the burdens and entitled to the benefits of the covenants only to the extent that they relate to the part assigned to him. There is a saving for cases where the assignor was not bound when he assigned only because of a waiver that was expressly personal and was not intended to benefit anyone else. In such cases, it will be appropriate for the assignee to be bound by the covenant in question. There is also a saving to enable the parties to a lease to provide expressly for covenants to be purely personal and for the benefit or burden not to pass on assignment, notwithstanding the basic principle above.

The new clause introduced by amendment No. 11 reproduces for new leases the existing rules governing the transmission of the landlord's rights of re-entry under a tenancy, which would not otherwise fit into the framework for new leases, as they are not landlord covenants or tenant covenants.

Amendment No. 30 inserts a new clause which makes clear who may enforce the covenants benefiting either a landlord or a tenant under a new tenancy. Mortgagees of the reversion who are in possession and lessees of the reversion will, where they are entitled to rent and profits under the tenancy, be able to enforce and, as a corollary, have enforced against them the various rights and obligations of the landlord. Concomitantly, a mortgagee of the lease who is in possession will be able to enforce, and have enforced against him, the tenant's rights and obligations.

Amendment No. 61 introduces a further new clause to provide for another element of the framework to give full effect to the Law Commission's recommendations. This new clause makes it clear that an assignee shall have no rights or liabilities under a covenant of the tenancy in relation to anything occurring before the assignment. The new clause makes a saving for cases where the assignor expressly assigns his accrued rights to the assignee, which may be convenient in some cases as part of the bargain for the assignment. It also preserves the present position in respect of the landlord's rights of re-entry.

Amendment No. 62 ensures the completeness of clause 15, which makes provision for new leases concerning the effective release from any covenant occurring on assignment by virtue of the Act. Release on assignment will not affect any liability of the assignor for breach occurring before the assignment or any accrued rights of the assignor relating to a breach of the other party occurring before assignment. Where any person has taken on a liability parallel to that of the tenant, release on assignment to the tenant will release that person to the same extent.

Amendment No. 62 covers the case where a landlord or tenant assigns the whole of his interest but is not released, making it clear that any such assignment does not affect any liability of the assignor arising before the assignment.

Amendments Nos. 23, 28 and 29 provide—as I mentioned earlier—for the operation of the Law Commission's scheme in certain special cases. Amendments Nos. 23 and 29 cover the possibility that there may be another party to the tenancy other than the landlord and tenant—that is to say, a management company. Amendment No. 23 ensures that the procedure of clause 8 concerning apportionment of liability on assignment of part is available where it is a third party who is entitled to enforce the covenant in question. Amendment No. 29 introduces a new clause to make provision for the position of management companies in relation to the Law Commission's scheme, ensuring that the benefit and burden of covenants with management companies will pass and the provisions for releasing assignors and binding assignees will operate on assignments of the lease or reversion.

Amendment No. 28 introduces a new clause to make effective provisions for cases where an assignment is not lawful or voluntary, but takes place in breach of a covenant against assignment or by operation of law, such as passing to personal representatives on death of the landlord or tenant.

The Law Commission recommended that such assignments should not have effect to release the person parting with the interest from his rights and obligations under the lease, the possibility for misuse or unfairness to the other party being obvious. Such assignments should, however, as is the case at present, be fully effective to pass the estate and accordingly to bind the assignee. The assignor will be released only on the next assignment that is not an assignment in breach or by operation of law.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. John M. Taylor): I want to start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) on his Bill's progress into the final straight, which is in no small part due to his tireless efforts in holding to the essential principles of the reform, while facilitating and maintaining the reconciliation of conflicting interests whose clash prevented his earlier Bill from making progress. I also congratulate him on the determination and considerable persuasive skills that he has deployed in keeping this reform high on my agenda.

Before I move on to add some detail to the framework of my hon. Friend's explanation and, I hope, to add to our understanding of the amendments, I must put on record my appreciation of the Law Commission's enormous contribution in getting the Bill to this stage. Commissioners, officials and parliamentary counsel at the Law Commission have all given unstintingly of their time and expertise in assisting with the amendments that we are now considering. I am sure that my hon. Friend will not take it amiss if I say that the result of that work is a vastly improved measure, which comes to the House with the support of all sides in another place and which is thoroughly deserving of similar support in this House.

In order fully to understand the amendments and the way in which they fit into and enhance the Bill, it is necessary to have an overview of the scheme that the Law Commission has recommended and that is the underlying basis of this reform in relation to new tenancies. That scheme is full and detailed and, as a result, the amendments have also had to be full and detailed. Therefore, to proceed without a full explanation of the principal amendments would be to do the Bill and the House a disservice.

The guiding principle of the Law Commission's scheme is that all covenants and obligations between lessor and lessee should be enforceable between the landlord and tenant for the time being, with no distinction being drawn between covenants which touch and concern the land and other covenants. Thus, when the landlord's or tenant's interest is assigned, the assignee should become bound from the assignment by the whole package of rights and obligations as it bound his predecessor, including any variations. The assignee should not, however, take on any rights or liabilities in respect of any breach of covenant occurring prior to the assignment.

The corollary of this is that the assignor should cease to have any rights and obligations as from the assignment, but should not lose any accrued rights in respect of a breach by the other party prior to the assignment, and should likewise remain liable for any breach on his own part occurring prior to the assignment. The Law Commission did, however, recommend a difference in the position of landlords, which the Government accepted and which both Houses have agreed.

A landlord under a new tenancy who assigns the reversion will be released by a simple notice procedure which gives the tenant the right to argue that it would be unreasonable in the circumstances for the landlord to be released, with the final decision lying with a court in the case of a dispute. That is because tenants have no way of vetting the landlord's assignee and preventing assignment to a weak or nominee assignee. The assignee's ability to perform the landlord's obligations might, in some cases, be very important.

Where only part of the landlord's or tenant's interest is assigned, the assignee is to become bound by the package of rights and obligations only to the extent that it relates to the part assigned, and is not to take on any rights or liabilities in respect of any breach of covenant which occurred prior to the assignment. Once more, the corollary is that the assignor should cease to have prospective rights and obligations in respect of the part assigned, but should retain any accrued rights relating to that part, and should also remain liable for any breach of his own in relation to that part before assignment. The assignor is, of course, to remain bound by the package of rights and obligations to the extent that they relate to the part retained by him.

Covenants do not always operate separately in respect of separate parts of the interest. In particular, covenants to pay money, such as rent or service charge, are commonly charged out of the whole of the property, and cannot, except in special circumstances, be identified as operating in respect of any one part or another. In the case of such an unattributable covenant, to use the Law Commission's term, the assignor will not be released from the covenant to any extent and will remain jointly liable with the assignor in respect of the whole of the property, albeit with the right of contribution between them.

The answer in such a case is for the assignor and assignee to agree an apportionment of liability between them and the Bill makes special provision for making such apportionment binding on the other party to the lease. The Bill also makes detailed provision for defining and identifying unattributable covenants. The original draft was difficult to understand in that respect, and there are several amendments to make it clearer.

That is the basic scheme which the original Bill set out to implement. Unfortunately, for a variety of reasons including the fact that all sides were agreed that the changes could not have retrospective effect, the original draft fell a long way short of implementing the scheme effectively. There were a number of matters which were not addressed, and as my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East said, many potential problems in the relationship of the new regime to the existing law concerning the transmission of the benefit and burden of covenants and their enforcement under privity of estate.

12.15 pm

The existing law is to be found not in one place but in a mixture of statutory provisions and common law rules, some of which date back to the 14th century. The law contains both gaps and duplication and has been criticised as being inconsistent, unclear or uncertain in several areas. Some amendment was vital for the Bill to be effective, and the choice was between leaving the existing law in place for new tenancies but undertaking consequential amendments or disapplying the existing law for new tenancies and amending the Bill to provide a complete and self-contained framework for new tenancies, giving full effect to the principles of the Law Commission's recommendations to replace the existing law. With the inestimable assistance of the Law Commission, the latter course has been chosen, so that, for new tenancies, the law will be found in one place.

I hope that the measure as amended will enjoy the whole-hearted support of the House.

Mr. Pickles: I apologise to my hon. Friend for interrupting his flow but I should like to return to the point I raised earlier. Given that the transmission of covenants is a serious matter and that negotiations can be protracted and, by their nature, can be abandoned and started up again, can he say exactly what is meant by "immediate"?

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend need not have feared that I would not address his point. I do not blame him for returning to it, because all too often Ministers at the Dispatch Box sit down without adequately discharging the inquiries of their hon. Friends. I would wish to discharge properly that of my hon. Friend.

The use of the expression "immediately before" is meant to address the circumstances that actually prevailed at the time of the assignment. If I, in the next moment, effected an assignment of a lease from party to A to party B, the expression "immediately before" would define the circumstances as they prevailed at that instant. I am prepared to give way if I have not dealt with my hon. Friend's inquiry. If he remains sedentary, I shall assume that he is content.

Mr. Pickles: I am content but I thank my hon. Friend for his courtesy.

Mr. Taylor: I am grateful.

Rather like my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East, I have rather stuck to my text today. In such a technical area, I am rather nervous of the case of Pepper v. Hart, recently decided by the Judicial Committee in the House of Lords, which suggests that in highly technical disputes such as those between landlord and tenant, lawyers may be scurrying for Hansard to read what hon. Members and Ministers said when a measure was being taken to the statute book. I have therefore been swayed by caution this morning and stuck to my text.

I extemporise only to say that I should like to thank among others, and in no particular order, the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) who is here and has been a faithful supporter of the measure through all its stages. I would like to place on record my appreciation and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East.

I also note the contributions of various parties who have worked with great good faith and assiduity to bring the matter to the stage that we have reached—very close to the statute book. The British Property Federation and the British Retail Consortium have worked heroically to close gaps, if I may put it that way. The smaller business community has also been extremely helpful in sounding out the many small shopkeepers and similar small traders with leasehold premises as to their views. The self-employed and small business organisations have been very helpful. I know that the big battalions will not mind the particular care that I wanted to take in making sure that the small battalions were also consulted.

I hope that the measure as amended will enjoy the whole-hearted support of the House. It remedies a position that, although of long standing, has increasingly become regarded as unfair and does so in a way that will maintain investment confidence while extending extra assistance to those who would not otherwise have benefited.

Mr. Paul Boateng (Brent, South): The Minister, kind and courteous as ever, expresses his thanks for the small part that I have played in the smooth progress of the Bill. Let me in turn thank him for that and thank my noble friend Lord Irvine of Lairg for his role in the passage of the Bill through the other place. I also thank my hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser), who sadly is absent today but to whose heart I know the matter has long been especially close. He has been particularly co-operative in recent weeks to ensure its smooth passage.

Above all, the thanks of the House and of many generations to come who will be spared the injustices that have characterised this aspect of the law must deservedly go to the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham), who has worked assiduously on this subject for many years. There is not a soul present who has not at some time been approached by the hon. Member in order to have his ear, although never his arm, bent. We owe him a great debt of gratitude. I wish the Bill well in its remaining stages and look forward to its early introduction into law.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 2, in page 1, line 7, after ("13") insert

("and section (Restriction of liability of former tenant where tenancy subsequently varied)")

Mr. Thurnham: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Lords amendments Nos. 4 and 57.

Mr. Thurnham: As I have already said, the Bill passed through the House earlier this year on the basis of a clear understanding that amendments would be tabled in another place to give effect to the four elements of the package agreed between the British Retail Consortium and the British Property Federation. This group of amendments gives effect to one of those elements, and I think that it would be helpful if I were to explain the package in outline before dealing with the amendments themselves as it is the spirit of realistic compromise and desire to make early progress represented by the package that has enabled the Bill to reach this advanced stage.

The package may be described as having two parts. The first enables landlords under new leases to have that degree of extra control over assignment of the lease which will enable investment confidence to be maintained without resort being made to the draconian instrument of absolute covenants against assignment. The second comprises three changes aimed principally at assisting former tenants under existing leases who will not be released from privity of contract. As I said, the package of changes has attracted support from all parts of the property industry and Parliament. I hope that its translation into provisions of the Bill will commend itself to the House.

The first element comprises the amendment of section 19 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1927 to enable landlords and tenants to agree in advance the terms under which future assignments can be made. It is aimed at ensuring that landlords will be able to preserve covenant strength which underpins investment value and will apply only to new commercial tenancies. The other three elements of the agreement are aimed at assisting tenants under existing leases rather than addressing a particular need for new commercial leases. They will accordingly apply to new and existing tenancies of all types.

The second element improves protection under clause 13 which requires a landlord to give notice to his former tenant or the former tenant's guarantor within a fixed period of certain sums falling due if he is subsequently to have the right to enforce payment of such a sum against the former tenant or guarantor. That period was fixed in the Bill as originally drafted at nine months but is to be reduced to six months.

The third element limits the liability of the former tenant in respect of payments due to certain types of changes in the lease taking place after the former tenant parted with it. The final element will enable the former tenant who is made to pay for another's default to call for an overriding lease so that he may have some measure of control over his position.

The group of amendments will give effect to the third element of the package that I have just outlined. While amendment No. 1 added provision to the list in clause 1 of those applying to new tenancies only, amendment No. 2 adds to the list a provision applying to new and existing tenancies. The provision in question is the third element of the package dealing with liability in respect of subsequent variations in the lease. Amendment No. 4 simply changes the word "applies" in subsection (2) to "apply" to reflect the fact that there will, as a result of the amendments to give effect to the package, be more than one provision applying to new and existing tenancies. The substantial amendment for which they pave the way is amendment No. 57.

Amendment No. 57 introduces a new clause immediately after clause 13 of the Bill as it left this place. The new clause builds on clause 13, which opens by setting out the circumstances in which a former tenant may be liable in respect of a tenancy that he has assigned. The new clause provides that where a former tenant is under a liability in those same circumstances and the terms of the lease have been varied after he assigned the lease and after commencement of the Act, the former tenant shall not be liable to pay any sum to the extent that it is referable to that variation, provided that the variation was one which the landlord had the absolute right to refuse to make when it was made.

There may be cases where the landlord originally had an absolute right to refuse certain types of variation but where an intervening variation of the lease has taken away that absolute right. In such cases, it would not be fair for the tenant to be liable to pay any additional sum referable to the subsequent variation which was one that the landlord did have the absolute right to refuse when the tenant parted with the tenancy.

The provision turns on whether the landlord had the absolute right to refuse to make the variation, because it is not reasonable for a tenant to be expected to have in contemplation that after he assigns the lease, the landlord will change its terms so as to allow something that the tenant was absolutely prohibited from doing. On the other hand, where the variation is one which the landlord had only a qualified right to refuse to make, it is reasonable to expect the outgoing tenant to realise that the lease may be so varied after he has parted with it and to bear that in mind when making contingent provision.

[Mr. Thurnham]

In deciding whether the landlord's right to refuse the variation was absolute, it will be necessary to have regard not only to the terms of the lease but, for example, to the law generally, including in particular any statutory provision. For example, while the terms of the lease may absolutely prohibit certain tenant's improvement which the tenant is nevertheless allowed to make by virtue of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1927, any such changes, even though the rent may be affected, cannot be said to be variations coming within this clause as the landlord could not refuse to allow them.

The clause will accordingly cover such matters as variations to the nature of the premises, user, extra space for an increased rent and so on, but it will not prevent the landlord from being entitled to recover from a former tenant an increase of rent on a rent review for which the lease made provision when the former tenant held the lease, except to the extent that the increase refers to a variation of the sort covered by the clause.

I have further comments to make but, in view of the time, I shall conclude my remarks on this group at this point.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): I back the Bill and want it to reach the statute book as soon as possible. Indeed, I once presented an earlier version of the Bill. I do not intend to speak again, but the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) described the compromise that has been reached and I wish to place on record one aspect of that compromise with which I am not happy. I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) is not here to listen to what I have to say.

Mr. Boateng: I am behind my hon. Friend.

Mr. Fraser: I beg my hon. Friend's pardon. Obviously, he will hear what I have to say.

The foundation of my concern is that there is not equality of power between landlord and tenant. Where a property company or a pension fund has a whole portfolio of properties and one lease goes bad and somebody does not pay, the risk can be spread across the pension fund or the freeholder's investment. When original lessee liability arises, it is not usually in relation to only one person and it cannot be laid off in the same way as the vast interests of most property developers. Therefore, the balance of power is not equal.

If I were in charge of the matter or if Labour were in government, I would not have contemplated the modification of section 19 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1927. That section has served the commercial world very well indeed and leases are freely assignable without much restriction. In my view that should continue. It is good for the function of the market and for the rights of tenants.

12.30 pm

There is, however, a compromise, and I do not wish to stand in its way. If it does not work, I expect the next Labour Government further to amend section 19 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1927 so that there is no unreasonable restriction on the way in which tenants can assign. I can envisage landlords abusing that right if the market allows them to do so. If it is a seller's market, there will be abuses and conditions will be built into assignment that will be unduly onerous and may be impossible to achieve. I hope that does not happen, but if it turns out that way, I hope that the next Labour Government will correct that malfunction.

Mr. Boateng: My hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) speaks from enormous personal and professional experience as a diligent constituency Member of Parliament and a practising solicitor. His concerns about the disparity of power between the parties to a lease were well expressed and well taken by the Labour party.

My noble and learned Friend Lord Irvine of Lairg has expressed elsewhere a real understanding of the concerns of my hon. Friend the Member for Norwood, who can be assured that we shall be monitoring carefully that aspect of the Bill in terms of ensuring that the inequality in the relationship between landlord and tenant does not lead to injustice. However, we take the view that it would be wrong to prejudice the speedy passage into law of the legislation at this stage by seeking to do anything that would imperil it, although I well understand the concerns expressed by my hon. Friend in that regard.

Mr. Fraser: I wish only to place on record that I had not realised that my hon. Friend was behind me when I raised the matter, and I am grateful to him.

Mr. Boateng: There is no way that I would ever be absent from the Chamber while my hon. Friend was raising a matter of concern to me and to the Labour party, and I am grateful to him.

Mr. John M. Taylor: I sympathise with the remarks of the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) about the mismatch between the big property landlords and the small tenants of lock-up shops who are often granted leases on the basis of take it or leave it, sign here and pay the landlord's costs as well. I accept that, but the hon. Gentleman, in the generosity of his spirit and the breadth of his experience will agree that the mismatch was the burden of privity that is removed in the context of the compromise to which he referred.

It is my opinion and I put it to the House that the compromise itself was not unreasonable. One is often restrained to what is possible and what we have here is possible. It represents a great deal of reconciliation of interests and good faith.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East for his full and helpful explanation of Lords amendments Nos. 2, 4 and 57. I cannot better explain their detailed operation, so I shall be brief. I very much welcome the group of amendments which effect a change that tenants and their advisers have been seeking for a long time. It has been generally accepted that abrogation of the privity-of-contract doctrine could be undertaken only for new tenancies, but for many that acceptance was tinged with regret that former tenants, under existing tenancies, would thereby be left exposed.

That, and the other elements of the property industry package aimed at existing tenancies, represents a significant advance for existing tenants without any adverse effect on investment confidence. I do not think that hon. Members will be surprised to learn that, when the Lord Chancellor's Department consulted on the package, there was unanimous support for that element.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) has outlined the package as a whole, I should also say that the package as a whole was supported by the great majority of consultees, who considered it to be balanced and reasonable. That view has been fortified by the Bill's progress.

Mr. Ken Livingstone (Brent, East): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I ask you to use your power to suspend the sitting to allow a senior Minister to be brought here to answer grave allegations? I have been given a series of confidential letters from the leader of Brent council, Councillor Blackman, to Ministers at the Department of the Environment and officials at No. 10 Downing street, which thank the Government for rigging the council's grant assessment for 1994 to aid it in the election, and asking them to do the same in 1995 so that the party can hold Brent in the event of a by-election.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter for the Chair, but I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman's comments have been noted.

Lords amendment agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 3, in page 1, line 7, after ("13") insert

("and sections (Right of former tenant or guarantor to overriding lease) and (Overriding leases: supplementary provisions)")

Mr. Thurnham: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Lords amendments Nos. 6, 58 and 59.

Mr. Thurnham: This is another group of amendments giving effect to an element of the agreed package of changes that has gained across-the-board support for the Bill. They introduce the final element of the package that I outlined earlier, giving former tenants and their guarantors, under both new and existing leases of all types, the possibility of gaining a degree of control over the liability when they are called on to make good the default of a subsequent tenant, by calling for an overriding lease. Lords amendment No. 3 does the same as Lords amendment No. 2, but in respect of that different element of the property industry agreement, making it clear that the element is to apply to both new and other tenancies.

Lords amendment No. 6 is necessary to maintain the agreed policy that privity-of-contract liability is to be abolished prospectively and not retrospectively. It makes it clear that the definition of a new tenancy—which is dealt with in Lords amendments Nos. 5 and 7—is to be subject to a special rule that is part of the overriding lease provisions. That rule states that an overriding lease will derive its status from the lease under which the person claiming it has been called on to make good the default of the subsequent tenant. The overriding lease will not be a new tenancy if the tenancy under which the former tenant finds himself having to pay is not the new tenancy. The amendment is necessary to prevent inconsistency between clause 1 and the overriding lease provisions, which would cause significant practical problems and would cut across the policy of limiting the abolition of privity of contract to new tenancies.

The two substantial amendments for which the others pave the way are Lords amendments Nos. 58 and 59, which introduce two new clauses after clause 13 and immediately after the new clause introduced by Lords amendment No. 57. This element of the property industry agreement addresses a particularly difficult problem, and a way in which the doctrine of privity of contract can be seen to operate especially unfairly.

At present, although a former tenant may have to pay, and continue to pay, sums in respect of a lease that he signed long ago, he may be unable to regain possession, and may thus have nothing to show for his payments—unless he was sophisticated enough to reserve some kind of right of re-entry when negotiating the lease, or the defaulting tenant becomes insolvent, the lease is disclaimed on bankruptcy or liquidation and the former tenant is able to have the lease revested in him.

The provisions introduced by the amendments address the problem by enabling a former tenant or guarantor who has to pay in respect of a subsequent tenant's default to call for an overriding lease to be granted to him so that he can pursue remedies directly against the defaulting tenant if he is still in occupation, or take over possession and make use of the property so that he can set off the return against his liability. Former tenants will thus have some means of gaining a measure of control, rather than the helplessness which they so often feel in the face of such unexpected liabilities.

Amendment No. 58 introduces the first new clause, which sets out a former tenant's right to call for an overriding lease, the circumstances in which it arises and the terms of the overriding lease and the mechanics for its grant. Amendment No. 59 introduces the second new clause, which makes supplementary provision including such matters as the special rule to which I have referred governing whether an overriding lease is a new or existing tenancy, the question what happens if there is an unjustifiable delay in granting it and more technical matters as the land registration position.

I have further notes on this group of amendments, but in view of the time and as a courtesy to the House I shall conclude here.

Mr. John M. Taylor: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his full and clear explanation of these important amendments. This element of the property industry package will deal with what are some of the hardest cases caused by the privity of contract doctrine. Hon. Members have on numerous occasions asked me what might be done for constituents who have found themselves paying rent for another's occupation where the landlord is unconcerned and the premises may be going to wrack and ruin with no prospect of the constituent even being able to go into possession to stop the disrepair getting worse. The amendments will provide the remedy which, it must be admitted, was lacking, and I am grateful to the property industry bodies for coming forward with them. I commend the amendments to the House.

Lords amendment: No. 5, in page 1, line 8, leave out from ("if") to end of line 12 and insert

("it is granted on or after the date on which this Act comes into force otherwise than in pursuance of—

(a) an agreement entered into before that date, or

(b) an order of a court made before that date.")

Mr. Thurnham: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendment No. 7.

Mr. Thurnham: The amendments in this group are much shorter and simpler than those which the House has so far considered, but they are very important. Clause 1 concerns which provisions of the Bill are to apply to new tenancies and which to both new and existing tenancies, so it must also define a new tenancy.

The definition of a new tenancy which was in the Bill as it left this House came in for trenchant criticism, and amendments Nos. 5 and 7 accordingly carry out extensive revision. Amendment No. 5 makes clear that a new tenancy is one granted on or after the date on which the Act comes into force, unless it is granted in pursuance of an agreement entered into before that date or a court order made before that date.

Amendment No. 7 replaces subsection (4) of the original draft of the Bill with three new subsections which put beyond doubt certain matters which the draft either does not cover, or does not cover satisfactorily. The first new subsection covers the variations of leases which change the nature of the demise and so take effect as a surrender and regrant and produce a fresh tenancy. The basic principle of subsection (3) is applied so that the fresh tenancy will be a new tenancy for the purposes of the Act if the agreement for the variation is entered into after the Act came into force, but an existing tenancy if the agreement predated commencement.

The next new subsection applies the same principle to tenancies granted in pursuance of options, the treatment of which in the existing draft was particularly criticised. If the option was granted before the date on which the Act comes into force but is exercised after that date, the tenancy which is granted pursuant thereto will not be a new tenancy. The final new subsection covers a tenant's rights of first refusal to the grant of a new tenancy which might not necessarily otherwise be included in the "option", and ensures that the same basic principle will apply.

Mr. John M. Taylor: As my hon. Friend said, this group of amendments is important. I would go so far as to say that they are pivotal. The part of clause 1 which they seek to amend essentially makes transitional provision which is necessary because of the decision that it would not be possible to implement the Law Commission's recommendations for existing leases. That decision was based partly on the need to avoid considerable damage to confidence in the property market and to investments held by such investors as pensions funds, unit trusts and the like, with which not only bigger concerns but many individuals' fortunes are bound up.

12.45 pm

The decision was also based on the principle that agreements freely entered into should be interfered with as little as possible. That principle underlies the detailed approach to defining a new tenancy. Had the definition simply stated that a new tenancy was one granted after commencement of the legislation, it would have ignored the fact that in a significant number of cases the essential agreement that should not be interfered with was entered into before commencement. In the case of new tenancies granted pursuant to court order, the court order is analogous to the concluded agreement. I support the amendments.

COVENANTS TO WHICH THE ACT APPLIES

Lords amendment: No. 8, in page 2, line 2, after ("disposals);") insert—

("( ) paragraph 1 of Schedule 6A to that Act (covenants requiring redemption of landlord's share);")

Mr. Thurnham: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendment No. 9.

Mr. Thurnham: The amendments are very technical and can be explained briefly. The part of clause 2 which is amended—as recommended by the Law Commission—excepts from the operation of the Act certain covenants entered into by tenants of local authorities who exercise their right to buy, to prevent them from making unjustified profits from an early sale so that they will continue to be bound by those covenants notwithstanding the new regime.

Lords amendments Nos. 8 and 9 make the necessary provision for excepting from the Act a further such covenant which was not picked up in the first draft of the Bill.

Mr. John M. Taylor: As my hon. Friend said, amendments Nos. 8 and 9 are entirely technical. I hope that the House will accept them as such.

Clause 6

PROCEDURE FOR SEEKING RELEASE FROM A COVENANT UNDER SECTION 4 OR 5

Lords amendment: No. 12, in page 3, line 29, leave out ("before") and insert

("either before or within the period of four weeks beginning with the date of")

Mr. Thurnham: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Lords amendments Nos. 13 to 15, 17 to 22, 24 to 27 and 68.

Mr. Thurnham: These amendments refine certain procedures under the Act involving notices so that they will operate better in practice. The first amendment introduces changes to clause 6 of the Bill as it left this House. As my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, mentioned earlier, it was a major plank of the Law Commission's recommendations that landlords under new tenancies should not be released automatically from the burdens and benefits of the landlord covenants of the tenancy, but would be so released under a procedure involving service of a notice on the tenant, giving the tenant the opportunity to argue that it would not be reasonable for the landlord to be released. Provision to that effect is set out in clauses 4 and 5 of the Bill as it left the House, which have now become clauses 6 and 7 in the amended version. Those clauses have not been amended, and the principle underlying them has been accepted.

Clause 6 of the Bill as it left this House, which is clause 8 as amended, makes provision for that notice procedure. The original draft provided for the landlord to serve the notice on the tenant before the assignment from which he sought to be released and for the tenant to have four weeks from service of the notice to object to the landlord's being released. The landlord is to be released, as from the date of assignment, if there is no objection within four weeks or if there is an objection but the court declares it to be reasonable for the landlord to be released.

Amendments Nos. 12 to 15 make practical changes to the procedure as set out in the Bill. Those changes go hand in hand with amendments to clauses 8 and 9, which, as my hon. Friend the Minister mentioned, provide for apportionment of liability under certain covenants between assignor and assignee to become binding on the other party to the lease if a similar notice procedure is gone through. Since the changes are of just as much benefit for the apportionment notice procedure, amendments Nos. 24 to 27 to clause 9 simply carry through the approach of the amendments to clause 6. Amendments Nos. 17 to 22 make changes to the wording of clause 8, which are necessary to pave the way for the amendments to clause 9.

The first of the practical changes is brought about by amendment No. 12, which removes the requirement that the notice be served before the assignment and allows it to be served before or up to four weeks after it. Amendment No. 13 adds wording to reflect the fact that the notice may be served after assignment.

The second practical change is to provide for the tenant to be able to say that he has no objection and thereby to short-circuit the process, rather than requiring the landlord to wait for four weeks before he knows that he is released in a case in which the tenant is unconcerned. The tenant is also allowed to withdraw a notice of objection at any time. Amendments Nos. 14 and 15 effect that change.

Clause 9 provides for an essentially identical notice procedure for the ability to make an apportionment agreement binding in this way, as opposed to the procedure, and a number of small changes to the wording of clause 8 are necessary to reflect the fact that notices will be able to be served after assignment as well as before.

Clause 8 makes provision cover cases of assignment of part only of a landlord's or tenant's interest, where there is an "unattributable" covenant, as my hon. Friend the Minister described. In such a case, it will be necessary for the assignor and the assignee to apportion liability between themselves. The clause provides that such an agreement can be made binding on the other party to the lease through the notice procedure provided for in clause 9. It is essentially the same as the procedure provided for under clause 6 and amendments Nos. 24 to 27 make the same provision for the procedure in clause 9 as amendments Nos. 12 to 15 for clause 6.

Amendments Nos. 17 to 22 are technical and carry out some minor changes to the wording of clause 8 to reflect the changes in clause 9.

Finally, amendment No. 68 is consequential on the fact that the recipient of a notice under these procedures will have new options other than objecting or saying nothing and it requires the notice to tell the recipient what the options are.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Once more, these amendments are a good example of how reviewing the Bill with a fresh eye has brought dividends in provisions that will improve its practical operation. The amendments are entirely consistent with the Law Commission's underlying policy and it is in agreement with them.

Originally, it was intended only to make the change enabling the recipient of a notice to indicate agreement so as to shorten matters. As part of the review process, however, it was questioned whether it was necessary for the notice to be served before the assignment in question when, particularly in the case of notices by landlords under clause 6, there might be practical benefits to the person serving the notice in allowing it to be done for a limited period after the assignment.

There are cases in which confidentiality is very important to the landlord when he assigns, so he cannot afford to make his negotiations public by serving notices before assignment. The tenant has no control over the assignment and will be interested only in whether the new landlord is a secure prospect, such that it is not unreasonable for the assigning landlord to be released. In those circumstances, it was decided that it would not be to the tenant's disadvantage if the notice were not served until after the assignment. As part of that process, it became apparent that no purpose would be served by having the matter go to court if the recipient of the notice were to register his objection and then change his mind. So provision was added enabling an objection to be withdrawn at any time.

Taken together, the amendments will enable the parties to save trouble and expense and will minimise interference with commercial confidentiality. It may assist the House if I add a brief word about notices for the purposes of the Bill generally. Notices under clauses 6, 9 and 13 are to be in a form prescribed by statutory instrument, which will tell the recipient in clear and simple language what the notice is about and what may be done in response. That reflects the Law Commissions' recommendation that the notices should be in a standard and informative form because of their importance to the recipient.

The sanction for failing to serve a notice in the prescribed form will be that the notice is ineffective for its purpose. It is not, however, intended that the server of the notice should be thus penalised for minor departures from the prescribed form. It is intended that the prescribed forms are as simple and therefore as easy to use as possible.

Clause 12

TENANT GUARANTEEING PERFORMANCE OF COVENANT BY ASSIGNEE

Lords amendment: No. 31, in page 6, line 25, after first ("a") insert ("tenant")

Mr. Thurnham: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Lords amendments Nos. 32 to 36.

This important group of amendments revises and refines the operation of clause 12 as it left this House. That clause deals with the Law Commission's recommendation that when a tenant under a new tenancy is released on assignment in accordance with clause 3, it should nevertheless be possible for the landlord, as a condition of the licence to assign, to ask the tenant to guarantee performance of the tenant covenants of the tenancy by his immediate assignee, but no more.

Two important propositions must be implemented effectively by the clause: the proposition that the outgoing tenant should guarantee performance by his successor; and the proposition that the guarantee should cover no more than that. Clause 12 in the original draft set out to give workable effect to those propositions but came in for criticism that it failed to do so effectively. The amendments seek to ensure that the clause is fully effective.

In considering this clause, it should be borne in mind that a landlord will be able to seek a guarantee from an outgoing tenant only if the lease gives the landlord control over an assignment because, in the absence of such control, the lease will be freely assignable by the tenant under general principles without the need to refer to the landlord. Control will arise either by way of an absolute covenant against assignment, which bans it all together, in which case the landlord will be free to demand such a guarantee as the price for waiving the ban, or by providing assignment only with the landlord's consent.

Subsections (1) to (3) of the clause cover those propositions with only minor technical amendments. The remainder of the clause covers the limits on such an authorised guarantee agreement, as the Bill terms it, and the provisions which the landlord can seek to include in it to ensure its effectiveness for his purposes.

The amendments strike the balance between ensuring that the guarantee is effective when the landlord most needs it and ensuring that it cannot be used as a device for subverting the main reform by retaining the effective privity of contract liability once the assignee has assigned.

Amendment No. 31 is entirely technical and inserts the word "tenant" in subsection (1) of clause 12 to make it absolutely clear that it is only tenant covenants, the performance of which may be guaranteed. Amendment No. 32 removes words from subsection (2) consequential on the later amendments, which make the limits of an authorised guarantee agreement absolutely clear. Amendment No. 33 makes it clear that the guarantee will not be effective unless it complies with the new clearer provision introduced by the later amendments.

Amendment No. 34 will simply introduce words to subsection (3) to make it clear that there is no question of an authorised guarantee agreement arising unless the lease contains some form of covenant against assignment.

Amendments Nos. 35 and 36 carry out wholesale revision of the latter part of the clause and are extremely important because without them it could not safely be said that the clause properly gives effect to the two necessary propositions that I outlined earlier.

1 pm

Amendment No. 35 deletes the greater part of subsection (4) and replaces that deleted with clearer and more all-embracing provisions setting the limit for an authorised guarantee agreement, and subject to that what such an agreement may include to ensure that it is effective in the circumstances when it will be most needed.

Any provision that is aimed at tying in the outgoing tenant to any kind of liability that is in any way referable to the lease he has assigned will, regardless of its terms, be of no effect once the assignee himself is released by reason of his having assigned. That deals with the proposition that the guarantee should cover no more than the performance of the tenant covenants by the assignee.

Any such provisions will not be void ab initio, however. That is of importance for the new subsection (4A), which will be inserted by the amendment. It deals with the proposition that the guarantee should effectively cover performance by the assignee.

The problem for landlords is that the strict technical rules relating to guarantees generally will result in the guarantor of a tenant being discharged if the tenant becomes insolvent and the lease is then disclaimed by the receiver or trustee in bankruptcy. That is just when the landlord needs the guarantee the most.

The law in general permits several ways around this difficulty, such as provisions whereby the guarantor agrees to take on the liability of a sole or principal debtor that is not discharged in the circumstances, or agrees to take on a new lease replacing the residues of the disclaimed lease. The new subsection expressly permits these devices to enable landlords to ensure that the guarantee remains effective when most needed. That is subject, however, to the general limitation inserted in subsection (4). The effect is that the devices will be available if the assignee becomes insolvent and the lease is disclaimed before he assigns, but will cease to have any effect once the assignee signs and is released in accordance with clause 3.

Amendment No. 36 completes the revision of clause 12 by introducing two new subsections to cover the position of excluded assignments and the position where a tenant who entered into an authorised guaranteed agreement becomes tenant again under the operation of that agreement. In relation to excluded assignments, where a tenant who made an excluded assignment and therefore remains bound is released on the next assignment, he may, in effect, be asked by the landlord to give the guarantee that he would have been asked to give if his assignment had not been an excluded one and had been effective to release him.
